The men's gymnastics season concluded this weekend at the NCAA National Championships, held on the campus of Ohio State University. That is where University of Massachusetts freshman Kevin Schwartz attempted to become the first male gymnast from UMass to be a national champion in a single event.

In Thurday's preliminaries, Schwartz placed fourth with a 9.80 on the still rings. The score enabled him to advance to the finals held Saturday evening. That was another day however, as Schwartz' final score was a 9.25, only good enough for ninth place in the competition.

Schwartz holds the UMass record on the rings, with a 9.95 at the New England Championships this season, and was ranked No. 1 nationally a majority of the year.

In Athens, Ga. last Thurday evening, the Northeast Region all around champion J.J. Tolhurst also appeared on the national stage. The women's gymnastics standout qualified for the NCAA Championships with that title three weeks ago at Kent State University.

The 38.150 all around score for Thursday's events was just .200 of a point below her Regional qualifying score, but it was not enough to advance her to Saturday's finals. Her only fall on the balance beam took away from a potentially stellar showing for the junior from Utica, N.Y.

LoPresti's work was far from over, as the Irish won the ensuing faceoff and attacked. And with 1:00 remaining on the clock, Willie Sutton (two goals, three assists) found himself all alone, 15 feet away from the net, but was robbed by the left foot of LoPresti, who then fired the ball long starting the march to Stanziale's heroics.

"When I know the game's on the line, that's when I feel I play my best; under pressure," said LoPresti. "[After Stanziale scored] I knew that they weren't getting another one. We had to win to make the tournament."

The Irish had one last chance to tie the game but it was LoPresti once again stoning Sutton, with just three ticks left on the clock to preserve the win.

The first half was the Glass and Colley show as the two combined for 7 of the 10 goals in the half. It was Colley who scored two goals a minute apart to give the visitors the lead midway through the first quarter. Then UMass turned the tables as Murphy scored a man-up goal, sandwiched between two Glass tallies for a 3-2 lead at the end of one.

Colley knotted the game just 21 seconds into the second as he completed his hat trick. The teams then traded goals before Glass scored twice to finish out the half as the Minutemen would head to the locker room up 6-4.

The Irish came out a different team in the second half, spreading the ball around more, rather than depending on Colley, and it paid off as they would out score four straight goals to take a two goal advantage before Glass scored before the third quarter buzzer went off.

Notre Dame got a man-up goal three minutes into the fourth before the UMass defense shut the door on the Irish attack and put them in position for a comeback.

The Minutemen return to action Wednesday, as they head to New Haven to take on Yale, before returning home to take on Syracuse next Saturday.

Highlights...

Sophomore Henry Stanziale's third career goal with 23 seconds left in the game gave Massachusetts a come-from-behind victory over No. 11 Notre Dame ... Glass tied a career mark scoring seven goals for the Minutemen. It marked Glass sixth consecutive hat trick and his third game scoring five or more goals ... Senior goalie Tom LoPresti was stellar in the fourth quarter, keeping Notre Dame from scoring to keep the Minutemain comeback alive ... The Minutemen will take on Yale this Wednesday in New Haven at 3 p.m.

The game was scoreless until the bottom of the third when UMass scratched out one run, then had Ubaldo on third with shortstop Mark Pileski at the plate and one out. Ubaldo broke for the plate, and Pileski layed down a perfect bunt in front of the plate to pull of the suicide squeeze.

After Rutgers tied it at two in the fourth, Pelis led off the sixth with a single, bringing up Nate Murphy. Murphy lined a triple to deep right-field, scoring Pelis, then trotted home on a double by Kelly to end the scoring at 4-2.

In the third game yesterday, lefty Jeff Michaels took the hill for the Minutemen. RU jumped ahead for the first time in the series, getting a run in the top of the first. However, in the bottom of the frame, the Minutemen battled back to tie it. Knight then belted a three run homer, his twelfth of the season and third of the series, to put UMass up 4-1.

UMass got two more, but Rutgers was able to pull to 6-3 on a homer by Aquino. However, UMass iced it when Pelis smacked a two run homer, and Nate Murphy hit a solo shot in the seventh to make it 10-3.

Michaels (4-0) earned the win, while sophomore Chad Sullivan pitched three innings to register his second save.

UMass will play again tomorrow when they host Maine in a double header at Lorden field.

other special occasions.

A contemporary fashion show and closing remarks from Lucie Kwan and Matthew Kibby, Mistress and Master of Ceremonies, ended the annual event. As another Asian Night concluded, many were already looking forward to next year.

Smith College student Geraldine Schneider believed Asian Night to be a step to find unity.

"These kinds of functions allow us to appreciate the richness within different nationalities in the Five-College Area," said Schneider. "It's always important not to emphasize our differences. Asian Night welcomes everyone, that's why it's great."

Women's crew remains undefeated

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's crew expanded its winning streak this weekend in Durham, N.H., with two impressive wins over the University of New Hampshire. With roughly the first half of the season behind them, UMass boasts an impressive undefeated record (4–0) for both its varsity and junior varsity boats.

The UMass varsity boat crossed the line with a time of 6:15, a full 15 seconds ahead of the UNH boat which finished with a time of 6:30. The UMass junior varsity boat was clocked with a time of 6:34 to the Wildcats' 6:43.

Massachusetts coach Jim Dietz was ecstatic with his crew's performance thus far. This competition against UNH marks the first Division I team the Minutewomen have raced against this season.

"UNH has defeated Northeastern, and lost to Dartmouth by four seconds. This means that, on paper, we're faster than they are," Dietz said.

This is valuable information as UMass prepares for competition in New England Rowing Championships on May 6 in Worcester.

"At this point in the season, both our varsity and junior varsity boats should be seeded number one," Dietz said. Official seeds will be announced in the coming weeks pending the completion of the coaches polls.

"Nobody else has come close to us so far. Our junior varsity boat has defeated Boston College, MIT, and Northeastern," Dietz said. If UMass continues its winning ways, they have a good chance of wining the New England title.

Ultimately, the Minutewomen have their sights set for a win in the Champion Regatta, the crew's major national competition. Again, Dietz hopes for a top seed pending the results of upcoming coaches polls.

"Right now, the University of Virginia and the University of Michigan are looking pretty strong. By next week, we should have a good idea of how we'll stack up," Dietz said.

from teammate Mike Iorio, and had a breakaway on LoPresti. Kearney, who had two goals in the game, fired low but LoPresti got the stick there in time to save the goal.

Finding nobody to pass to, LoPresti took off up the field, breaking all the way into the offensive zone to fire a shot on ND goalie Alex Cade. Although the shot was saved, LoPresti was slashed on the play giving UMass an extra-man opportunity.

"That was huge," said sophomore attacker Brendan Glass. "When he crossed the midfield line, I thought there was no way he was going to keep going."

The Minutemen scored to cut the deficit shortly after.

Vin Dello–Iacono said that LoPresti's performance through pain inspired the entire team.

"He's a warrior," Dello–Iacano said. "Everyone looks up to him. You see him playing like that and everybody steps it up another notch."

The winning goal came from an unlikely hero. Before getting the game winner Henry Stanziale had two career goals, but with Jeremy Murphy sidelined with an injury, and the ND defense expecting Brendan Glass to get the final shot, the sophomore stepped up.

"It was huge. If we had lost this one, it would have been our third loss by one goal, it's nice to win the close one," said Glass, who thought Notre Dame was overconfident coming in.

"They thought they were going to roll over UMass, just because they're No. 11. UMass has a lot of tradition. Who are they to come out from the West league and just because they're No. 11 and think they're going to manhandle us?"

You're not going to believe this, but sometimes for fun when I'm walking with a friend and we're getting ready to cross a busy street, I'll push him out in front of a car which is just far enough away so that he is able to avoid being hit if he runs as fast as he can .....to the other side.
I only do this with very good friends. We all deserve to have a good time, and sometimes there's no one else around to play with.
Actually, I do it for his own good.
When's he gonna learn?

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Be willing to go that extra mile for someone close to you. Your energy helps you find success in a challenging profession. Resist trying to revive a failed relationship. Widen your social circle.

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): Results and gains will exceed your fondest expectations. If you want more authority, you should ask for it. Influential people are impressed by your track record.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Refuse to tempted by someone's grandiose schemes. Practical techniques will work best in both business and the arts. Seek expert advice before making investments or signing contracts.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): You feel more cheerful when you finally hit your stride at work. Now is not the time to go it alone. Hand on to positive friends. Hard work pays off with a handsome financial reward.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Personal ambitions could influence an important decision. Listen to your loved ones. Keep a low profile while planning for the future. Secrecy is the key to success. A test will only strengthen a relationship.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Get an early start today and things will go better for you. Take extra precautions when traveling. Double-check car and hotel doors. Your charm gives you a big advantage in business. Be gracious.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Big financial payoffs are on the way. Prepare a plan to make the most of a windfall. The spotlight is on what you want to do today. Follow your intuition. Dream experiences prove helpful.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Money set aside today will pay rich dividends in the future. Postpone inaugurating something new. Loved ones deserve the lion's share of your attention. Keep an important project under wraps. Limit daily business expenditures.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): You could be drawn in two directions now. Make work your top priority. Greater savings are possible as the overall financial picture improves. Tonight, spread your wings as a social butterfly. Seek important introductions.

CARRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Promises of support may not be honored. Rely on your own resources to bail you out of a dilemma. Late afternoon brings welcome news. Negotiations with people overseas reach a conclusion. Romance looks rosy.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Dress well today and take pride in your work. Others will make you feel truly appreciated. A letter you receive should be viewed objectively. Show sympathy and affection for someone who is probably lonely.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Try not to take things too seriously. Adopting a more cheerful attitude will help you obtain cooperation. Avoid worrying about your future; you will receive more help than you expect. Postpone making a romantic commitment.

Glass scores seven as UMass edges Notre Dame

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

With 23 seconds left in regulation, Henry Stanziale broke a 9–9 tie to give the No. 14 Massachusetts mens' lacrosse team a 10–9 come from behind upset victory over No. 11 Notre Dame.

Stanziale took a feed from teammate Eric Bailey, rolled off his defender and broke in clean on Notre Dame goaltender Alex Cade and put home the winning goal.

The win helped UMass (5–3) keep in contention for a NCAA tournament bid. Another loss would have left them little or no shot at the tournament. That fact was not lost on Minutemen coach Greg Cannella.

"It's a big win versus No. 11 in the country. We win the game, and we are right back in the playoff picture," said the first–year coach. "If we lose, it probably hurts our chances a lot. It showed a lot of heart right there at the end."

Stanziale had replaced senior attacker Jeremy Murphy, who pulled his left hamstring early in the second quarter and played only sparingly afterwards. Cannella had been looking for Stanziale to step up, and the coach was especially happy that it was in a must–win game.

"He's an underclassman, splitting time right now trying to get into the starting lineup, and something like this could really get him going," Cannella said.

Not to be overlooked in the exciting finish was the play of sophomore Brendan Glass, who put the UMass offense on his shoulders as he tallied seven goals on the day, tying his career high. Glass scored every way he could, from cocking and unloading blasts from 30 feet, to shoveling in a loose ball that was bouncing just outside the crease.

While Stanziale and Glass were the offensive heros, this game was won on the defensive end. Senior defender Vinny Dello–Iacano held All–American Randy Colley to three goals, all of which came in the first 16 minutes of the contest. With help from occasional double teams when needed, Colley was a non–factor the rest of the way thanks to Dello–Iacano.

As Notre Dame turned elsewhere for offense in the final quarter in an attempt to put the game away, UMass goalie Tom LoPresti thwarted the Irish time and time again. The momentum turned in UMass' favor as LoPresti took control of the game himself.

Trailing 9–7 with just over 5:00 to play in regulation, Notre Dame's Tim Kearney took a pass from midfield and came in alone on the UMass netminder, but was robbed with a tremendous stick save. LoPresti got control of the ball and was unable to find an open teammate to pass to, so he proceeded to carry the ball all the way into the attacking zone and let go a shot. The shot missed, but All American Irish defender Mike Iorio hit LoPresti on the play, and was penalized, giving the Minutemen extra–man opportunity.

"He plays in a game like that and there's three minutes to go," Cannella said. "It would have taken an army to take him off the field."

His grit inspired his teammates, and five seconds after the penalty expired, Glass cashed In, as he grabbed a rebound that had come off the cross bar and put it by Cade to pull UMass within one.

Glass was not done, and with 1:37 left he knotted the game with a bouncer that found the top left corner as Cade had dropped to try and stop the shot that started low but ended up over his right shoulder.

Close game win gets monkey off UMass' back

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

With five minutes to go in regulation, the game seemed hauntingly familiar, as the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was down by two.

The Minutemen had been here before. For the fourth time this season Massachusetts trailed late in the game, this time it was 9–7 to the No. 11 Fighting Irish of Notre Dame. All three previous meetings has resulted in UMass losses, but with their playoff hopes hanging in the balance, the Minutemen couldn't afford another repeat performance.

Not ready to give up those dreams of its first post season play since 1993, Massachusetts roared back to defeat the Irish with 23 seconds left in the game.

The win, according to Tom LoPresti, marks the end of Massachusetts' difficulty in close games.

"Today is definitely a step," he said. "I said it down there in the huddle. I said "Listen guys, we were plagued with tight games. We haven't won the tight games. The plague is over. If there are any more tight games, we're going to win them from here."

"It helps to get the monkey off our back," said Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella. "The difference between last Saturday and today is that at the end of the game Tommy makes a big save."

In UMass' narrow defeat at the hands of Delaware, the Minutemen couldn't stop the Blue Hen offense, but yesterday, with the game on the line, Notre Dame couldn't score for the final 11:35 of the game.

In that stretch LoPresti was on top of his game in goal for Massachusetts. Despite suffering from a recurring injury that forced the senior goalie to hobble into and out of timeouts, LoPresti turned in one of his top performances of the year.

"I don't think I really started playing until the fourth quarter, with the game on the line," LoPresti said. "But that's when I feel I play best, under pressure."

While the Minutemen were pressing trying to cut into the lead, Tim Kearney snuck behind the Minutemen defense. He collected the clearing pass

Minutemen sweep Rutgers

■ UMass hitting and pitching impressive in three–game sweep

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Sometimes great pitching wins you ball games, and sometimes it's great hitting. This past weekend, the University of Massachusetts baseball team used both to sweep a three game series with Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers, 14–2, 4–2, and 10–3 at Earl Lorden Field.

The Minutemen (23–8, 15–3 A–10) who are now sitting firmly atop the league after drubbing the second place Scarlet Knights (21–23, 10–8), came out on fire in game one on Saturday, hitting seven home runs.

UMass started right away in the first. Back to back walks to Ryan Jette and second baseman Muchie Dagliere brought up designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo, who beat out a bunt for a base hit.

With the sacks full, right fielder Bill Knight, already the school's all time home run leader in his last game, promptly crushed the first offering from Scarlet Knights pitcher Corey Long (2–3) over the right field fence for a grand slam.

Before the inning was over, center fielder Nate Murphy had also smacked a solo shot, this one to right center. UMass added another run in the third off of righty Chris Checchetto, when third baseman Brad Gorrie blasted a solo homer to right to make it 6–0 Minutemen.

While the UMass bats were doing the job, senior Jay Murphy was holding the Rutgers batters in check. Murphy (5–2) scattered seven hits, while allowing two runs, and pitching his sixth consecutive complete game.

The Massachusetts offense did not stop in the fourth, Dagliere provided another highlight, when he went deep on the first pitch of the inning. His homerun, the freshman's first of the year, not only cleared the rightfield fence, but hit a little more than halfway up the wall of the Mullins Center practice rink.

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

Pitcher Chad Paronto was one of three Minuteman hurlers to pick up wins this weekend.

Ubaldo and Knight then drew back to back walks, and catcher Andy Pelis hit a line drive into the gap in right center off of new pitcher Mike Mundy. However, with no outs Massachusetts coach Mike Stone put the stop sign on Ubaldo at third, stopping Knight at second. Pelis, who was running hard, tried to stretch his hit to a double before he realized Knight was already on second base. During the ensuing run down, Ubaldo raced home for another run, and Pelis was finally tagged out heading back to first.

Nate Murphy picked up Knight when he hit his second homerun of the game to right center, and first baseman Justin Kelly made it back to back shots when he smacked a clinger to right.

With the score 11–0, Rutgers finally got on the board in the fifth, when Sal Aquino hit a pinch hit homer, but UMass countered in the bottom half, when Knight went deep for the second time in the game. The one was a three run shot, giving Knight seven RBI for the game.

In game two, sophomore Chad Paronto was not given as much run support, but got the job done anyway. The righthander, who improved his record to 4–2, limited Rutgers to a pair of runs on just two hits.

Daut wins two as UMass defeats HU

Minutewomen overcome weather, missing umpire in victories

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

It wasn't supposed to be windy and cold, and the umpire wasn't supposed to leave after only one inning of play.

But in UMass' doubleheader sweep over Northeast Region rival Hofstra on Saturday (2–1 and 4–3) the bizarre became the norm.

Hofstra	1

It all started in the bottom half of the first inning of the first game. Chris Martens was up for the Minutewomen and home plate umpire Jim Brooks was taking some heat from the Hofstra bench for calling balls that they thought they were strikes. Brooks yelled at Hofstra coach Bill Edwards to be quiet or he would be thrown out of the game; then on the next pitch, Brooks called a third strike on a questionable pitch. The UMass coaches then had some words for Brooks as they took the field. Brooks then left the field, causing both coaches to run after him. After it was apparent that he wasn't coming back, another umpire had to be called causing an hour–and–a–half delay.

When the game finally got underway again, great softball was played in cold and windy weather as both games ended with game winning hits.

In the first game, Martens drove in Tracey Osier with the winning run on a line drive single to right in the bottom of the seventh while in the second game freshman Kim Gutridge drove in Sam Cardenas with a deep drive to left– center field in the bottom of the tenth.

When the day had finally ended, it was almost 8 p.m.,and 17 innings of softball were played.

Senior hurler Kelly Daut (18–6) ended up picking up two victories on the day as she started and finished game one before coming in to relieve Dani Ortega in the sixth inning of the second tilt. In game one, Daut gave up just three hits while striking out nine but walking three. In her five innings of relief, Daut gave up two hits and struck out five. In the process, Daut lowered her earned run average to 0.94, a goal that she and assistant coach Mona Stevens had set out to accomplish.

Gutridge extended her hitting streak to 19 games with her 1–for–3 performance in game one and her 2–for–5 performance in game two. She also smacked two more doubles, one in each game, adding to her team–high total of 14. She is now the third leading hitter on the team with a .370 average (47–for–127).

Hofstra	3

In the second game, the Minutewomen tied it up at three in the bottom of the fifth. Osier led of the inning by beating out a grounder to the shortstop Diana Rose. She moved over to second on a sacrifice bunt by Sam Cardenas (2–for–3, one run scored) and then scored from second on a Kelly Buckley (2–for–5, one RBI) liner to left.

UMass had chances to end the game in the seventh and eighth innings. Heather Dorsey came up with the bases loaded and two outs in the seventh before popping up to center. In the eighth, the speedy Osier beat out a grounder to third and then reached second on a sacrifice bunt but Daut popped up, and after a intentional walk to Martens, Buckley grounded out.

In the bottom of the tenth, with two outs and Cardenas on second, Martens (2–for–2, one RBI) was intentionally walked again to bring up Buckley. The shortstop proceeded to smash a bullet up the middle that surely would have scored Cardenas except it hit Hofstra pitcher Stacy Jackson on the way. That loaded up the bases for the hot hitting Gutridge who nailed her long drive to left–center to win the game.

UMass' record improves to 27–14 while Hofstra drops to 21–14. The Minutewomen will be at Rhode Island tomorrow when they face the Rams to determine the Atlantic 10 Conference regular season champion.

Moise Tirado, the student commencement speaker for this year's graduation ceremony.

Haitian native selected to be student commencement speaker

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The student commencement speaker for the University of Massachusetts graduating class of 1995 has been planning the speech he will deliver since last summer, while working in his native Haiti with a human rights organization.

Moïse S. Tirado was selected by a seven–member committee made up of students and faculty, according to Robert N. Brooks, director of student affairs special services, who is responsible for undergraduate commencement.

Tirado, who is a triple–major in Afro–American studies, political science and social thought and political economy, entitled his speech "Our ship is sinking, what do we do? Do we bring it to safety or abandon it?"

As a native of Port–au–Prince, Haiti, Tirado moved to the United States in 1984, and settled in Dorchester, he said.

He has gone back and forth since leaving, and last summer he worked in his homeland to facilitate political asylum for compatriots.

His native tongue is Creole, which he described as "an African–based language," influenced by French, English and Spanish. He is also fluent in those three languages.

"My speech is a way to reflect on the things that I've learned here and for me to share it with my colleagues so that they may realize how important it is," he said.

"By naming us 'Generation X,' they are saying we don't stand for anything. 'X' is a simple variable. It is undefined. That means we are undefined. There's an assumption that we as a generation don't really care," Tirado said.

He said his generation is those who are in or graduating from college.

Tirado holds his Haitian descendence in high regard, and he said "it is my life."

"Being Haitian defines who I am and It makes me proud," he said, in pointing out that the population of Haiti is six million people. "I come from a rich history. Haiti was the first Black republic in the Western Hemisphere. I come from the first country which ended slavery by defeating the most powerful military nation in the world."

Napoleon and France were defeated in 1804, when Haitian independence was established.

Tirado said approximately half of the 602 enrolled students UMass considers "Black, Non–Hispanic" are of Haitian descent.

He wondered why he is often considered African American.

He said his country is in the Caribbean Sea, but because he is Black, a connection is drawn.

He described his experience at UMass as "good and bad.

"I've met a lot of people ... and it has made me think an awful lot about this country and what we as students and young people can accomplish," Tirado said.

"Being at UMass has made me realize our potential as people from different parts of the world. Being In this environment forces us to learn new things about ourselves and each other, while unlearning stereotypes."

"[UMass] has put me in touch with people who refuse to change and to hold on to stereotypes and create division," he said.

"My speech is about our potentials, what we are capable of doing as citizens of the world, and how it is important for us to recognize that it is a duty to change our own societies."

Vice chancellors will assume new positions

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts vice chancellors will be assuming new positions this summer, one out–of–state and one here at the University.

Keith Williams, associate vice chancellor for University Relations at UMass, announced he will be leaving at the end of the semester to return to Michigan State University where he will act as executive director of the MSU Alumni Association.

"I flew to Michigan State planning to say I was not interested, but when I got there it was very difficult for me to refuse," Williams said.

He assumed his associate vice chancellor position in January 1995.

As associate vice chancellor, he oversees University relations, publications, photographic services and the alumni magazine, Williams said.

Acting as a spokesman for the 400,000 MSU alumni is part of the new job, and Williams said he will be reporting directly to the university's president.

"I was quite distressed at the prospect of his leaving," said Chancellor David K. Scott. "Keith has made a real impact here at the University."

Williams new post marks his return to the MSU alumni association. Before coming to UMass, he the position of assistant director in the organization.He worked with Scott who was provost there, the chancellor said.

Deputy chancellor to stay

Marcellette Williams, who holds the position of deputy chancellor here at the University, will be staying here at UMass and has no plans to leave, she said.

"I tend to think of the world as a home with lots of rooms," she said. "We will be in the same house but in different rooms."

The Williams had both worked at MSU previous to their arrival at UMass 15 months ago. Marcie Williams held various teaching and consulting positions at MSU which made frequent travel to Europe and Asia commonplace, she said.

Keith Williams received his bachelor's and master's degrees in French from MSU.

He taught French and held a series of administrative positions there.

"I have appreciated the talent of the staff I worked with and the welcome extended to me by the campus community and the community at large," Williams said. "It has been a good experience for me."

> "I have appreciated the talent of the staff I worked with and the welcome extended to me by the campus community and the community at large. It has been a good experience for me."
> —Keith Williams

Story steps down

Ron Story will step down as Interim vice chancellor for university advancement. He took the position at Scott's request in the spring of 1994.

A history professor at the University since 1972, Story acted as vice president for academic affairs from 1992 to 1994.

He said he plans to return to teaching history this fall.

"He took the interim administration position always with the intention of going back to the history department as a professor," said his wife, Ellen Story. "which is what he always wanted to be."

Search for clues and victims still ongoing in Okla.

By Christopher Sullivan
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — On a day when the White House suggested the death toll could surpass 200, a tiny victim of the federal building bombing was buried amid hearts and teddy bears. And the search for her murderers pressed on.

One–year–old Baylee Almon — the infant who, photographed in a fireman's arms, broke hearts around the world — was the first of the 80 victims recovered so far to be laid to rest. "Baylee is in God's hands," the Rev. Charles McDade said at her funeral Monday. As suspect Timothy McVeigh sat in jail, his lawyers sought to pull out of the case. One of the lawyers said he doubted anyone in Oklahoma City could give him a fair hearing.

Rescuers working as darkness fell located perhaps eight more bodies, said Assistant Fire Chief Jon Hansen. But he estimated rescuers would have to remove about 300 tons of debris to free them.

The hunt for a so–far–unidentified second suspect remained investigators' top focus. The FBI said an Army deserter questioned Sunday had no part in the attack, then continued to follow leads across the country. As debris was hauled out by searchers, agents combed it for clues.

The search for the missing resumed in the tomb of pulverized concrete and broken pipes, with special precautions taken to ensure workers' health against infection from decaying bodies.

Searchers once again failed to reach the day care and Social Security areas of the building. They used chainsaws and jackhammers to whittle away at a three–story high pile of rubble pancaked on those areas, but said they wouldn't get there until Tuesday. Among the bodies found Monday was that of a Marine, still in uniform at his recruiting desk in the rubble. The Pentagon identified him as Capt. Randolph Guzman, 28, of Castro Valley, Calif.

Reporters allowed inside for the first time saw search dogs gingerly creeping and helmeted workers crawling into spaces braced with four–by–fours like a mineshaft.

Feminist speakers examine economics

By Michelle Hillman
Collegian Correspondent

On the second day of the two day Marxism and the politics of anti–essentialism conference, Cecilia Rio, Ulla Grapard and Suzanne Bergeron spoke about "Acts of Exclusion: Feminists Examine Economics."

The first to speak was Rio, from the department of economics at the University of Massachusetts. Her paper entitled You Can't Have Your Cake and Eat It Too addressed issues dealing with women's equality.

"The key to women's equality is full integration into the labor market," Rio said. "Men leave marriages rather than adjust to the increase of power that women are acquiring," she added.

Grapard, from the department of economics at Colgate University, read from her paper A Picture is Worth a Thousand Words.

In this presentation she criticized textbooks for their narrative cartoons and diagrams which "try to make reading more enjoyable."

Ulla said these "words, sentences, connotations, do not teach material, but something else."

In order for these images to work there must be a shared understanding and knowledge of the context of the illustrations. An example she used was a shopper with tomatoes, peppers and lemons in her basket which represented the italian flag to certain groups of people.

She handed out several photocopies for which she "devised titles" for several of the cartoons found in such publications as the New Yorker.

One was the "post industrial society," a cartoon which features two men, one describing how the machinery works to the other stating "it calculates these and then the Council to discuss benefits for domestic partnerships; move condemned by church

In a meeting tonight, the Northampton City Council will discuss the extension of domestic partnership benefits to city employees.

The meeting is open to the public and will begin at 7 p.m. in City Council Chambers in the Municipal Buildlng in Northampton.

The issue is one of several items on the agenda, and is expected to come under pressure by several citizen groups, including the Catholic clergy of the Greater Northampton Area.

Last weekend's Daily Hampshire Gazette printed a half– page paid advertisement by seven priests who oppose the extension of domestic partnership benefits to city employees.

"This legislation ... undermines the institutions of marriage and family, the basic cells and foundation of a vital and healthy society," read the letter, in part.

The letter made reference to a 1991 statement by the Massachusetts Catholic Conference that domestic partnership legislation should be opposed because it poses a threat to "true families."

By extending domestic partnership benefits to city employees, the city of Northampton would allow gay and lesbian employees the same benefits already available to heterosexual couples who are legally able to marry.

Such benefits include health insurance and bereavement leave.

Artist to receive honorary degree

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is presenting an honorary degree this afternoon to an internationally acclaimed artist.

Chuck Close, a photo–realist painter who has had his work exhibited all over the United States and Europe, will receive an honorary doctorate of Fine Arts at the Fine Arts Center concert hall at 3 p.m.

Close, who taught painting at UMass in the 1960s, suffered blockage in a spinal artery which left him paralyzed from the neck down in 1989.

In 1991, the Museum of Modern Art in New York invited Close to curate an exhibition from their permanent collection, "Artist's Choice — Chuck Close: Head On/The Modern Portrait."

Close does paintings of mug shot–like portraits. He repaints them in a grid format, and gives the viewer the illusion that they are looking at a person behind a textured, glass window.

He has painted these type of portraits of himself, his friends and family for 30 years.

Close will have his works on display in a retrospective exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art In New York in a couple of years.

Close receive his Masters of Fine Arts degree from Yale University in 1964, and went on to spend a year in Vienna on a Fulbright Scholarship. After two years at UMass, he move to New York and has worked there ever since.

Following the convocation ceremony, there will be reception at the University Gallery, where some of Close's works will be exhibited.

Both events are free and open to the public.

The function of this cartoon and others she analyzed were to "integrate and reassure humanity through culture codes that exclude females."

The last speaker was Bergeron, an economics professor at Ohio Northern University. She examined the book Mating, by Norman Rush.

The book, the winner of the 1991 Book Award, was written about a 32-year-old woman through a man's voice. In this story men were barred from owning land and women had simple houses with small plots of land.

Bergeron said "[Rush] thinks women would move more efficiently than men if left alone." The novel puts women on an island where they may reach their "untapped potential" if the gender roles were reversed.

Bergeron read the book like she would an economics text and found that Rush's island served as a place to empower women rather than put them in the "private sphere."

She stated that many of the books written from the '50s to the '70s concentrate on women "being passive and dependent."

The three speakers used economics to examine ways which women are undermined through advertisements, text and the workplace.

New health services for GLBT community

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender students who want to learn about health and wellness-related resources at the University of Massachusetts will have their opportunity at a forum to be held tonight at 7 p.m.

The forum will begin with a meeting of the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance and move on to presentations by several University groups and agencies, including Health Education, the Program for GLB Concerns, and Mental Health Services.

"We want it to be an interactive session to provide GLBT students with an idea of the services and resources available to them on campus," said Paul Entis, outreach coordinator for Health Education.

There will also be representatives from the Everywoman's Center, Dean of Students Office, CASIAC and the 2 in 20 Floor for GLBT Students and Their Heterosexual Allies

Besides finding out what the University already offers, students will be encouraged to speak out and express their needs and concerns, said Entis.

Anonymous surveys will be distributed among forum participants to find out how the University can better serve GLBT students.

At the conclusion of the meeting, there will be time for students to talk with University representatives in a more informal setting.

The forum is the result of collaboration between Health Education and several other University groups and agencies, said Entis. Sponsors include Health Education, the Program for GLB Concerns, the Chancellor's Task Force on GLBT Matters, and the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance.

The third annual Haigis Hoopla was held this weekend, featuring more than 350 players and close to 820 games.

Fifth annual hoop tournament draws players, fans to Valley

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 7,000 spectators flooded the center of campus this past weekend for the fifth annual Haigis Hoopla three-on-three basketball tournament.

The tournament, run by a sports event management class, and supervised by professor Mark McDonald, was held at Haigis Mall as well at a parking lot adjacent to Robsham Visitors Center.

"The biggest advantage of working Haigis is the opportunity to learn how to run an event successfully," said Jon Blumenthal, a junior sports management major.

Half of the proceeds from the tournament go toward an undergraduate sports management scholarship, McDonald said. The other half is split between providing better equipment and resources for sports management majors and donating money to the Red Cross disaster relief fund.

This year's competition featured 350 teams which played a total of 820 games over the weekend.

The event drew competitors from New York to Maine, although the bulk of players came from the Pioneer Valley, McDonald said.

Karl Ravech, an anchor for ESPN's "SportsCenter," was in attendance as a celebrity presence. He attended as an act of good will, he said. Ravech's brother and father are both alumni of the University.

Each division represented a different skill level. The divisions ranged from Couch Potato and Weekend Warrior to Hot Shot and Top Gun.

There were prizes for the winners in each division. The winners of the Top Gun class for both genders received a Spalding engraved basketball.

There were also contests and prizes unaffiliated with the tournament itself. For instance, GMC had a "shoot for the best" competition which featured a chance to win a GMC Jimmy. The Ski Inn raffled off a Cannondale mountain bike. Gatorade, USAir and Spalding also had contests.

"The students gain practical experience and create something to benefit the community," McDonald said.

Braintree Big Bird attackers charged in beating

BRAINTREE (AP) — The five alleged attackers of a man who had played Big Bird at a 4-year-old girl's birthday party might just as easily have killed him — and for no reason — according to the town's police chief.

"If he went down to the ground, there were two or three individuals there that just would have kept hitting him and it wouldn't have fazed them at all if he had been killed," said Braintree Police Chief Paul Frazier.

Four of the youths, aged 17 to 20, were arraigned Monday on charges that they punched and kicked Wayne Quinn, 26, and hit Quinn with a baseball bat. The fifth suspect, a 16-year-old, was to be arraigned on Tuesday.

Quinn had been entertaining at a birthday party dressed as the "Sesame Street" character Big Bird. His attack after the party was videotaped by the parents of the birthday girl.

"The impact of listening to that tape, listening to the bat striking the individual, was just devastating," said Frazier. "You can hear the punches landing and then you can hear two blows from the baseball bat."

The incident was similar to the fatal attack on a stranger by six youths in the neighboring town of Rockland. An 18-year-old was sentenced to life in prison earlier this month in that killing, which followed a spree of attacks by the group all over town. Quinn said his attackers also seemed to egg each other on.

"Once one of them started throwing punches, it did seem to be the pack mentality," he said Monday. "It's like they weren't worried about any danger to themselves because they had somebody so greatly outnumbered."

Quinn, who is 6-foot-6, had been asked by a friend at a balloon delivery company to portray Big Bird at the birthday party in an elementary school Saturday.

When Quinn arrived in his costume, five youths hanging out across the street yelled obscenities at him, police said.

A New Loan Program For Students And Parents

The University is pleased to announce that we have been selected by the U.S. Department of Education to participate in the new William D. Ford Direct Loan Program beginning in the 1995-96 academic year. This program provide a new way for students and parents. Under this program, the federal government will provide loan funds directly to the University to award to students and parents, thus eliminating the need for obtaining loans through banks.

How Students Apply For And Receive A Direct Loan

- Complete a Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA).
- The UMASS Financial Aid Office will evaluate your FAFSA and send you an award notice. Once you accept the award, we will mail you a Direct Loan Promissory Note to complete and return. Your Direct Loan will then be credited to your student account in the Bursar's Office.

How Parents Apply For And Receive A Direct Plus Loan

For the Federal Direct Parent Loan for dependent students, the parent borrower need only:

- Complete a FAFSA with their son or daugter
- Complete a UMASS PLUS Pre-application
- Pass a credit check
- Complete a promissory note
- Loan proceeds will then be credited directly to the student's account each semester.

The Benefits Of Direct Loans

- Reduces the time required to receive loan funds from an average of 4 months to 4 weeks!
- Eliminates the need for outside lenders (banks) and loan guarantee agencies.
- Eliminates the need for loan checks.
- Delivers loan funds to students more efficiently.
- The interest rate is no greater than 8.25% for Direct Student Loans and 9.00% for Direct Parent Loans.
- Loan fees are reduced from a maximum of 8% to 4 %.
- The same annual loan limits apply to the new Direct Loans as with prior Stafford and PLUS loans.
- Your Direct Student Loan will never be sold to another lender.

More Benefits Once Students Begin Repaying Their Loans

There will be a variety of repayment plans that will be sensitive to your ability to repay these loans. These options include:

- A standard repayment plan (10 years)
- An extended repayment plan (up to 25 years)
- A graduated repayment plan
- An income-contingent repayment plan

You will have the option to consolidate all of your current federal loans into one Federal Direct Loan and make only one payment to one place for all loans. This repayment option is available before repayment begins.

Opinion/Editorial

Saving civil liberties

The bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building in Oklahoma City has led many people to wonder how something like this could happen on American soil. As the dust settles, we find ourselves looking for ways to prevent the terrorism we have seen ravage the rest of the world from taking a foothold at home.

Senate majority leader Bob Dole, is ready to work with President Bill Clinton "to pass the toughest and most effective anti-terrorist bill at the earliest possible time."

The proposed Omnibus Counterterrorism Act would allow the government to deport aliens who make contributions to organizations deemed "terrorist." On Sunday, Clinton announced his intention to secure new powers to track suspected terrorists, proposing tough new measures that would give the FBI easier access to credit, hotel and travel records.

Clinton is also seeking financing that would require phone companies to make it easier to obtain court-ordered wiretaps of new digital computer lines, which are more difficult to tap than regular phone lines.

While swift apprehension in the Oklahoma bombing is in the nation's best interests, anti-terrorism bills rushed through Congress could do more to undermine America's strength than could these acts of violence. We cannot let terrorism destroy the liberties we work so hard to secure.

The public's hasty assumption that the bombing was orchestrated by Middle Eastern terrorists, echoed by the journalists in Oklahoma City, was simply a denial that such atrocities are beyond Americans.

But the inevitable fact is that the perpetrators are not Middle Easterners. They are not on the outcast fringes of society. The people who have left many dead and injured are not people from whom we can safely distance ourselves. They are Americans.

Seeing a federal building devastated by a car bomb is evidence that terrorism laws should be reviewed and possibly strengthened. But the powers that be must understand that by targeting an enemy within our borders, by waging a war on domestic terrorism, our cherished freedom might not be the only casualty.

Losing human touch

Arthur Stapleton, Jr.

"What's your e-mail address?" Elaine asked.

"I don't have one," I said.

"You don't have an e-mail address?"

"Uh, no — I have a telephone or a mailing address, but I don't have an e-mail address," I replied.

Such was the conversation I had at a recent conference I attended. People exchanged internet and e-mail addresses quicker than they knew each other's first names.

I however, wrote out my name and address because I don't have an e-mail address, and I doubt I ever will. This isn't because I'm a techno-phobe, I have plenty of computer experience with Macs and IBMs, but because as a means of communication, e-mail is too impersonal.

I would much rather speak to someone on the phone or in person where the inflections and nuances of my voice can be heard. People remember a voice, a face, a gesture, much more than they do an e-mail message.

What about good old fashioned letters? The little things are what make a letter personable. The stationary and the text are what make it seem like you're holding a little piece of the person who wrote it in your hand.

If it's written on flowery, pink note paper, doused in perfume, and hand written in big scrawly script, then it's probably from your admirer.

If it's computer-printed on form-feed white paper, it's probably a bill-collector.

If it's typed on good laid bond, has a masthead, and is offering you a job it's probably a job offer.

If it's written on a page of notebook paper, scrawled rather quickly, and in three different colors of ink, it's probably your best friend.

If it's a birthday card and it's got a big fat check, it's definitely from a grandparent.

The best part about getting letters is the fact that everyone is excited to get mail — except bills. Think about going to the mailbox, looking through all the mail, and finding something addressed to you.

I always get excited and look at the handwriting to see who it is, if I can't figure it out then I look at the postmark and try to guess from that. Then I get my letter opener and open the letter. I will save the letter to read later if I know I don't have the time to sit down and savor every bit of information.

With e-mail, all you get is the cold black and green screen of your monitor and the occasional emotion. :) or :(or :|. It certainly doesn't feel like your best friend is sitting right there next to you.

Morni E. Helfner

Of course, people claim to meet the love of their lives over the Internet — like my friend Alvin. He says he met this wonderful woman from Rider College, whose name is Nella. He's never met her, but at least he has spoken to her over the telephone and knows it's a real woman. My friend Cliff, who lives in Albuquerque, thought he too had met the woman of his dreams — she turned out to be two 13-year- old boys from Great Falls, Montana.

This past weekend, I went out and dropped a 20 on some more stationary and a new stamp of Piglet. It was one of the most satisfying purchases in my life — it's as if I got a new piece of clothing or a new identity to wear.

Writing letters back is perhaps more enjoyable than sending them. My friend Maria had been having a bad time in her life, and she had sent me a card to say hello. I read the card, and promptly sent her back an eight page "fractured fairy-tale" all about her life and our friends. When I spoke with her the other day, she said the story made her laugh and it had brightened her day over the past few troubled weeks.

That's what makes letter writing real; the opportunity to present yourself in a way that touches people — sometimes even more than being there yourself.

The Internet and e-mail may be a way to contact others quickly and cheaply, but it takes away the timelessness of hand-written letters.

And most importantly, it takes you away from the reader.

Finding love at first talk on the 'Net

Candice Flemming

I used to believe in love at first sight. Now, I believe in love without sight.

Two weeks ago, someone came into my life and really made me smile. She's a perfect fit for me, and so far, she's everything I've always wanted in a soulmate. There's one problem, though — I don't know what she looks like.

We met on the Internet, and since then, the two of us have spoken on the phone until the wee hours of the morning, had heart-to-heart conversations about things from pistachio nuts to pickles, and I can't stop thinking about her.

Friends of mine have been getting on my case, asking me how I can fall for someone without even seeing a picture of her. I laughed at first, but then became annoyed when the questions kept popping up. How shallow, I thought.

I love her personality. Yep, I said it. For all of the times I have heard, "Oh, she has a great personality," and thought, "Uh, oh, what's wrong with her," forgetta-boutit. I've been proven wrong.

The sound of her voice makes me nervous, and the thought of her sends my heart racing. When I talk about this woman, it usually takes about 30 seconds for my face to turn bright red. I'm not into that CyberSex stuff. Despite what people think, not all guys on the 'Net are looking for sex.

Jenny Jones had a show on a few weeks ago about those who met on the Internet and fell in love with each other without ever seeing one another. Hey, I thought it was ridiculous. And, well, it was — to viewers who had never experienced it. These people had an idea about what their "friends" looked like, and weren't surprised one bit when they finally met.

Yeah, I'm curious to see her. However, if you ask me if I'm worried about seeing her and losing interest, I'll honestly tell you no. It's been tough defending a "computer girlfriend," as some people have labelled her.

In third grade, you have pen pals. In college, you have correspondences with friends in other countries, in the military or at other schools. For every person who doubts what I say, I can tell you stories that I've heard. People who have met their mate on the computer, others who have fallen in admiration through love letters. A friend of mine told me a story of a man in the Army who finally got a chance to meet his mate in person. She told the man she'd hold a rose so he could recognize her, and their encounter would take place under a certain street lamp. When the guy approached, he saw an overweight, unattractive woman, holding a rose and smiling.

Despite what some may think, he did not run away. He stayed and hugged her, hoping to restart their relationship.

That's when his true love came out from behind the building, holding a rose. She relieved her friend, who stepped in for the purpose of a test. He passed, and they lived happily ever after.

So now I take my test on Friday in Philadelphia. Hey, I'm the one bringing the roses, and I don't plan on failing any tests this week. I can't afford to — I need to graduate.

Images frozen in time

I still find myself trapped between sadness and disbelief, when I see the image of the demolished building.

E.C. Thomas

My parents always told me they would never forget where they were the moment they learned President John F. Kennedy had been assassinated. The way they described it was as if they had been frozen in time. Their eyes would glaze over as if looking through a peep hole to an alternative reality. It wasn't until the space shuttle Challenger blew up that I began to understand what they meant. And now, after the terrorist attack in Oklahoma City last week, the full meaning of being frozen in time has hit home.

I still find myself trapped between sadness and disbelief, when I see the image of the demolished building. The idea that hundreds of bodies are still buried in the mess of concrete, wiring and insulation — the idea that a federal building is now the sight of a graveyard — is at the same time frightening and unreal.

Our house found itself in an intense discussion with our neighbors about the explosion, over beer at the kitchen table. It was a quietly emotional conversation that sought some sort of logic to the madness. We were all trying to make sense out of it, which was impossible on one level — and on another realistic, when you thought about the state of the world today. I suppose we finally found solace in the fact that none of us could truly comprehend the whys of the world. Still, I found it rather odd that this small group of college-age Amherst residents were bonding over an event so faraway from them.

It struck me later that our little bonding session was a small part of a big picture. Groupings all over the country were talking about Oklahoma City — at kitchen tables or diner counters, or park benches or over cocktails in the living room. In the last few days our nation had come together in thought and prayer for the people of Oklahoma City.

This past Sunday was designated a national day of mourning for the victims of Wednesday's tragedy. Everyone from basketball players to politicians; from churches to synagogues; from big cities to small farm communities joined together in a spiritual bond of sadness and sympathy.

The idea of virtually an entire nation coming together for the sake of supporting its fellow citizens paralyzed from fear and grief is incredibly beautiful. It gives me more faith in the idea that the good in the world will triumph over the evil. It also shows that it is not a completely unrealistic idea to think our nation could come together, crossing racial and religious lines, to achieve an ultimate good.

And then I read an article that interrupted my chain of thought on harmony. It seemingly politicized the bombing in Oklahoma City by comparing it to our activities in the Middle East. The tone of the piece spoke to me like that of a self-righteous preacher spitting out damnations for our sins. It was almost as if the writer was saying we deserved what we got, we were being given our proper punishment. Maybe now we would understand the ways of the world we are so quick to command.

The idea of an author turning hundreds of innocent citizens into symbols for a political agenda offended me — isn't that exactly what the terrorists did? I kept picturing the parents who had just lost a child reading the piece. Would the author have spoken the same words if he knew they were listening?

After reading the article, I sat around on the evening news. The father of a child, now clinging to life by threads of medicine and prayer, was being interviewed by a reporter. The reporter asked how he felt about the men who had recently been arrested. "I don't have the energy or time to be angry and vengeful," he said softly. "I have a son lying upstairs who I need to focus all my attention on."

How ironic. I thought to myself. 'A father whose son could die, doesn't have time to be angry. Instead he has chosen to focus his energy on love and faith to help his son. And yet a random author has the time and energy to be angry at the whole of society.' I wonder who the author thought he was helping?

The joys of Mountain Dew

Candice Flemming

I love Mountain Dew.

No, let me rephrase that. I'm addicted to Mountain Dew.

Not a day goes by that I don't yearn for the delicious taste of that sweet yellow-green liquid.

On an average day, I drink at least six or seven cans. On an extra stressful day, that number increases to around 10 or 12. Those extra stressful days come often, so basically, I have a can of Dew in my hand a lot — like now, actually.

Ever since this campus switched from Coke machines to Pepsi machines, I thought I would have no problems getting my daily fix of Dew. There are the times when I walk with excitement towards the nearest soda machine in the Campus Center, with my 75 cents in hand, and when I get there I see that little annoying orange light that indicates to me that yet again, this damn machine is out of my precious Dew. From there I walk to the next nearest machine hoping not to find that damn orange light again. But to my dismay, there it is. By the time I get to all six of the Pepsi machines in the Campus Center-Student Union area, I am still without it. Six damn machines and no Mountain Dew. It's just ridiculous.

Then there are other times when I go to the machine with a nice crispy dollar and when I try to put it in the dollar slot, it comes right back out. I try this many times before I have a fit and sprint toward the change machine, only to see that same light on the change machine.

Another occasion that I really enjoy is when I put my money in the machine and press that lovely Mountain Dew button only to find that nothing is coming out. I push it again and again, but still nothing comes out. So I push the change return lever over and over, but that isn't working either. No change is coming out. At this point, I am livid. And when I push the Pepsi button, let's say, what happens? A Pepsi can comes out. Who wants a Pepsi when they can have a Dew? But in this case, I guess I can't have a Dew.

Lately, I've had success getting my favorite drink. But I know that sooner or later, the troubles will begin again. It's really stupid to think that there are six Pepsi machines around the Student Union-Campus Center area and some days there is no Mountain Dew in any of them.

Does drinking so much Dew affect me? Well, I'll let my friend Emily give you that answer. Here ya go, Marino.

Marino: I can always tell when Candice has just had a Mountain Dew. Her voice, which is not normally what you would call soft, increases by a few decibels. Her eyes are alert (almost spiral-like, really) and she can hardly stand still. If she tries to give you a high five and you leave her hanging, her hand, suspended in mid-air, shakes.

She also likes to recite one of her favorite commercials; an anti-drug ad from a few years back. When Candice has just finished drinking her beloved Dew, she can be seen running around the newsroom yelling, "WHO TAUGHT YOU HOW TO DO THAT STUFF?" Maybe she just likes the fact the word "do" could be mistaken for "dew."

My parting words should be heeded by all. If you see a woman shaking one of the Pepsi machines on the concourse that has a little orange light on next to the Mountain Dew button, just walk away and let Candice get over it.

Flemming: Thanks, Em. But the truth is, when that happens, I can't get over it. I need my Dew. So if you do see me having problems at a machine, please help me out. I'll be forever grateful, I might even buy you a Dew, only if it's not the last one.

All of you Mountain Dew drinkers out there can relate. You know how big of a problem it is trying to get a Dew around here. You know how ridiculous the Pepsi machines are around here. I think we should all get together the next time there is no Dew in any of the six machines and storm the place that is supposed to fill up the machines. Just give me a minute to finish this last can.

Turkey attacks South Kurdistan

U.S. supports Turkish assault

PKK fights back

By the Maoist Internationalist Movement
Special to the Collegian

News Analysis

On March 20, more than 50,000 Turkish troops invaded South Kurdistan (northern Iraq) in a desperate attempt to strike at the Kurdish national liberation movement (ARGK). The troops have principally targeted the civilian population, bombing and forcibly evacuating villages — sometimes taking the inhabitants back to camps in Turkey. Although the United States and the United Nations have cautioned Turkey against "excesses," both have given support to the invasion in word and deed.

Guerrillas outmaneuver army

The invasion did not surprise guerrillas led by the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK)(1), who had been observing Turkish troop movements in the area. The Turkish government claims to be having great success with the operation, but the guerrillas say that the invading Turkish forces have suffered heavy losses because they are unfamiliar with the terrain and they cannot cope with the guerrillas 'hit and run tactics.' The guerrillas mobility has also reduced the effectiveness of Turkish ground-support aircraft.(2)

ARGK says: "Unlike the 'good' news which is emanating from Ankara, the Turkish soldiers are unable to fight a guerrilla war. Many of the soldiers are displaying clumsy behaviour. They are still doing what they are best at: killing Kurdish civilians and telling the world that these are 'terrorists.'"(3) The Turkish Army claims to have killed more than 1800 guerrillas; the ARGK says less than 20 guerrillas have died in the struggle so far.(4)

The Turkish Army has been unable to defeat the guerrillas directly, and has adopted the strategy of "draining the pool to kill the fish" — that is, attacking the civilian population and destroying natural resources in order to remove the guerrillas' support. (See MIM Notes 95, December 1994, for a report on Turkey's infamous "Operation Rome.") The Turkish army has burned more than 30,000,000 acres of forest and destroyed more than 2,000 villages in the past several years.(5)

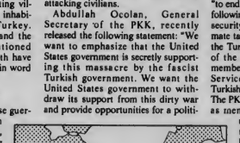
U.S. complicity

The United States and the United Nations gave their explicit OK to Turkey's invasion of northern Iraq. U.N. planes, which flew every day before the invasion, were grounded in order to get out of the way of the Turkish Air Force.

The United States has been directly involved in northern Iraq since the Gulf War — ostensibly to ensure the rights of the Kurds who live there. But it has merely wagged its finger at its Turkish ally for implementing genocide. The United States fully supports Turkey's war against the "terrorist" PKK. It gave its support to the recent invasion as long as the invasion was focused only on the PKK — knowing full well that the Turkish army attacks the PKK by attacking civilians.

Abdullah Ocalan, General Secretary of the PKK, recently released the following statement: "We want to emphasize that the United States government is secretly supporting this massacre by the fascist Turkish government. We want the United States government to withdraw its support from this dirty war and provide opportunities for a political solution to this problem. It is incumbent on the part of the mass media to bring out the truth behind these developments. These are the facts; the news that is emanating from the Turkish army does not dove-tail with our observations. The occupation forces have not targeted our areas. The members of the Turkish armed forces have entered Zaxo, a city of civilians and Kurdish peshmergas. They have also surrounded the camps of Kurds who had fled Turkish state terror back in Turkey. These people are being terrorized. Those who are saying 'the operation is limited in scope and will not harm civilians' are misleading. These are double standards."(6)

The United States has mouthed pretty phrases about protecting the Kurds in northern Iraq for some time (e.g. "Operation Provide Hope," "Operation Provide Comfort," etc.) while winking at Turkey's genocide of the Kurds living within its borders. The U.S. only cares for the Kurdish people when they are available for use as political pawns.



"Long-term guerrilla war" advances

The ARGK currently controls 70-80 percent of North Kurdistan.(7) In March, the European representative of the National Liberation Front of Kurdistan (ERNK) said that "the war being waged in Kurdistan has reached the stage of the seizure of power."(8) Turkish fascists and American imperialists make a lot of hollow noise about the PKK terrorizing people into following them, but the Maoist Internationalist Movement (MIM) sees that the PKK-guerrillas' tactics depend on the active support of the people.

The PKK has made it explicitly clear which individuals are military targets: "to end any doubt, the PKK regards the following groups as part of the Turkish security forces and, therefore, legitimate targets for attacks: a. members of the Turkish armed forces; b. members of the Turkish contra-guerrillas; c. members of the Turkish Intelligence Service (MIT); d. members of the Turkish gendarmerie; e. village guards. The PKK does not regard civil servants as members of the security forces, unless they come within one of the above categories."(9) The PKK recently offered an amnesty to village guards (villagers impressed by the Turkish army to fight the PKK), asking that they lay down their arms and refuse to fight.(10)

The PKK's strategy of "long-term guerrilla war" seems to have much in common with Mao's "protracted People's War." The PKK's strategy emphasizes self-reliance and fighting winnable battles (using hit-and-run tactics, for example). More importantly, PKK-guerrillas spend much of their time studying and teaching politics, and undertaking painstaking mass work.

After anti-Turkey, pro-guerrilla demonstrations broke out in South Kurdistan, a guerrilla noted: "This is exactly what we wanted to happen, to win the hearts and support of the Kurds of South Kurdistan. What we wanted to do was taking us time, but the Turkish invasion acting like a catalyst, proved to the compatriots that salvation was through armed struggle and that what we offered surpassed other alternatives."(11)

Victim of a trigger happy American

Syed Raza

It is midnight and we arrive at Saddam International Airport, Baghdad, the seat of the Abbasid Caliphate centuries ago. Baghdad is still the city of life even under the dictator Saddam. As we leave the customs at the airport, my father persuades a taxi driver to take us to a small village just east of Kerbala. After a lengthy argument over the fare the driver agrees to drive us to Kerbala.

Two and a half hours later I see the Minarets of the shrine of Imam Hussien, the sight of absolute glory for the sky is filled with stars and slightly lit, signaling towards the dawn that waits. The driver drops us at the taxi stand of Kerbala, where my uncle, Qasim Rida and his son Basim Rida wait to pick us up. Greetings are exchanged as I meet my relatives after a year. Uncle Qasim asks us to get in the car since our aunt awaits us.

Five minutes later we arrive at the house of my uncle, by now dawn is just minutes away and we drop my mother and sister at uncle Qasim's house and then go back to Kerbala to pray at the Haram (shrine of the Imam). This is the best part, for after a year I am back with the only person whom I treat as a brother, my cousin Basim.

I was born in Pakistan and spent much of my life there, away from my fatherland Iraq. Being the only son of my family I was always pampered and provided with almost everything that money could buy, but I always wished that I had an elder brother. In my cousin Basim I found the elder brother whom I had always wanted, and that is why I loved to be with him.

After the fajr prayers we went back and enjoyed the breakfast prepared by aunty Fatima. I spent the rest of the day sleeping in my room. I woke up just in time for dinner, Quzi ala Timan (lamb with rice), my aunt had cooked it especially for me because she knew I loved it. After the dinner the men sat down in the garden to talk while the women went to the TV lounge, obviously to gossip! While Basim and I sneaked out for a Sumer (Iraqi cigarette), Basim walked for a while and then sat down under a date palm by the stream. We double-checked to make sure that we were well out of sight and then Basim took out the blue box of Sumer, a smile came on my face and I said " those are the best." Basim replied " of course, they are Iraqi!"

I loved the way in which Basim used to pretend as if he were the "Marlboro Man" and light the cigarettes; needless to say I worshipped him. The desert air was pleasant and a gentle breeze blew, cooling us as it flowed over the stream. Night was setting over Kerbala and we could see the lights of the Haram from our "smoking place." Never have I ever seen so many stars, it seemed as if all of them had come to Kerbala to light up the sky. There is a saying in Kerbala that all the stars in the world come to salute the Shaheed-i- Kerbala (Imam Hussein, the Martyr of Kerbala) on the Tenth of Muharrum and that when a star dies it joins the Shuhada-i-Kerbala (Martyrs of Kerbala) in Heaven.

As we smoked we discussed a lot of things. We discussed the girls we were going to marry, he told me about how much he loved this girl Jamila and how he would one day marry her. He told me that he would tell stories about our friendship to my children, how my sons and daughters would marry his daughters and sons. We laughed about how we would grow old and still come and smoke Sumer under the palm tree. We even carved on the bark of the date palm that Ali Reza and Basim Rida are brothers for life.

During my month long stay in Iraq we went to our smoking place every-day, and talked about everything after all we were brothers. Then came the day when we were all packed up to leave for Karachi, I said goodbye to my brother, Basim, and promised to bring him cigarettes from Pakistan; little did I know that it was the last time I would see him.

A year later Saddam invaded Kuwait and because of the crisis that followed we were unable to go to Iraq for our vacation. Months passed and we didn't hear from uncle Qasim, when the "war" was over my father asked one of his friends who worked for the United Nations to inquire about uncle Qasim and his family. A few weeks later he called us up and devastated my world. He said that the family was safe and that they had moved to Baghdad.

When I asked my father to send my regards to Basim, my father told his friend to do so and then I saw the expression of my father's face change. I saw tears in his eyes and I saw it in his eyes that he was crying for his nephew, Basim. They say that Basim was found dead on a sand dune with a white flag in his hands and 11 bullets in his chest. Basim had died at the young age of 19. Basim had died for no reason. How could you kill a soldier who has a white flag in his hands?

Now as I remember my brother, I sit and ask myself who will I call an elder brother, who will smoke those Sumers under the date palm with me? Who will tell me about Jamila? Who will tell the stories of our friendship to his children? Oh Basim, you will not even have children!

It has been two years since my brother died and I have never cried over his death, for I wait for the day when I will go back to Kerbala, there by the tree where we engraved our pledge shall I mourn the death of Basim. The saying was true, when Basim died he did join the Shuhada-i-Kerbala and I await the Day of Judgement, when I will meet my brother once again.

Subcomandante Insurgente Marcos.
Chapter XLVII. "About the strange way in which Don Quijote de la Mancha was enchanted, and other Events."

P.S. WITH THE FACE OF A FULL MOON, HE LOOKS TOWARD THE JUNGLE AND ASKS...

Who is that man who gallops over a squalid shadow? Why does he not seek relief? Why does he seek new pain? Why so many journeys when standing still? Who is he? Where is he going? Why does say goodbye with such a noisy silence?

P.S. FOR A CND (Democratic National Convention) WHICH CANNOT DECIDE WHETHER TO FIGHT AGAINST THE SYSTEM OR AGAINST ITSELF.

I read somewhere, that while the supreme government beats on both sides, the CND beats on itself. About this and other things, a few lines:

As the poet with the greying mustache who hides behind the piano writes: MEXICO IS A FLOWER OF JACARANDA WHO NEVER SEEKS A VASE A WILD BOAR WHICH BRAGS ABOUT ITS YOUNG PEOPLE A JAVELIN AT THE HEART OF JUSTICE THE CAMOUFLAGED BULL'S EYE OF A BIG.

And so Manuel may be right when he says that the meetings of the "collective centers of civilian support" are like meetings of "alcoholics anonymous" or "weight watchers." Maybe there is more to learn from these meetings than from party assemblies.

After all, the CND was born with the idea of unity, and not with the intention of entering the market of party clientele. It was and continues to be necessary a plan which includes the majority and best quality of civilian will. The CND had (has?) that plan. It was not to be the political arm of the Ezetaelene (EZLN) or a new party or a new white elephant of the Mexican irregular left. It was to be the space of imaginative encounters and proposals for democratic change. And imaginations and proposals, the freshest, the most audacious, came (come) from civil society, not political society, not political organizations. Its flag is national, above parties and armies.

From this space of encounter should come proposals which can be imposed, with imagination, on the government, on the parties, and on the Ezeta (EZ), and on itself. That ship does not want to arrive at the port of power. In that sense it does not have to comply with the pragmatic and cynical premises of Gallo-Machiavelli, but it does want to arrive at the port of a country with no return to the shadows, a country with democracy, liberty, and justice.

Are there bindings? Throw them overboard! Will only a few remain? Imagination will replace quantity with quality! Civil society has much to learn from itself, and very little to learn from political society (with all its specimen of colors, flavors, and cynicisms). It is not a space for anti-party people, but it is a place for those with no party. Civil society will then, in the midst of the threats of a dirty war (although I do not believe, there is a war which can be called clean), make the angel of Independence rappel its way down the column and make conversation with Juarez, Columbus, and the old grandfather Cuahtemoc.

The kind Diana will catch stars, and a stray palm drunk with smog. Civil society will make its un-proposals realities; civil dialogues in the midst of tanks, machine guns and cannons; campaigns of humanitarian aid, in the midst of a profound crisis and a more costly standard of living, for the benefit of its most vulnerable and impoverished flank, the indigenous. If the CND is not the ample space for this and other initiatives, the informal but effective irreverence of civil society will grow out of that straitjacket. Then what? It will find its own spaces. The CND will become another acronym, added to other inefficient acronyms. There is much to learn yet. This country has a great deal to learn from itself.

P.S. TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN IN THE SUPREME GOVERNMENT.

There is a special kind of glass cut so that it has many surfaces, like a multifaceted prism. This glass is mounted on a small wooden viewfinder, like an eyepiece. Through this glass, the light becomes many. When it is turned or moved, it offers many new configurations. It is the same light broken up into many lights? Is it many lights imprisoned in the eyepiece? Is it just confirmation that there is no uniqueness even in the most apparent? Is it one light or many lights which one must be able to distinguish, recognize and appreciate? And, finally, thinking about the small eyepiece, is it a light with many marcos (frames) or a marco (frame) for many lights? Vale. Once again. Health. Only by arriving in hell will we know the answer. The SUB with a red carnation in his lapel, playing at being a crystal and a mirror.

The EZLN asks the indigenous to go back to their homes

San Andrés Sacanichen de los Pobres, previously known as San Andrés Larrainzar, April 21, 1995:

To the people of México:
To the peoples and governments of the world:

To the local, national and international press:

All Brothers and Sisters:

1. We deeply regret that the federal government's representatives have used the presence of thousands of men, women and children, who have come only with the desire to collaborate in the circles of peace and as a clear sign that all the people want to achieve a peace with justice and dignity, as an excuse for suspending the discussions of peace.

2. The EZLN rejects the accusations of the federal government and denies that it has brought people to obstruct the dialogue in San Andrés.

3. The indigenous communities also mobilized because of their fear that the federal government or the White guards would make some attempt against the Zapatista delegation.

4. As more proof of our willingness to dialogue, we inform the people of México that we have asked the coordinators of the different indigenous peoples present in San Andrés to return to their home communities. They have responded that if this is a condition for the dialogue to continue, then with much dignity they will do it. With this action we show the supreme government that the indigenous did not come to interrupt the dialogue for peace; we regret the sadness of our indigenous companeros, real men, women and children of these lands, and we regret that this is the government's condition for initiating the dialogue. So it will be done, and only the men and women who are needed for the circles of security will remain.

5. The EZLN delegation again demonstrates its willingness to dialogue and to a political solution to the conflict.

6. The government repeats the error of thinking of the indigenous as incapable of organizing themselves by themselves, and that they can only move if someone takes them by the hand.

They are wrong; we indigenous are very capable.

7. The EZLN exhorts the delegates of the government to remember the third point of the principles agreed upon in San Miguel, which state that the dialogue should continue, and that it was decided to continue the dialogue, without excuses or calumnies against the EZLN, the indigenous, or the CONAI. We, the EZLN delegates, are waiting for the government with patience. WE hope that the government's delegates are not going to wait another 500 years to listen to and resolve the needs of the Mexican indigenous.

Democracy.
Freedom.
Justice.

Indian musician displays talent with sitar

NISHAT KHAN, ZAKIR HUSSAIN
Bowker Auditorium
April 22

The rich tradition of Indian classical music that once enchanted Emperors was brought vividly to life by sitar virtuoso Nishat Khan and internationally renowned tabla master Zakir Hussain this past Saturday. Performing at Bowker Auditorium, Hussain and Khan delighted and thrilled the sold-out house with their passion, intensity and skill on two Raags.

The stage was decorated with traditional Indian carpets and tapestries. The musicians were introduced by Ranjanaa Devi, director of South Asian Music and Dance, and were presented with garlands of flowers. Before stepping onto the raised platform that they were to play on, both performers removed their sandals as a sign of respect the Raag is sacred.

After greeting the audience with the Indian greeting, "Namaskar," Khan explained that the Raag was like the game of chess. The chess board was the Raag itself with the pains being the individual notes and then each note is placed in the Raag according to specific rules.

The program began with Evening Raag. Khan played a slow introduc-

Jazz Lab Ensemble to perform swing classics

For fans of swing-oriented jazz, the Hampden Theater in Southwest will be the place to be tonight for a performance from the University of Massachusetts Jazz Lab Ensemble.

The ensemble is set to perform a varied repertoire of jazz standards from the catalogs of the Duke Ellington Orchestra and the Woody Herman Band.

Selections to be performed include Ellington's "Sophisticated Lady" and "Rockin' in the Rhythm" as well as Sammy Nestico's "Flight of the Foo Birds" and "Stompin' at the Savoy" (co-written by the legendary Benny Goodman).

The Jazz Lab Ensemble's large 18-member lineup contributes to their full sound, hard-swinging sound.

Formed about four years ago, the Jazz Lab Ensemble is the newest of three jazz ensembles at the University. Made up of music majors as well as non-music majors, the Jazz Lab Ensemble is the only ensemble on campus which is conducted entirely by graduate students.

The ensemble is currently under the dual direction of John Piazza, Jr. and Patrick Hughes, both of whom are graduate students in the composition and arraignment of African-American Music and the Jazz Studies Program of the department of music and dance.

The University of Massachusetts Jazz Lab Ensemble will perform tonight, April 25, at the Hampden Theater in Southwest. The performance begins at 8 p.m. and admission is free for students as well as the general public.

New Disney film questioned

Native Americans discuss history of the real Pocahontas

By Bonnie I. Rochman
Associated Press

KING WILLIAM, Va. — It could pass for another Disney animated fairy tale: dashing, blond English colonist meets willowy, raven-haired Indian princess and they fall in love.

So what's wrong with this picture?

Walt Disney Co.'s Pocahontas, due in theaters this summer, does not square with historical fact. Unlike the make-believe stars of Disney's classic cartoon features, Pocahontas and John Smith actually lived.

Pocahontas had not yet reached her teens when Smith — in his early 30s at the time — arrived in the New World. Pocahontas, a chief's daughter, spared the settler from death at the hands of her angry tribe and taught him about Powhatan Indian culture. He, in turn, schooled her in English.

But the two were never an item. The animated Pocahontas will not be the innocent 11-year-old who saved Smith's life. Instead, she will be a slender, tawny-skinned enchantress in a form-fitting buckskin sheath.

"It's a beautiful story, if it didn't carry the name of Pocahontas," Shirley Custalow McGowan, an American Indian known to her tribe as Little Dove, said of the contrived romance.

Because of her high cheekbones, Disney artists modeled their Pocahontas character after McGowan. During a visit in August to Disney's Calffornia studios, she discovered that both Pocahontas and Smith will be in their 20s in the movie. When she asked why, Disney officials explained that a romance would make more money, she said.

"They really have it accurate about the heart and soul of our people, but they're not doing a film about the Powhatan Indians — they're doing a film about Pocahontas," she said.

The life of the real Pocahontas was not as glamorous as her cartoon namesake.

She was born in 1595 near Jamestown. According to a 1612 account written by William Strachey, the British first secretary of the Virginia colony, she married a chief from her tribe when she was about 14.

In 1613, when fighting broke out between the Powhatan tribe and white settlers, Pocahontas was lured aboard an English ship and temporarily held captive. During that time, she converted to Christianity and fell in love with Englishman John Rolfe.

In 1614, they married and two years later, Rolfe sailed with her to England. There she met King James I and the British acclaimed her as an American princess. But before she could return to America, she fell ill with smallpox and died at age 21.

Somewhere along the way, the original story line faded. Disney tried to ensure the film's accuracy: Its executives met with Virginia Indians and even visited Jamestown. Disney animator and director Mike Gabriel said in 1993 that the movie could be entertaining without departing from historical accuracy.

Disney officials confirmed that the movie Pocahontas will be a young woman and Smith will be twentysomething. But the studio declined repeated requests for interviews about the production. "It's really too early to start talking about this," Disney spokesman Howard Green said.

Viewers got a glimpse of Pocahontas last fall in a brief clip shown in theaters prior to Disney's The Lion King. In the clip, a lissome Pocahontas sang about the beauty of America to a dashing John Smith who is clearly smitten with her.

The clip has drawn mixed reviews from the nearly 10,000 Virginia Indians who are descendants of Powhatan, the father of Pocahontas.

"I've got some serious reservations from what I saw of it," said Warren Cooke, assistant chief of the Pamunkey tribe.

Cooke said Disney has an obligation to be true to the life of Pocahontas.

"With fictional characters you can do whatever you want to, but this goes back to the founding of the nation," he said.

But William Swift Water Miles, chief of the Pamunkey reservation, said Disney simply used artistic license. Because American Indians were portrayed favorably, Miles said, the fictional romance between Pocahontas and Smith did not bother him.

"I don't find that particularly objectionable. The only written record we have is from John Smith's diaries. Nobody can verify the accuracy of what he wrote."

McGowan said the inaccuracies will serve only to inspire her to teach the truth. For 28 years, she has traveled to schools across the nation to teach children about Indians.

"I think the film is going to be a big hit. Kids are going to think it's true — that's what they're going to remember," she said. "I'll just have to teach them that you don't take a real person and make a mockery of history."

■ sitar

tion consisting of chord progressions played under individual notes that would form the basic structure of the Raag. He produced an exotic and very beautiful sound by shifting hand positions, sometimes very quickly but always flawlessly. At times, it sounded as if there were more than one sitar playing. Khan's facial expressions showed a high degree of involvement in the music that he was creating.

After a 30-minute solo, Khan was joined by Hussain. Hussain created different rhythmic patterns and varied the sounds by hitting the tabla in different places and slow using different parts of the hand to create a more textured sound.

The second piece, Night Raag, is very popular and loved. It was written by a musician in the 16th century and played for Emperor Akbar. This Raag featured a brilliant and technically proficient tabla solo with won the audience's enthusiastic approval. A second highlight was Khan's unexpected breaking into song about a woman who wants a scarf the same color as her lover's turban.

During the performance, it was obvious that the two men had a great rapport with each other. Often, they would look at one another and nod in approval or exchange praise in Hindi. They were very comfortable with each other and with the audience. Many times, the audience was amused by the performers' facial expressions.

At the end of the concert, Khan and Hussain received a standing ovation and were prevailed upon to play an encore that consisted of an Indian folk song.

It was a wonderful treat to hear Indian classical music in its purest form and Khan and Hussain have certainly elevated this age-old art to a higher plateau of excellence.

SHAME-BASED MAN
Bruce McCulloch
Atlantic Records

"The Kids in the Hall" was one of the best shows on television in the late '80s and early '90s. The actors/comedians were the creators of some of the funniest and most original comedy sketches ever to be seen on television. Now in reruns, these men are doing other things with their lives — including ex-member Bruce McCulloch, who has just released his debut spoken-word album entitled Shame-Based Man.

But what works on television doesn't always work on a compact disc.

In McCulloch's 20 tracks of "poetry" and songs, he makes the listener quickly realize that he isn't as funny now as he was on "Kids in the Hall." Well known for his Cabbage Head Man and Kathy the secretary characters, McCulloch brings only a few tracks that are reminiscent of his former show.

"Daves I Know," "Answering Machine" and "Doors" are all tracks taken directly from "The Kids In The Hall," but even they don't transfer to audio well — for some reason, you still need to seen McCulloch wandering around his hometown introducing you to all the dorky, middle-aged guys named Dave in order to appreciate the humor.

On the first track, "Grade 8," McCulloch repeatedly complains about life in the '80s and when he was younger. "Grade 8" goes on and on about how McCulloch did all his acid in grade eight and all his hash and Southern Comfort in grade nine, and how come acid doesn't have names like blue microdot anymore.

Halfway through the three minute track, you start asking yourself, "When will this end?"

Other tracks in the album like "Stalking," and "Baby Jesus" may prove odd and quite offensive to the reader. "Stalking" is a frighfully odd conversation between a stalker and his victim.

"Baby Jesus" is a spoof on radio talk show callers. The caller talks about how much he loves Baby Jesus for two minutes and then reveals that he's only loved Baby Jesus for the last half hour. Humor is one of the last things McCulloch accomplishes with these odd tracks.

The closest McCulloch gets to poetry is his tracks "40 Housewives," and "Daddy's On The Drink." These two tracks flow like poetry and make the listener think. "Daddy's On The Drink" takes a hard look at alcoholism and how it affects the family.

The attempts at singing by McCulloch range from the 38 second death-metal screaming of "Heroin Pig" to the amateur songwriter sound of the gay love song, "Lift Me Up." What is McCulloch trying to do — prove that he has a wide range of talents? Certainly not, because what he accomplishes on this album is nothing short of a nightmare.

Unless bad spoken word is what you enjoy, save your $15 and don't buy Shame-Based Man. Instead, turn on Comedy Central and watch reruns of "The Kids In The Hall" — it's sure to be a whole lot more interesting, and a whole lot easier on your ears. D-offensive-minded youngster.

The basic knowledge of the game set the younger Dignazio up for the jump to Division I, but UMass coach Francesca McClellan was what made this school her choice. At times in the past, both her aunt and McClellan were competitors and teammates on their respective lacrosse teams. Their past professional relationship, coupled with Dignazio's respect for the coach's knowledge of the game, was what sealed the deal.

"With me doing well and scoring goals, I never thought I would do that before I got here," Dignazio said, "I thought this was a whole other level that I could not play on at first. But that is one of the reasons that I did choose this school, over a Penn State or Maryland, because I wanted to play and improve my game.

"My level of play has improved so much since last fall. I think that 'yeah, I was an All-American in high school', but I never knew the things I know now, and that is because of the coach."

Continuing the step-by-step education on both physical and psychological scales, is what drives Dignazio's internal fire for lacrosse. In her high school days, she would take losing to heart and unfortunately it would mostly affect her self, but then also her teammates.

With this season, that intensity has begun to get channeled in the right directions. The natural skills she possesses, like breaking down both team defense's and individual defenders, have not been lost to MacNeil and McClellan.

They both see an outstanding future for her, and the first steps towards a prosperous career have already been taken.

"She is intense, has the skill, finesse, desire and always gives 150 percent," MacNeil said. "She is going to fully lead this team in a couple of years. I mean, she even leads it now as a freshman, as one of our best defensive players. She has no place to go but up."

ting streak of 27 straight games (1992). Cardenas came close, but fell short hitting in 22 straight. Gutridge has currently hit in 19 straight and if her hot streak continues, she would break the record at the Princeton tournament to be held April 29–30.

During the streak, Gutridge is hitting .443 (27-for-61) with 11 runs scored and 14 runs batted in. She leads the team in doubles with 14 and needs to hit just six more to break the UMass record for most doubles in a single season. Holly Aprile (1989–92) holds the record of 19 set in 1991.

Gutridge is currently third on the team in batting average, hitting .370 (47-for-127) while also knocking in 23 RBIs. She took over the lead in batting after the Connecticut doubleheader before Chris Martens (.379) claimed it back on Saturday.

Osier sprinting towards record: Second baseman Tracey Osier is moving closer to the UMass record for most stolen bases in a season. The speedy freshman has 13 in 13 attempts and needs just five more to break the record of 17 set by Cherie DellAnno in 1991. Continuing next Hilary coming up," Donnelly said.

UMass also announced that Davis, Calif. native Katharine McClellan will be attending UMass next year as well. McClellan played at the same high school as defender Kyri Sparks.

Armed with a considerable hitting power, the 5-foot–11– inch McClellan is expected to see time as a penalty corner striker as well.

Men's tennis repeats 1994 finish at A–10s

By Andrew Bard
Collegian Staff

After finishing the season with a 6–5 record, the University of Massachusetts men's tennis team went on to compete in the Atlantic 10 Men's Tennis Championships at Piscataway, N.J. this past weekend.

The Minutemen duplicated their 1994 finish by placing seventh behind champion Rutgers, George Washington, Temple, West Virginia, Duquesne and St. Bonaventure.

Seventh seeded Massachusetts opened the tournament on Friday against second-seeded Temple. The Owls swept the Minutemen, 9–0, as they did not drop a set in the entire match.

UMass won the first of their three consolation matches on Friday as they shutout eighth-seeded Rhode Island, 4–0. Senior co–captain Tim Lipsky opened the match with a straight set win, 6–4, 6–1 over Rhode Island's John Spears. UMass sophomore Greg Hsiao ousted URI's Brian Blomenfield, 7–5, 3–1 in a rain shortened affair.

Senior co–captain Keith Murray defeated Jayce Huynh in straight sets, 6–1, 6–3. In another rain shortened match, UMass junior Justin Lynn defeated Jai Stiga, 6–0, 4–1. Minutemen sophomore Ankur Baishya defeated Keith Matters, 6–4, 6–4. In the final match, UMass junior Darren Tow had no trouble with URI's T.J. McGreegy.

On Saturday, the Minutemen fell in their second consolation match to sixth–seeded Duquesne, 4–3. The Minutemen went back and forth in the singles matches against the Dukes, with victories by Lipsky, Lynn and freshman sensation Alex Aller.

The match was tied 3–3 and doubles matches were to break the tie. UMass lost two of three in the double's match with their only win coming from the duo of Aller and Baishya.

The final consolation match for the Minutemen took place on Sunday as they took on the ninth–seeded St. Joseph's Hawks for seventh place. The Minutemen swept the Hawks by the score of 7–0.

The Minutemen opened with an easy victory by Lipsky over Jeff Laffey, 6–1, 6–0. Hsiao gave UMass a 2–0 lead with a 6–3, 6–1 victory over St. Joseph's Rick Rojas. Lynn continued the Minutemen's winning ways with a 6–0, 6–2 win over Ally Gaylord.

UMass' Baishya carried on the onslaught with a 6–2, 6–0 win over Paul Capozello.

The Minutemen finished singles competition with a win by Tow over Dave Cataldi, 7–6, (7–2), 6–0, and by Aller who defeated Robert Bellezza, 4–6, 6–2, 6–3. The Minutemen also swept doubles competition as the duos of Lipsky and Murray, Hsiao and Lynn, and Eric Peters and Aller all had impressive showings in victory as the Minutemen finished the Atlantic 10s in seventh place.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Bright ideas can mean extra cash in the bank. You find yourself in the spotlight at a social event. Have fun. Travel will hasten a career move. A new romance boosts your self-esteem.

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): Make certain you are clear on the terms of an agreement before signing. A close friend's negative attitude could affect your outlook. Walk alone for a while. Overseas studies could advance your career.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Try not to take life so seriously, get into the spirit of fun and enjoyment. Think carefully about your financial situation before making new investments.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Plan today's agenda carefully, tackling one project at a time. An older person has a steadying influence on you. Focus on business and career. A newcomer brings an aura of glamour and romance.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Slow down; mistakes made as a result of haste can be costly. Hard work will take you to the next financial level. Influential people seek you advice; give it after much thought. Romance is a source of contentment.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Use your resources wisely. Shortcuts help you make up for lost time. Others are counting on your leadership; do not let them down. Family members should be informed of your plans for the future.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Smarten up! Jettisoning outdated methods will save time and money. A need for greater self-discipline is obvious. New friends help you build a solid foundation for the future. Concentrate on consolidating recent gains.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Nothing can hold you back today. Unforeseen problems prove easy to circumvent. A career in the computer field deserves serious thought. Your powerful charisma attracts admirers like a magnet. Choose confidants with care.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): A fast-paced, unpredictable day lies ahead. Go with the flow. You may have difficulty finding the right words to express yourself. Consult the dictionary. Romance sizzles after dark. Go slow on making promises.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): This is not a good time to change employment. Value the job you have. Keeping business pressures in proper perspective will be easier if you set aside time for meditation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Expenses may be higher than you expected. Still, you have a lot to celebrate. Slow down if you feel rushed off your feet. Steady effort is the key to attracting favorable notice at work.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): You get a head start on the competition today. Your sometimes-ungodly behavior can confuse others. Try to relax and think things through. Music soothes frazzled nerves.

Regular seasons winding down for baseball, softball

■ Minutemen host Maine today; Knight receives nat'l honor

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

The honors keep coming for Bill Knight.

The senior right fielder for the University of Massachusetts baseball team, who became the school's all-time home run king last week, was named one of five National Players of the Week by Mizuno and Collegiate Baseball.

Knight blasted six HRs last week to raise his season total to 12 and his career total to 36 as the Minutemen went undefeated in six games at Earl Lorden Field. He batted .450 with 21 runs batted in and 11 runs scored, including a grand slam and a three-run shot in a victory over Rutgers.

Knight holds the UMass record for RBIs (146) and total bases (315) and is the conference leader in HR and RBIs.

He was also named the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference and Atlantic 10 Conference's Player of the Week in addition to the national honors.

Duquesne's Jamey Keysor got the nod as A-10 Pitcher of the Week over Massachusetts' Jay Murphy (5-2), who has won four consecutive starts, including two last week.

Keysor (6-1) earned his first shutout of the year in blanking Temple, 6-0, on Saturday and has an earned run average of 4.00 to lead the Dukes. Murphy sports a 3.08 ERA and has six complete games on the season.

Massachusetts, after a three-game sweep of Rutgers, stands atop the conference standings with a 15-3 A-10 record, three games ahead of second place George Washington.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

First baseman Justin Kelly, a Northampton native, and the Massachusetts baseball team will host Maine today at Earl Lorden Field.

Murphy breaking out

After slumping at the plate for the past few weeks, causing Massachusetts coach Mike Stone to drop him in the batting order, centerfielder Nate Murphy heated up again in the three-game series against Rutgers. Murphy was 4-for-8 with three homers and five RBIs against the Scarlet Knights.

His season batting average now stands at .280, sixth on the Minutemen.

Maine comes to town

Perrennial New England powerhouse Maine comes to Earl Lorden Field today for a double dip with the Minutemen (1 p.m.). The Black Bears (17-27) loaded their schedule with games against such national powers as Louisiana State, Florida and Miami on a trip to the south to begin the season. Maine paid for it, winning just one of 18 games.

Steve Puleo is the top hitter for the Black Bears, batting .371 with 27 RBIs; Maine's starting pitching staff has taken its lumps, as well. Jim Hanning (1-5) and LeRoy Decker (2- 5) have received the most starts for the Black Bears, a far cry from when their best player was a hurler and made his way to the Major Leagues. Maine alum Billy Swift is the poster boy for Black Bear baseball and now pitches for the Colorado Rockies.

■ Minutewomen look to clinch A-10 regular season title

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team will be looking to clinch the Atlantic 10 Conference regular season championship today when the Minutewomen meet up with Rhode Island today for a doubleheader at 3 p.m. in Kingston, R.I.

The Minutewomen will head into the contest with a 27-14 overall record, 7-1 in the A-10, while the Rams come in at 20-15 overall, 5-3 in the Atlantic 10.

Rutgers is currently in second place behind UMass at 7-3. The Minutewomen were runners-up to Rutgers last year for the tournament title but will be looking for their fifth straight regular season title today.

Minutewomen notes: It's starting to sound like a broken record, but Kelly Daut has been named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week for the fifth straight week. The senior hurler went 4-1 for the week and in 33 innings of work, had 38 strikeouts and allowed just two earned runs.

Daut leads the Atlantic 10 in wins (18) and earned run average (0.94). Speaking of the ERA, Daut had gone into the weekend with the goal of lowering her ERA to below one. After the split against Connecticut (April 20), Daut and assistant coach Mona Stevens were upset about giving up a run. According to Stevens, Daut said that she'd have it by Saturday. She ended up getting it on Saturday afternoon.

Freshman Jodi Dignazio, a Wallingford, Pa. native leads the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team with 27 points (24 goals.

Place: Totman Field
Time: Approximately 5:30 p.m., April 18, 1995
Game: UMass vs. Hofstra

As the final ticks run off the clock, another heartbreaking loss ensues for the young University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team. With seven seconds left in the game, Hofstra's goal ends both the rally that began with seven minutes left and the win over the Minutewomen, 11- 10.

Individually, freshman Joanna Dignazio, the leading scorer with 27 points (24 goals), has had another stellar day, piling up a five goal performance.

But the trying conclusion to the game takes its toll on the intense competitor, as teammates Erica Bryan and captain Diane MacNeil try to console the mentally drained offensive standout.

This inaugural collegiate season for the 1994 high school All-American has been one of extremes. The intensity she puts into her game sometimes leaves her walking on cloud nine; then at others, drags her down to the depths of self critical thought and doubt. That internal fire that fuels her love of the game is what has driven her success this season. But at times, like after the loss to Hofstra, that fire can burn a young player's ego.

"I do not want to be known as a hothead with an attitude. I am afraid I come across real harsh sometimes, and I do not want that," Dignazio said, almost apologetically. "After graduating high school, and being recognized as an All- American, I was still apprehensive to come here and play Division I lacrosse.

"I had so much self doubt, but my father always reassured me that I would do fine. I put so much pressure on myself to always have a perfect game, and sometimes I take myself out of my game."

The game of lacrosse was not always the main love for Dignazio. At Strath Haven High School in Wallingford, Pa., she was not just a four year letter winner in lacrosse, but also in soccer. With the soccer team's three Central League Championships, the decision for which of the two sports she would choose to play in college posed a unique dilemma.

The influences that aided in her decision to pursue collegiate lacrosse are two-fold, but both dealt with one central person.

From the start of her organized lacrosse career in sixth grade, the single most important factor in her development was the influence of her aunt, Kathy Dignazio. Being a former All-American at Pennsylvania, the defensive-minded elder was able to teach the subtleties of the game to the

Rose to rejoin home country in preparation for Olympics

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

It appears that Massachusetts' loss will be Great Britain's gain on the field hockey field, as goaltender Hilary Rose will not be back in net for the Minutewomen for the 1995 season. Rose will rejoin her home country's national team as it prepares for the Olympic qualifying tournament in South Africa, to be played in November.

Rose played with the British squad in the 1994 World Cup in Dublin, and could challenge for the starting position on the team.

The Olympic waiver allows athletes who are competing in either the Olympics or qualifying tournaments for the Games an extra year of eligibility to replace the one they missed during Olympic competition. Rose hopes to take advantage of that waiver, and return to UMass for the 1996 season.

In her two seasons at Massachusetts, Rose has led the nation in save percentage both years and in goals-against average in her freshman campaign. She also registered 26.5 shutouts in the two year career.

Massachusetts coach Megan Donnelly said the Minutewomen will miss Rose's personality, as well her talent and leadership.

"It's a great opportunity for her, she's one of the best goalies in the world," Donnelly said. "As much as I will miss her as the best goalie in the country, I'll miss her far more as a person."

Rose's departure leaves backup Stacy Walker as the front runner to emerge as the starter next season. Walker has started one game and played in several others. The sophomore has not given up a goal in her collegiate career.

Donnelly said that she is confident in Walker's ability to step in next year.

"My feeling is that Stacy has the inside track [on the starting job]," Donnelly said. "I think the job is hers for the taking."

Walker, who is currently working with Rose to help improve her skills, has praised Rose's teaching skills.

"There is no better person to learn from," Walker said.

In keeping with growing tradition there will be a Great Britain native filling the other goalkeeper spot. Zowie Tucker, who is currently the goalie for the Welsh under 21 squad, signed a letter of intent on Friday to attend Massachusetts next year.

Clarke signs on with UMass

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

It's been rumored for weeks, but yesterday Charlton Clarke officially signed to become a Minuteman.

Clarke, a 6-foot-2-inch guard at St. Raymond's High School in the Bronx, announced yesterday that he will attend the University of Massachusetts next year.

Clarke's announcement snubs Connecticut and Florida, who had also been recruiting the Bronx, N.Y. native.

Clarke is currently attending St. Raymond's, the same high school that Minuteman forward Dana Dingle played for.

Rich Allen, who writes for Reidel's Roundball Report, a publication that rates high school basketball players, describes Clarke as a talented athlete who can play either point guard or shooting guard and possesses a good shooting range.

Clark broke his ankle during this season but is expected to be completely healthy by next season.

He recently competed in the Magic's Roundball Classic, a high school all-star game at the Pontiac Silverdome. Clarke, who was paired in the backcourt with Kentucky bound Wayne Turner, displayed some strong driving and passing skills in the game.

Sources said Clark has passed the minimum 700 on the SAT, required to be eligible to play during his freshman year.

Women's water polo finishes third in EWPA tourney

By Teri Klein
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's water polo team placed a respectable third in the Eastern Water Polo Association North Division Playoffs this weekend, after defeating Wesleyan in the third place game.

The Minutewomen began the tournament with a strong performance in their first round game against Wellesley College. UMass dominated every aspect of the game on both offense and defense in its 13-1 win over the Blues.

"We played very well. They couldn't play against us and we really shut them down," Massachusetts coach Bob Newcomb said.

UMass' good fortune came to an end when they fell to a powerful Brown team on April 22 in the semi-finals.

Newcomb speculated that nerves may have been a big factor in the Minutewomen's loss to Brown.

"We didn't play particularly well. In the Brown game, nerves or whatever affected us so that we didn't compete in that game the way we have in past tournaments," Newcomb explained.

The Minutewomen, who were outshot by only three (18- 15), had difficulties playing their own game against Brown, and the Bears took advantage.

"We let them dominate and were never able to set things up our way or played our game," Meghan O'Connor said.

Brown's Alisa Von Hartiszch helped shut down UMass by scoring eight of their 13 goals. According to Newcomb, Von Hartiszch was one of the best women's water polo players he has ever seen. Her offensive power was a force behind the Bear's 13-5 victory over the Minutewomen.

"We didn't concentrate enough on shutting [Von Hartiszch] down, and I think that's what killed us," sophomore Vicki Bamond said.

In the third and final round, Massachusetts was successful in beating Wesleyan University 6-5. Newcomb commented that, once again, scoring proved to be a problem for the Minutewomen. They outshot the Cardinals 22-10, but only won by one point.

Bamond, Massachusetts' leading scorer, was shutout during the tournament, only scoring a total of five goals. The opponents were aware of her talents, and devised defenses to stop her throughout the tournament.

"Vicki is one of the players that teams have to constantly play or she'll score. She is always a factor," Newcomb said.

Junior goalie Jessica Griffith had a solid weekend, totaling 14 saves in the three games. The reliable Griffith has started in goal every game this season, and has been relieved only once. While logging the minutes for the Minutewomen, Newcomb understands the importance of his goalie, or as he says the "defensive quarterback."

"Jess is a goalie who may have the [strongest] legs I've ever seen. She comes high out of the water to block the shots," Newcomb said.

By placing third, Massachusetts earned a bid to the Eastern Championship, which will be held this Friday through Sunday, April 28-30, at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

Brothers linked with McVeigh in bombing

By Sharon Cohen
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Two brothers were linked in conspiracy charges Tuesday with Oklahoma bombing suspect Terry McVeigh, and a motel manager in Kansas said he recognized the man in a new FBI sketch of "John Doe 2" as a nervous guest with a foreign accent.

The fast-breaking developments in two states came as rescuers raked through the rubble for bodies and this grieving city continued to bury its dead. The death toll rose to 88.

In Michigan, federal prosecutors piracy charges against James Nichols, a 41-year-old farmer, and his brother, Terry, 40, who is being held in Kansas. They were accused of conspiring with McVeigh, the 27-year-old Army veteran charged in the explosion that destroyed the Alfred P. Murrah federal building.

A court affidavit said James Nichols told FBI agents April 21 that McVeigh "had the knowledge to manufacture a bomb" and that the three men made "bottle bombs" in 1992. Last year, the Nichols brothers made small explosive devices, the court document said.

McVeigh was not accused in the Michigan case and the charges are not related to the Oklahoma bombing, authorities said.

In addition to linking the Nichols brothers to McVeigh, they allow the government to continue holding the men, who previously were in custody as material witnesses.

The FBI released an enhanced sketch of the most wanted man in America, a square-jawed individual linked to the nation's deadliest domestic terrorist attack here April 19.

It shows a man wearing a baseball cap and is otherwise very similar to the original picture of "John Doe 2": a man with dark, heavy eyebrows, thick lips, short neck, slightly flared nostrils and square jaw.

In Junction City, Kan., the manager of the Great Western Inn was watching television with two reporters when the new sketch flashed on the screen. He said he recognized him as the man who stayed in Room 107 on April 17 — two days before the bombing.

Town seeks special legislation to apply tax to Campus Hotel

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

In a 186-4 decision, Amherst Town Meeting members voted to let town officials seek special legislation to apply the Amherst hotel tax to the Campus Center Hotel at the University of Massachusetts.

With the passage of Article 5, town officials will attempt for the fourth time to convince state legislators to get rid of the exemption that keeps Amherst from collecting an estimated $80,000 in hotel taxes annually. Currently the Campus Center Hotel is exempt from taxes because it is located on the property of a non-profit institution.

Town officials have brought the issue to the legislature in three previous years, but it has never made it out of the Taxation Committee of the House of Representatives.

Powerful forces have kept the University from paying its bills, creating a situation that is unfair to Amherst taxpayers, said Hill Boss, an Amherst selectboard member.

Although the University, Hampshire College and Amherst College are the largest employers in town, Boss said, because they are tax-exempt, non-profit institutions, the town is forced to offer them services for which they do not pay.

Boss called the Campus Center Hotel the "poster child" for the town's struggle to get "just compensation" for the $100,000 in free services provided by the town.

The town provides police, fire, and ambulance coverage and educates the children who live in tax-exempt University housing.

"The town of Amherst deserves at least a token payment for the services it provides," Boss said.

Taxation not without precedent

Boss explained to Town Meeting members that collecting taxes on campus is not without precedent. For instance, he said, non-students have to pay a meals tax at campus eateries and a sales tax at the University stores.

Most of the people who stay at the Campus Center Hotel are people who would normally stay at Amherst hotels where they would be paying a 4 percent hotel tax, Boss said.

One Town Meeting member said that by having to deal with the hotel tax, students working in the hotel would get a better idea of how the "real world" works. Only at a college or university would a hotel be allowed to avoid paying regular local taxes.

Next week, Town Meeting members are expected to vote on another article affecting the University. Article 41 is a petition that asks members to support town officials in their battle for "fair compensation" for unfunded services.

The article was submitted by Town Meeting member Jonathan Hite, who graduated from UMass in 1978 and was director of alumni affairs for six years. Hite currently serves on several boards and committees.

UMass professors helm panel on multiculturalism

DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN

Robert Paul Wolff of Afro-American Studies and philosophy, Ann Ferguson of philosophy, Arnold Silver of English and Joseph Skerrett of English gathered to debate the issue of multiculturalism on Tuesday evening.

■ Questions, concerns addressed by various members of faculty

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

A four-member faculty panel addressed the multicultural agenda at the University of Massachusetts at a Monday evening symposium.

The question "Does the UMass Approach to Multiculturalism Contribute to a Negative Racial Climate?" was the focus of the forum, which was sponsored by the Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations.

In addition to introducing each of the panelists and moderator Provost Pat Crosson, Chancellor David K. Scott opened the evening with a few words on his views on the benefits of the much-debated topic.

"If we are going to develop a multicultural community," Scott said. "The university is the starting ground."

What is multiculturalism?

English professor Arnold Silver commented the symposium with a question to the audience.

"How many people are prepared to stand up and define multiculturalism?" he asked the audience, none of whom raised a hand.

Silver then proceeded to acknowledge that although racial tensions do exist on campus, a multicultural doctrine is not, in his estimation, the solution.

"[Multiculturalism] actually has the paradoxical effect of causing tension," he said.

Appreciation of the diverse aspects of Western ideals was at the core of Silver's argument, as he contended that Western ways have constituted "the most diverse culture in history."

Fellow English professor Joseph Skerrett followed Silver, but offered a different perspective on the topic of discussion.

"There is an unspoken definition of what is American," Skerrett said in disagreeing with his peer.

In his defense of multiculturalism, Skerrett did also warn of possible misinterpretation that could result in "the multicultural identity becoming something like gang membership."

Skerrett closed with an anecdote about his refusal to visit Boston, the reason being a racially motivated killing committed during the busing controversy of the '70s.

"There is no golden age of peaceful relations between the races," he said.

Three components

Philosophy professor Ann Ferguson stated that she believed poor race relations on campus are "due to pervasive racism in U.S. society as a whole," not to the ill effects of multiculturalism, as written in the controversial MAS report.

Ferguson continued by offering the three components that the University define as being the main points of the multiculturalism: The promotion of civility; the promotion of diversity; and, the creation of a multicultural curriculum.

The need for the continuation of affirmative action, in both business and education, was also a policy which Ferguson saw as necessary for "sharing power" with the elite ranks of society.

More specifically, Ferguson advocated that UMass offer more financial aid and grants to minority students, as well as allowing all in-state residents admission into the school, replete with a special support system.

Remarking that the title question of the symposium was "beneath serious consideration," Afro-American Studies and philosophy professor Robert Paul Wolff instead opted to independently speak on the complexity of Western civilization.

Wolff noted the example of the European preoccupation with ancient Greece, a civilization whose literature was preserved by Muslims before returning to Europe.

With respect to the student who is exposed to the norms of Western thought, Wolff said that extracurricular reading and instructors who are "intelligent and alive" are two factors which might aid development in the collegiate world.

In closing, Wolff lambasted the anti-multicultural sentiments that have recently seen a rise in the ranks of academia.

"It is the anguished cry of the ignorant," he said. "Who are afraid that, late in life, they will have to read a new book."

Commission examines issues of many University students

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

Multicultural issues and other student concerns on campus are not ignored by faculty and staff of the University of Massachusetts.

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations meets each week and has been addressing issues such as activities for students, revision of summer orientation, and implementing more hours for the library and gyms.

The long term advisory board to the Chancellor," was formed in 1980 and consists of about 30 people, 50 percent faculty, according to Grant Ingle, director of Human Relations. The remainder is graduate and undergraduate students, he said.

The Commission provides the Chancellor with advice about human relations issues on campus, said Joyce Berkman, co-chair of the Commission.

The most recent public effort of the Commission was a symposium on Monday questioning University's approach to multiculturalism on campus.

A goal of the symposium was to break tough topics, according to Ingle. "One conversation does not conform the campus. We hope to have more conversation," he said.

At Friday's meeting, the Commission spoke of holding possible peer discussions about prominent issues such as the Oklahoma City bombing. Cornell University has a similar program, according to Sally Freeman of Counseling and Academic Development.

"They quickly mobilize people to come together in conversation about [issues in the news]," Freeman said.

The Chancellor will make his monthly visit to the Commission on Friday, and the members are preparing for the meeting.

The Commission should meet with the Chancellor fairly regularly, rather than monthly, to brief him on their conversation, according to a new member of the Commission.

"We would like to see [the Chancellor] take a more active role in civility in Human relations," Berkman said.

The Chancellor was unavailable for comment.

The Commission will confront the question "Does the UMass approach to multiculturalism contribute to a negative racial climate?" in a symposium tonight at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center room 163.

"It is a question all around us, it just hasn't been examined in a public forum," Ingle said.

Lecture looks at criticisms of Clinton

By Purva Pandey
Collegian Staff

The role of the American president has come into question recently, as President Clinton faces criticism on his policies and political agenda. According to a Yale University professor, this is a characteristic of Clinton's predecessors as well.

Stephen Skowronek, an author and professor of political science at Yale, gave a lecture Monday afternoon in the Campus Center entitled "Bill Clinton's Moment in Political Time." Approximately 40 people attended.

The event was sponsored by the Phi Beta Kappa Society and the American Politics faculty at the UMass Department of Political Science.

"The effects of presidential action are very difficult to control," said Skowronek. "Clinton's experience can provide us with an important part of the answer."

According to Skowronek, Clinton has been forced to exploit problems

Talk details role of essentialism, Marxism

By Hernán Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

The role of essentialist epistemology in traditional curricula has been questioned and often put under examination by alternative theorists who disagree with this type of approach.

Such alternative ways of looking at how theories are shaped and defined were put forth this past weekend during the conference on "Marxism and the Politics of anti- essentialism," brought by the Association for Economic and Social Analysis at the UMass economics department.

The plenary session of this conference was a lecture given by Michael Eric Dyson, professor of Afro-American studies and Cultural Communication studies at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill and author of Making Malcolm: The Myth and Meaning of Malcolm X.

Dyson concluded the two-day conference by presenting a view on essentialism unlike that of other participants, namely, by relating the African American experience. Part of this experience undoubtedly includes the social aspect of religion and religious traditions.

Besides teaching, Dyson has had his share of preaching — this aspect came through in the lecture, as his emotional tone of voice kept the audience alert at all times.

In exposing the juxtaposition of the black experience in America with essentialist thinking, Dyson also related this to the social theory postulated by Karl Marx. "Marxism has to be dipped in the roots of African American culture," he said. Moreover, one must "translate and baptize it" so that it can be applied to contemporary society.

Speaking on the importance of religion, Dyson said that one cannot discount the importance of this factor, even within the realm of Marxian theory, as author Cornel West has also discussed. Indeed, Dyson was "trying to mix Jesus and Marx together [since] they were two very powerful Jews."

The rest of the talk focused on the ever-present debate over race and its socio-political implications in the United States. In exploring this topic, Dyson said that one finds many themes that deal with essentialist thinking; also, one may find solutions that could "demystify and demytholo-

A quick rush to judgement

As the infamous car bomb ripped through the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City last Wednesday, there was a concomitant and much less noticed explosion throughout the United States of racism, chauvinism and xenophobia.

Within hours of the deadly blast, Americans of all walks of life, particularly politicians and journalists, began, without a shred of evidence, to point the finger squarely at foreigners, especially Arabs and Muslims as the undoubted culprits.

Juan José Chacon Quiros de Quetzalcoatl

Calls immediately rang out for tougher immigration controls, scrutiny and deportation of foreigners in the United States, and bombing raids against Middle Eastern countries.

Threats of every description were publicly heaped against Middle Easterners as the American propaganda machine swung into full force. Talk radio and network TV, such as "Larry King Live," were at their most vitriolic.

Arabs and Muslims in several incidents were rounded up, arrested and interrogated only because of their identity. In the worst such case, Abraham Ahmad, a Palestinian- American, who was simply trying to fly from Oklahoma City to Jordan that fateful day, was detained and interrogated, for hours in Chicago. As a result he missed his Rome connection, and after flying to London was arrested and returned to the United States in chains and under armed guard. His only crime: he was an Arab and a Palestinian. It was reported that he had in his luggage a hammer and wires" which in the eyes of the media it constituted bomb making equipment.

Throughout Wednesday and Thursday, American society was both secure in its confidence that the bombers were foreigners, undoubtedly Muslims, and that the guilty parties emerged from the Middle East.

As late as Monday morning, radio talk shows taped earlier were broadcast calling for massive bombing raids against Middle Eastern cities, the discourse informed by a certainty that "we know who these people are."

What we witnessed, and it was clear at the time, was a massive bout of projection and denial by an American society incapable of coming to grips with its fundamental constitutive forces.

Was it not instantly clear from the fact that the bombing was directed against an office of the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms on exactly the second anniversary of the massacre of religious dissidents in Waco, Texas, that this bombing had nothing whatsoever to do with the Middle East? Was it not clearly part of internecine religious and ideological warfare between Americans?

But Americans were blind to the most basic, and painful, realities of their society, instead preferring psychological defense mechanisms of projection and denial, and willing to stigmatize and victimize in the process.

In fact, the bombing, in spite of its all-American character, remains symbolically encoded in the public mind here as nonetheless an Arab and Muslim act of terrorism. Public discourse and impending repressive legislation remain largely focused on the shadowy "foreign terrorist" rather than the right-wing militia man next door.

The argument, when people even bother to make it, for this is that it could have been an act foreign–Arab–Muslim terrorism. As one so-called expert put it, the Oklahoma bombing had the "MO" (modus operandi) of Muslim terrorism.

Apart from numerous Hollywood movies, the only basis for this fantastic and racist "MO" has been the bombing of the World Trade Center in New York in 1993. What isn't mentioned, of course, is that the WTC bombing had almost as many "made in America" stamps on it as the Oklahoma atrocity.

If we are to believe the government's case that a circle of people around Sheikh Omar Abdel–Rahman was responsible for the WTC bomb, then it was indeed the work of a group organized, imported and trained by the CIA. These people were by all accounts involved in the largest American covert operation since Vietnam, the Mujahideen war against the Russians in Afghanistan.

The Sheikh himself, New York magazine reported last month, was brought to this country by the CIA several times in the '80s as part of that covert operation, to recruit and train holy warriors. If there was any state sponsor to the group accused of the WTC bombing, it was indeed the United States government — it was also "made in America."

All the xenophobia and racism, projection and denial, with which we have been deluged in the past week cannot disguise the most basic truth of the Oklahoma bombing and the "terrorist threat."

You have seen The Enemy ... and it is You.

Searching for common courtesy

I am sick of being approached by men. Not that I don't like men. I love men. I just don't care to be approached by them everywhere I go. Contrary to popular belief, single women do not go looking for a man 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

My friend Karen and I were sitting in the dining commons not too long ago engrossed in conversation. Suddenly, a man approached our table. As he began to blabber, I wondered what he wanted, interrupting our dinner with his nonsense. We really just wanted to be left alone to finish our dinner in relative peace and quiet. "God, when is he going to leave?" I thought, never daring to actually ask. We allowed him to continue his chatter, smiling politely, all the while wishing he would go away. He then began to question us about our personal lives. Did we have boyfriends, were we single, why don't we have men? We're not (God forbid) lesbians, are we?

Nona Chiang

Why can't two women sit in a public place without being approached, propositioned and harassed by a man? Is it so unbelievable that two attractive, intelligent, heterosexual women can be happy dining or going someplace without men at their sides? Is it so surprising that two women could find each other's company preferable to a man's?

As Susan Jacoby, a feminist writer, points out: "The man who barged in on us at the bar would never have broken into the conversation of two men, and it goes without saying that he wouldn't have imposed himself on a man and a woman ..."

There is an unwritten doctrine which states that women, no matter what they are involved in, be it work, a conversation, a drink, a meal, or a plane trip, are constantly searching for men. Women are not supposed to be able to live happy, fulfilling lives without men. Seeing that we can, and do, infuriates many of these men, who then resort to calling women names in order to maintain a position of superiority. These names are supposed to shame us into apologizing for our "unfeminine" behavior.

Why is it that women such as myself do not convey the message "go away" to these men? On the one hand, I think we send mixed messages. Our mouths are saying "no" yet our body language; our smiles, our eyes, are still saying "yes." Unfortunately, men pay more attention to a woman's body language than to the words coming from her mouth. Most of us women sit quietly and allow strange men to interrupt our conversations or our "aloneness," instead of simply asking to be left alone. Why? Is that not acceptable? Do we as women lack the right to our privacy? Are we fearful of being labeled bitches or lesbians?

Most women have been taught that it is not ladylike to tell a man to get lost. We are expected to smile and agree; to comply with a man's wishes. It is when we do not do so that the name calling will occur. If we choose to stand up to strange men who approach us in public places, we need to be prepared to be told that we're being too sensitive or that we're overreacting or that we are a bitch or a lesbian. By the way, what's supposed to be so terrible about being a lesbian anyway?

Our refusal to stand up to unwanted advances tells men that it's okay for them to continue to proposition strange women in public places. I resent the fact that anytime I travel, dine, shop, or walk alone, I must focus a certain amount of energy on maintaining an aloof attitude.

Don't get me wrong, there is absolutely nothing wrong with a stranger man approaching me in public. I don't have a problem with that. What I do have a problem with is the propositioning and harassment which often follow the approach. I have a problem with this code of feminine politeness we as women are expected to follow. I have a problem with men not taking "no" for an answer. I have a problem with men calling me a bitch simply because I have been assertive. And most of all, I have a problem with the lack of common courtesy exhibited by the majority of men I have encountered.

Child slavery in other countries

Editor's note: This is the first of two columns on child slavery.

Don't take candy from strangers. Especially if you live in India.

A 5–year–old boy named Satosh did. He was kidnapped and beaten for several days. He was finally told that he could have the gruel and water he'd been denied, and be abused less often, if he would "agree" to work 19 hours a day making carpets for export to the West. A children's rights organization found him nine years later, covered in scars. Some of these were burns; when he cut himself on a needle, sulfur was dumped into the wound and set on fire to close it up.

Justice was finally served, Indian style. His overseer, a local school principal, was arrested, and released one day later.

In Pakistan, four–fifths of rug weavers are under the age of 15. In Lesotho, even younger kids stitch all day and sleep on the factory floor at night — after a hearty dinner of stale bread.

The floors of some of these factories are reported to be covered in shards of glass; the laborers, of course, are barefoot. Acidic fumes fill unventilated rooms.

While luckier American kids toddle off to kindergarten, 200 million other children punch the clock in factories like these. Then again, maybe the Americans aren't so lucky: U.S. child labor law violations have nearly tripled in the past 15 years.

There are a few child laborers, foreign and domestic, who do escape the sweatshops. Some have told us their stories. One, Lesly from Honduras, told the U.S. Congress that she earned 38 cents an hour, working 80 hours a week. She was sexually abused by her managers. Lesly's bosses sold the products the 15–year–old made to Liz Claiborne.

Iqbal Masih of Pakistan was sold by his parents to a carpet factory when he was four. Mom and Dad collected 12 dollars; Iqbal spent six years literally chained to a loom. He worked 12 hours a day, every day of the week.

Iqbal, too, broke away from his slavery. He began a crusade against child servitude, which brought him worldwide attention. In December, he won the Reebok Human Rights Award in Boston. Brandeis University offered him a full scholarship when the time came.

This past Easter Sunday, Iqbal Masih, age 12, was murdered by the Pakistani "Carpet Mafia."

A few months ago, I wrote that American consumers can no longer avoid complicity in human rights abuses. The world trade web sanctioned by Presidents Bush and Clinton has made the purchase of soiled items such as those Lesly and Iqbal produced utterly impossible. NAFTA and GATT have seen to that.

And don't look to the Republican Revolution to rescue these kids. Even right–wing radio host Chuck Harder said that presidential frontrunner Bob Dole's cheerleading for GATT made Dole "the man who made child slave labor legal."

America's role in the child slave trade is pivotal. We hand over the cash to countries that ignore their own (already absurdly loose) labor laws, and then we buy the stuff their children produce. It's as if you could trade in a 3–year–old child for a brand–new sweater.

American government's and industry's role in encouraging child labor goes beyond just labor, though. It gets worse. The American government has a direct interest in the planet's worst possible child abuse — sexual slavery.

Letters to the Editor

A tribute to Robert Schapiro

To the editor:

Bob's strength of conviction and his ability to understand and appreciate the usefulness and limitation of any one viewpoint is truly an uncommon combination. He spent his intellectual energy clarifying the ideas which drew politics and policy. He spent his physical energy on the application of these ideas — on improving people's lives wherever he was and in whatever ways he could. Someone once told me that wisdom is the combination of intelligence and kindness. I hope I can continue to draw from Bob's wisdom.

Laura Wenk
School of Education

To the editor:

I had the good fortune to know Bob Schapiro as a friend and a long time committed activist. He tried to integrate his words and his daily actions and interactions with others. For me, his spirit lives. I remember him as a human being with integrity who was consistently encouraging us to build a real sense of community in our lives based on the principles and practices of justice.

Jeanine Maland
GEO Organizer

To the editor:

I first met Bob three years ago when he picked me up in Northampton. I was hitchhiking to UMass. After that, I ran into him on several occasions during his work for GEO as Coalitions Coordinator and as member on the personnel committee. I will remember him as a soft and gentle– mannered person, who is loved and respected by many. It was Bob who inspired me to run on a slate with him for the upcoming Graduate Student Senate election: I spent the last few days with him before his tragic death. Bob's vision and hope will continue to inspire all of us at UMass.

Shan Manikkalingam
GEO Organizer

To the editor:

A gentle soul with a fierce commitment to social justice is how I would describe Bob. He was an incredibly enthusiastic and engaged student, and he loved to discuss important ideas and their relationship to real lives. He has left all of us, faculty and fellow students alike, with an image of a man whose life was grounded in the ideals he so profoundly believed in, whether it was in his work in prisons or his union organizing.

Sonia Nieto
Cultural Diversity and Curriculum Studies Program
School of Education

To the editor:

Bob Schapiro and I taught in the Prison Education Program out of this University for the past two semesters. We taught in the medium security prisons at Gardner and Shirley. Teaching in prison requires more than a knowledge of your subject and an ability to communicate it clearly. Each day you approach the prison with its forbidding aura of barbed wire, rows of endless chain link fences, doubled up to create a barren dead zone so reminiscent of the trap areas that characterized the concentration camps. When you enter, you enter a world of no hope.

Teaching in such an environment requires genuine compassion. For these men are the pariahs, outcasts of society; they are socially dead. For these men, Bob was a reaffirmation of their humanity. What mattered so much to Bob's students was that he did not stop thinking of them once he left the last gate.

Bob started the prison education program, a graduate student organization, in an effort to organize around issues of reintegrating ex–inmates into the social network, to re– establish the prison education program and to alert University people to the dangers of the present repressive policies that deny men and women the smallest sign of their individuality and that remove the common threads that tie them to the rest of humanity.

Bob's death has robbed these men of a friend, a protector and a hope that they can once again join the larger community outside these walls of hell. They understand, unlike the many who do not know their despair, how one individual can spell life and hope. They will never forget Bob Schapiro.

Anthony Guglielmi
economics graduate student

To the editor:

The last thing Bob Schapiro and I did together was to write a paper for The American Education Research Association Conference. The way he wanted to end the paper reflects his character and his commitment.

This is how our paper ends: "Possibly serious concern for those who do not fit will help us discover conditions for greater equality in American education. We are not equally guilty of the problems of inequality that some children experience in our schools, but we are equally responsible for creating conditions in school that help all youngsters realize their personal and academic promise."

I will miss him very much, but I know his influence will continue to guide my behavior.

Editor's note: A memorial service for Robert Schapiro will be held today at 5 p.m. in Memorial Hall. Friends, colleagues and fellow students are welcome to attend and asked to bring food to share.

Flint 'gives all' to coaching dreams, players

DAYMON SMITH/COLLEGIAN

New associate men's basketball coach James "Bruiser" Flint sits in his Mullins Center office taking one of the many important calls which constantly occupy his time.

■ Coach uses his own experience as a player to help 'young men'

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

"I was in the wrong place at the wrong time," James "Bruiser" Flint said of an experience 15 years ago that could have left him dead.

The new associate coach of the UMass men's basketball team, at age 14, was shot in the leg, but, luckily, there was no serious injury.

"[The shooting] woke me up a little bit," Flint said. "It was a definite reality check."

Luckily, the native Philadelphian (who received his unique nickname from his mother at birth) would be able to survive through the gangs which dominated his city throughout the '70s, and the drug–related violence which began to sprout up as he left for St. Joseph's University.

As a star athlete in both football and basketball at the high school level, Flint said that he attributes the better protection he received from neighborhood kids to his prowess in sports.

"[The kids] look after you when you play sports," Flint said.

And now, amongst rumor after rumor fired at UMass basketball players, Flint has offered himself as armor against these bullets, perhaps his way of giving back to those who shielded him.

"People look after you differently when you're a basketball player," he said. "There is a lot of undue pressure."

The road to UMass

As a point guard, the brain of a team on the court, an individual becomes accustomed to pressure, as did Flint at St. Joseph's, where the 5'10" hoopster would graduate as the fourth all–time assists leader and an All–Atlantic 10 Conference selection.

Flint had decided that a coaching position would best suit his desire to remain in the game after graduation, even though he said he realized that the stress involved in the profession would be high.

Because St. Joseph's was in close proximity to Flint's Southwest Philadelphia home, he was able to get an early start on his projected career as a freshman, working in summer leagues with future college standouts Jerome Allen and Eugene Burrows (who proceeded to the Universities of Pennsylvania and Richmond, respectively).

After graduation, Coppin State University capitalized on the opportunity to hire Flint to help initiate its new Division One program, first utilizing his skills as an assistant basketball coach, then elevating him to the status of assistant athletic director within one year of his arrival.

Yet, the shift from coaching to administrative duties was not a direction in which Flint wanted to proceed, he said.

"[The administrative work] got me away from coaching," he said. "I didn't want to do that."

It was thus that, in 1989, a second–year coach named John Calipari offered Flint the position of assistant coach in program that was, much like Coppin State, in a rebuilding period.

"When I played here, they were awful," Flint said of his college matchup with UMass.

Despite the school's program being in shambles, Flint said he felt confident in the abilities of the staff around him, and decided to take Calipari up on his offer.

"I knew I'd be with people who were going to work," he said.

And work Flint and company did, turning the UMass basketball team into a national contender by the 1990–91 season, including two Sweet Sixteen appearances and this season's Elite Eight appearance in the NCAA tournament.

"I always tease [Calipari] by saying they didn't start to win until I got here," he said.

The price of success

In his relationship with his father and sometimes coach, Flint said that, although his father brought out his "competitive side" winning was never emphasized when he was a developing athlete.

"My pop was like my best friend," Flint said. "He instilled in me to do the best you can do."

Unfortunately, in high profile college athletics, Flint said he realizes that there is a strong emphasis on the victory column which can take its toll on student–athletes.

In addition, with specific regard to the UMass men's team, academic travails and internal problems can also become fodder for the media, which Flint said he finds inappropriate.

"We're not talking about grown men," he said of the players. "We're talking about young men trying to be men.

"Most people don't know how hard they've worked to come from where they came, or how hard they've worked to get to where they're going."

To support players in their time in Amherst, an open door policy at Flint's third floor Mullins Center office is in effect at all times.

"It's just a matter of sitting down and seeing what they have to say," Flint said. "Once in a while, guys just come in and rap to me."

With all the glamour surrounding college basketball, Flint said that he also must try to keep potential attitude problems in check, although he admits that their separation from most of the student body is almost inevitable.

"We don't want these guys to think they're better than everybody else," he said.

Future aspirations

Inevitably, Flint acknowledges that he will have to separate himself from UMass, as did former associate coach Bill Bayno two weeks ago.

"I didn't come here to be an assistant for the rest of my life," he said.

For James "Bruiser" Flint, his rapid ascension in the college coaching ranks is not yet finished business, and he still draws from the advice his father gave him years ago in Southwest Philadelphia.

"Give it your all," he said. "Or don't give it at all."

Looking at perspectives on interracial encounters

Chinedu Ogbuike

Interracial relationships can often cause some tension on and off campus.

Some blacks and whites feel that there is nothing wrong with these relationships, while others feel that we should all stick with our kind. The pressures on people in interracial relationships come from family, friends, and society, causing some people to become afraid to express their true feelings towards a person of another color.

Interracial relationships are okay as long as both partners have legitimate feelings for each other and not because of their particular skin color. Also, what other people do is their business and nobody should tell them what they should do. In the long run, interracial relationships are okay if the two people are willing to make a commitment despite what their friends, family and society says about their involvement.

From a black man's perspective, some have said that they see nothing wrong with a brother going out with a white woman especially if he loves her or has strong feelings towards her.

Also, some brothers say that color does not matter simply because some women are beautiful regardless of their skin color and that they are not going to let someone else tell them different. However, some brothers say they are involved or have gotten involved in interracial relationships out of curiosity and in the long term don't expect to marry a white woman.

From a black woman's perspective, some sisters have said that they would not put down brothers in interracial relationships, but would not advocate them either.

Some sisters have said that brothers should not be involved in interracial relationships when there are plenty of sisters from which to choose. If brothers are involved in one then there must be something wrong with him or he must have had a bad experience with a sister in the past and has given up hope.

However, in truth, even though some if not most sisters will tell you that they do not have a problem with interracial relationships, they really might and it may hurt them inside. Overall, some sisters have said that if a brother wants to get involved with someone white that it is fine with them ... but that if something goes wrong, that brother better not come crawling back to a sister for comfort, support, or sympathy.

From a white person's perspective, it has been said by some that they don't have any problems with interracial relationships and that the color of a person's skin does not matter to them.

Historically, black men have been stereotyped as "Mandingo" figures, and black women have been forced into interracial episodes, but some of the present white generation said they should not be blamed for the past. However, some whites felt unsure about interracial relationships because they had never been involved in one or really knew anyone who was, but they may in the future.

I find nothing wrong with interracial relationships as long as both people are comfortable around each other and not allowed the pressures of family, friends, and society make their decisions for them. I also feel that if two people are in love then their skin color does not matter. However, I do have a problem with people who are involved in interracial relationships because they are solely interested in a person's skin color.

Also, two people should not be involved in any relationship if they don't truly have feelings for each other or if it is all about sex.

More or less, love is blind and two people should be left alone to make their own decisions because I have.

'Funk–O–Thon' party to return

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Only 930 tickets remain for one of the most perennially popular events in the Black community at the University of Massachusetts.

The party known as "Funk–O–Thon" will enter its 16 year on Friday at 9:30 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium, and is expected to be just as large a draw, if not larger, than its predecessors, according to Black Mass Communication Project general manager Shannen Magee.

Tickets are priced at $6 for UMass students (with the rate rising to $8 with each additional ticket), $8 for non–UMass students, and $10 for all students on the day of the event.

"The weekend's events have turned out well in the past," Magee said. "Last year was a huge success."

BMCP has sponsored "Funk–O–Thon" from its inception in 1979, during which time the party has become the RSO's biggest fundraiser.

According to Magee, word of mouth has taken the news of Funk–O–Thon to locations as far as Georgia, Texas, and Florida.

Magee said that there are several other factors which have contributed to the prosperity of the major undertaking, most notably being tight security, preparation, and respectful patrons.

Major altercations have been avoided in the past, due mostly to the student volunteers who comprise the security force.

At Friday's "Funk–O–Thon," which Magee estimates will draw approximately 1000 people, over 70 students will be on patrol, accompanied by seven police officers.

"The reality is that this event determines what happens at other events," Magee said.

Involvement from motivated students is the greatest asset that "Funk–O–Thon" and its companion fall party, Jeans–and– T–Shirt, can hope to retain from year to year, Magee said.

"I hope people will see the magnitude of what we do and want to get involved," she said. "That's what it will take for continued success."

Fraternity involved in community

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Community service has become the focus of a traditionally black fraternity on campus, starting with an effort to aid the impoverished.

Alpha Phi Alpha "sphinxmen" (a term for potential brothers trying to prove their worth to the fraternity) will be accepting donations of clothing from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Campus Center through Thursday.

The drive is their first step toward trying to heighten awareness among black and Latino organizations at the University of Massachusetts, according to sphinxman Taft Bailey, a senior.

"We are trying to revitalize community service effectiveness on campus," Bailey said.

He continued by saying that this revitalization can not rest solely on the shoulders of Alpha Phi Alpha.

"We challenge all other black organizations on campus to join us in our commitment to community service," Bailey said. "It's much easier to support the community through the community."

Bailey noted that Alpha Phi Alpha is the oldest traditionally black fraternity in the country, and includes among its ranks such prominent figures as Thurgood Marshall, Martin Luther King, and W.E.B. Du Bois (after whom the UMass library is named).

"This is one way of acknowledging their commitment to the black people," Bailey said of the past leaders. "We are trying to continue their legacy."

Fellow fraternity prospect Cordell Bagley added that Alpha Phi Alpha is also trying to seek support outside of the immediate black community on campus.

"We're looking for minority sponsors, like black–owned businesses," Bagley said. "To help in communicating to the community."

Bailey said that he would like to see the items collected during the clothing drive distributed to area shelters, Goodwill stores, and the Salvation Army.

In the near future, Bailey said he and the other sphinxmen are planning to continue their efforts through ideas such as canned food drives and various other fundraisers.

Profits from these sales may be donated to the NAACP and the Urban League, according to Bailey.

Irrelevant misconceptions about the level of seriousness in black fraternities still are a problem, Bailey remarked, a trend that the UMass chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha is trying to eradicate.

"Black fraternities are not just about throwing parties anymore," he said.

CELEBRATE ACHIEVEMENT IN THE BLACK COMMUNITY

Black Affairs needs your help for the final page of the year. If you know a graduating black senior who deserves recognition for their dedication to the improvement of UMass, send a brief bio to 113 Campus Center Basement for consideration.

Film gets by on romantic cliches

By Jon Lupo

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING
Directed by Jon Turteltaub with Sandra Bullock, Bill Pullman
Playing at Hompshire Six

People always gripe about the predictability of certain movies — the wisecracking foes of action flicks or the obvious red herrings of thrillers. But you never see this type of impatience with romantic comedies. We enter a sort of agreement with these movies, pretending we don't know what's going to happen. It makes the final clinch all the more satisfying.

While You Were Sleeping is a nice, warm little movie that is so utterly predictable you're already out the door and on your way home before the movie is done. It's not bad — there are a few smart lines and affable performances, but there's no doubting that the film's happy romantic ending is so because the movie keeps telling you it is, not by any sort of effort on its own (it makes Sleepless in Seattle look downright revolutionary).

Prism III showcases wide range of poetry, jazz, a capella

PRISM III
Fine Arts Center
April 22

The goal of the Prism III concert, which was held this past Saturday at the Fine Arts Center, was to present various forms of music and other art forms without the limits of the stage or the interruption of applause.

The eclectic roster included poetry, a piece from Stephen Soundheim, jazz, a Mozart quartet and a variety of other performances as well. Most were performed on the stage, in the orchestra pit or on platforms located on the sides of the stage. Two performances were located in the back of the concert hall.

Unfortunately the location of the two performances in the back of the hall greatly limited the audiences ability to enjoy them because of where they were placed. This was due to the fact that when standing or performing there, all you can see are the backs of the audience. Because of the uncomfortable position the audience was forced into, much of the impact of the music was lost.

However, the efforts of the producers to illustrate the diversity of music was still well appreciated by the audience. The fifth performance, The Flood by Brett Berchin, was a chaotic explosion of music hitting the audience like a freight train. The following performance, Quartet in C Major by Mozart, was a gentle violin piece which stood in very sharp contrast to The Flood. At times it did seem the concert producers were spoon feeding their musical diversity to the audience by putting two drastically different

A New Loan Program For Students And Parents
The University is pleased to announce that we have been selected by the U.S. Department of Education to participate in the new William D. Ford Direct Loan Program beginning in the 1995-96 academic year. This program provide a new way for students and parents. Under this program, the federal government will provide loan funds directly to the University to award to students and parents, thus eliminating the need for obtaining loans through banks.

How Students Apply For And Receive A Direct Loan
• Complete a Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA).
• The UMASS Financial Aid Office will evaluate your FAFSA and send you an award notice. Once you accept the award, we will mail you a Direct Loan Promissory Note to complete and return. Your Direct Loan will then be credited to your student account in the Bursar's Office.

How Parents Apply For And Receive A Direct Plus Loan
For the Federal Direct Parent Loan for dependent students, the parent borrower need only:
• Complete a FAFSA with their son or daugter
• Complete a UMASS PLUS Pre-application
• Pass a credit check
• Complete a promissory note
• Loan proceeds will then be credited directly to the student's account each semester.

The Benefits Of Direct Loans
• Reduces the time required to receive loan funds from an average of 4 months to 4 weeks!
• Eliminates the need for outside lenders (banks) and loan guarantee agencies.
• Eliminates the need for loan checks.
• Delivers loan funds to students more efficiently.
• The interest rate is no greater than 8.25% for Direct Student Loans and 9.00% for Direct Parent Loans.
• Loan fees are reduced from a maximum of 8% to 4 %.
• The same annual loan limits apply to the new Direct Loans as with prior Stafford and PLUS loans.
• Your Direct Student Loan will never be sold to another lender.

More Benefits Once Students Begin Repaying Their Loans
There will be a variety of repayment plans that will be sensitive to your ability to repay these loans. These options include:
• A standard repayment plan (10 years)
• An extended repayment plan (up to 25 years)
• A graduated repayment plan
• An income-contingent repayment plan
You will have the option to consolidate all of your current federal loans into one Federal Direct Loan and make only one payment to one place for all loans. This repayment option is available before repayment begins.

■ sleeping

its premise is quirky enough to draw you in. Sandra Bullock (Speed) is Lucy, a lonely transit token taker who fantasies over an unapproachable customer (Peter Gallagher). She even saves his life by diving onto the tracks after he's fallen. Peter is in a coma, and his boisterous family — through an only-in-a-movie mix-up — thinks Lucy is Peter's fiance. She goes along, as not to upset weak-hearted Grandma (Glynn Jubil), but now finds herself smitten with Peter's brother, Jack (Bill Pullman). But then Peter wakes up. Will real, true, super duper movie love win out? Did I not like Forrest Gump?

It's hard to critique what a crock Sleeping is, mainly because it's so damn good-natured. Bullock comes into her own, delivering a gently off-kilter performance like she's trying out to be Diane Keaton's little sister. When she says she's so alone, you want to tussle her hair, give her a hug and tell her to get over it. Bill Pullman also has a likeable enough persona, but as he's proven through his solid if uninspired roles in Spaceballs, Malice, The Favor and The Last Seduction — he has exactly one facial expression. (It doesn't help that in this movie it looks like he never changes his clothes ... even when he does.)

Though Sleeping is never more than the sum of its romantic cliches, it's certainly not unwatchable, and Bullock makes an appealing enough heroine that you're happy she gets what she wants at the end (oops, hope I didn't spoil anything) because the movie would be perverse if it didn't grant her the world. Not a great movie — it's not even pretty good — but a nice enough diversion to warrant a lowering of the critical defenses. If it doesn't exactly swoon, it flutters just enough. B– pieces side-by- side.

Many of the vocal performances at the concert were incredible. Few people can sound good singing without any musical accompaniment. An example of this is when Paul Melley sang a vocal version of "Amazing Grace" after the University Wind Ensemble performed an all-acoustical version. This was by far the best performance of the night, making the concert hall seem a little brighter, a little cooler and a bit fresher as the music emanated from the stage.

Another highlight was The A Cafellas, directed by Tony Lechner, singing "A Cappella in Acapulco." The talent of this group was unquestionable with the six of them singing so well the absence of music was forgotten.

The University Opera Workshop came through with their best singers the night of the concert. They sang well, but the piece they chose, Stephen Soundheim's "A Weekend in the Country," was so repetitive the talent of the singers was lost to the audience.

James Tate, UMass professor, lived up to his reputation of being one of the best poets around today. His two poems, Non-Stop, which was presented in the middle of the concert and Restless Leg which ended the concert, were both funny and thought provoking without conjuring up any of the overly deep imagery which can turn some people off to the genre.

The Prism III concert was outstanding and a good show for all. However, in the future the producers might consider keeping the entertainment at center stage for the enjoyment and convince of the audience.

Senior thesis to highlight three day dance event

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Alive With Dance, a three day exposition of senior dance thesises will be held at Bowker Auditorium beginning April 27 – 29 at 8 p.m.

Alive With Dance is a group of about 30 University of Massachusetts' student dancers and has been a Registered Student Organization for many years according to Mariah Lilly, a senior dance major and one of the events choreographers.

"Nine pieces will be performed and all of them are seniors' thesises by UMass dancers," said Lilly. "Each senior did one semester of research on the topic of their choice for the thesis."

According to Lilly each senior researched topics such as runaway children like Vittoria Frucci or the benefits of yoga like Renè Martin. Other topics include the power of positive thinking, self perception and body image of dancers, dreams and a tribute to experimentation and free-play in honor of jazz legend John Coltrane. Lilly's topic was the effects of television on children.

These topics are then choreographed into five to eight minute dances, no easy task according to Lilly and incorporate dance styles from modern to jazz.

"All the dances are accompanied by music. For my dance I had the music director help me create a score involving television," said Lilly.

The choreographers held audition last semester for their pieces last semester. "It's a lot of work and generally people are in rehearsal every night," said Lilly.

All of the dances will be professionally produced with funding from grants by the UMass Arts Council and the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund through Alive With Dance according to Lilly. The Fine Arts Center also contributed to the program by assisting with the technical arrangements and ticket process.

The three day program will feature the following nine pieces: "Proud Mary," "Misperceived," "The Here and Now," "Return to Innocence," "In The Past," "Missing Peace," "Surface of Depth," "Lucidity" and "Sucked In."

"This is the first year that senior thesis projects have been performed. It was finally decided that senior thesis projects had precedence and should be professionally produced," said Lilly.

Tickets are $5/general; $3/ students, senior citizens and children. Reservations are recommended and can be made by calling the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545–2511.

gize" this society.

Identity or racial politics was also given a thorough discussion by Dyson. "Americans are constantly fatigued and consumed by race," he said.

Other aspects of the black experience have played crucial roles in this theoretical debate. "Essentialism plays at multiple levels within black culture," Dyson said. It has been constantly present in the ways that blacks have responded to racial stereotypes that whites created. The reaction to the oppression took on an essentialist reaction, he added.

Tying in Marxism once again, Dyson said that the latter can help the black community develop an anti-essentialist manner of edifying new identity politics. Rap music and its corollary "hip-hop culture" constitute a new phenomenon that exemplifies a black stand against essentialism.

"Rap symbolizes the multiplicity of black identities [and] gives blacks an opportunity to speak for themselves," Dyson said. Rappers literally sing out against white essentialist oppression, he said.

Drawing an analogy to the white community, Dyson said that while white youth today are labeled as "generation x," their black counterparts make up the "lost generation."

in an already dominant agenda.

Skowronek, author of Building a New American State and Politics Presidents Make, began his talk by addressing the question, "What's wrong with Bill Clinton's Presidency?"

Skowronek stressed that there is no definite answer to the question at hand, but rather it is more important to address essential issues in evaluating a presidency.

Specifically, Skowronek sites the political capacity of the American president, what changes best bring about change and why presidents have trouble making changes in the political spectrum as key ideas to face in making a sensible evaluation of the institution of the presidency.

"The idea of change is not so much of policy change, but of how the American president changes American politics," Skowronek said.

According to Skowronek, comparing presidents to successful models like Franklin D. Roosevelt makes other presidents "irrelevant," and so is not an educated way to make political judgements.

"Presidential attributes of leaders, such as character, skill, and strategy, tell us little about political capacity of the institution of the presidency," Skowronek said.

This is attributed to the fact that each president has a different political challenge, according to Skowronek.

Skowronek added that the public meaning of what policies the president makes is more important than how much he does.

Often times critics make presidential evaluations solely based on a "100–Day" basis or a the number of accomplished goals of a presidential administration. According to Skowronek, this method is short-sighted.

Skowronek outlined the presidencies of Carter, Reagan, Bush and Clinton on an institutional basis.

"Each set out to orchesitrate a different kind of change," he said. "They provide good sampling of presidential range."

believes that her team stepped up to the Vermont challenge and made up for the absence of Warrington by pressuring their midfield and keeping the Massachusetts defense solid. She hopes her team will capitalize on this success by implementing the same team-oriented game plan against New Hampshire.

"We're coming off a great win this weekend," McClellan said. "We just came out and got to play, without worrying about it first.

"Against New Hampshire, we need to finish strong. This game will be challenging but it could be a coin toss. I think we look good going into it."

New Hampshire boasts an experienced team of almost all seniors, in contrast to the young Massachusetts team, led by their lone senior Diane MacNeil. However, UMass edges the Wildcats' leading scorers' stats, with freshman Joanna Dignazio, who leads the team with 24 goals this season, and sophomore Stephanie Walsh (15 goals).

UMass also has the standout goaltending of freshman Kate Brew, who has a save percentage of 0.622, the fourth highest in the nation.

Although the Wildcats have the advantages of an older team and experience on their side, McClellan is still optimistic.

"New Hampshire is not a young team. They've played together longer than we have. But they have been up and down this season, so it's still anyone's game."

Against common opponents this season, Massachusetts and New Hampshire have faired the same. Both universities defeated Holy Cross and Vermont, and lost to Yale and Temple.

As for Hofstra, the Wildcats crushed Hofstra 17–2, while the Minutewomen's were beat by the Catamounts, 11-10.

EUNICE R. KONIECZNY STUDENT LEADERSHIP AWARD

The Eunice R. Konieczny Student Leadership Award was established in 1985 to annually recognize students who exemplify the highest leadership and public service ideals to the entire university community and who demonstrate a commitment to the vitality of the Student Activities Trust Fund(SATF). Student participation in out of class activities as a complement to academics involves personal development, leadership and team building, sensitivity to diversity, and advocacy for student needs and concerns. Award candidates must show how their participation enriches both their organization and by extension, the larger campus community. This award honors Eunice R. Konieczny who provided over twenty years of dedicated service to the Student Government Association.

QUALIFICATIONS

1. Any undergraduate senior who is a current officer in a Registered Student Organization (RSO) or the Student Government Association (SGA) at UMass Amherst, and who has had one academic year of experience as an office holder prior to this time may apply.

2. A recipient must have a cumulative G.P.A. of 3.0 or above.

APPLICATIONS ARE AVAILABLE IN THE CAMPUS ACTIVITIES OFFICE 418 STUDENT UNION BUILDING

Completed applications must be received Friday, May 5, 1995 by 4:30 pm

as well. It means we've taken one of our great graduates of soccer to the next level," he said. "I can't think of anyone better prepared to go out there."

"She learned a lot here. It's a bittersweet reaction for all of us. I hope to find someone as qualified to take her place."

Some of the UMass players expressed the same feeling.

"I think it's great for her but it's a loss for us definitely," sophomore defender Erin Lynch said. "She definitely deserves it. It's a great opportunity for her.

"She was a great assistant and she'll be an even better head coach. The [Syracuse] players will be lucky. She knows so much about the game. She taught us a lot.

"She'll do great things up there. I'll definitely miss her coaching. Off the field she was more than just a coach. She helped us out with personal problems too. She's a great motivator."

"She's a great coach," sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers said. "I respected her and everyone else on the team respected her too. She'll be hard to replace no matter how you look at it."

Graduating seniors expressed pleasure upon hearing about Kater's hiring.

"I think it's fantastic. It couldn't of happened to a better person," senior forward Melissa Mitchell said. "She's an outstanding coach. She has a great coach-player relationship. She has a good knowledge of the game.

"Practices weren't boring with her. She makes it exciting. She makes you want to come to practice. I idolize her."

"I knew it was coming," senior defender Heidi Kocher said. "I think she deserves to be a head coach."

just in Georgia, but also in Michigan and West Virginia. Combined with the Atlantic 10 Championships and the NCAA Regionals, the level of competition UMass encountered was on a scale the program has never faced.

With the defeats of No. 21 West Virginia (190.925–190.725) and No. 9 Penn State (188.025–151.575) on the road, the challenge UMass posed to top teams will aid in the national picture for them next year. But for Kuzara, the late season contributions of freshmen Penny Lebeau and Karen Maurer were key, and are good signs for the team.

"The conclusion of the Regionals was a bit disappointing," Kuzara said. "When the meet was over, though, there was not one sad face on the UMass squad, because we had done our job. With Penny and Karen, when we recruited them, we said they were diamonds in the rough. We felt they had a lot of talent, and they were overlooked.

"I feel at the end of the season they performed the best gymnastics of their careers, and they are still going to improve for next year."

For the 1995 Northeast Regional champion, she also sees a bright future for the Minutewomen. Tolhurst is optimistic, as most of the team, including the nucleus of herself and super sophomores Tara Swartz and Lianne Laing, are returning next season. They will combine with a first-rate recruiting class for the 1995–96 season.

"We have a great group of freshman coming in next year, and we will still have Tara, Lianne and most of this year's team," Tolhurst said. "I think if we stay together as a team, like we did this year, we are going to be real tough to beat."

Unbeaten women's track set for Penn

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Things were starting to get monotonous for the undefeated University of Massachusetts women's track and field team as they prepared for the prestigious Penn Relays.

On Saturday, coach Julie LaFreniere ran runners in unusual places, a different international scoring system was used, and Rosie Bryan returned from an extended absence due to a hamstring injury. But monotony ruled the day, as once again UMass (12–0) topped their competition.

The Minutewomen finished with 144 points on Saturday, ahead of New Hampshire (115) and Dartmouth (98) in a tri- meet held at Llewelyn Derby Track.

"They were hoping to end up undefeated and we were, so we reached one of our goals for the season," LaFreniere said.

Anya Forrest and Janey Meeks each captured a pair of events for UMass. Forrest captured the 100 meters in 12.6 seconds and qualified for the ECAC Championships by finishing the 100 meter hurdles in 14.5 seconds, despite hitting the first hurdle.

Meeks won two field events for the Minutewomen, capturing the high jump (5'5") and the triple jump (39'3/4").

LaFreniere's juggling act featured sprinter Nicole Roberts running the 800 meters. Roberts blazed out to a huge early lead, but slowly ran out of gas and finished in fifth place. She will run a leg of the 4 x 800 relay at Penn.

All-Atlantic 10 cross country runner and distance specialist Rebecca Donaghue was called upon to run the 200 meters, an event usually run by Roberts. Donaghue wound up finishing a solid third in 26.8 seconds, just a fraction of the second off the pace. Donaghue won the 400 meters, as well, in 59.6 seconds.

"I was pleased with Rebecca," LaFreniere said. "For a cross country runner to finish third in the 200 meters is great. She ran really well. On Nicole's 800 [meters], though, she did the opposite of what she should have done. She should have run slower, but her competitive instincts took over when she heard the gun."

Rosie Bryan's long-awaited return was successful as she won the long jump with a 18 foot, one inch leap.

Adding to the bizarre atmosphere, Heather Brown failed to win the javelin for the first time this season. She finished second by just four inches.

Other UMass highlights included Julie Moreau (39:24.6) and Kristen Kroger (39:30.7) finishing first and second respectively in the 10,000 meters.

After literally dropping the baton on last week's race, the 4 x 100 meter relay team won their event in 49.2 seconds. Sillia Kenku roared to a spectacular 65.9 second victory in the 400 meter hurdles.

The Minutewomen will next compete tomorrow in Philadelphia at the Penn Relays. UMass will face fierce competition from schools throughout the country, and the Relays will provide a solid estimate of how the 12–0 Minutewomen stack up against national competition before the NCAAs.

Sunday, UMass will travel to Providence for the Brown Invitational. This will be an important competition for Minutewomen who are still looking to qualify for the upcoming New England Championships. The Brown Invitational will represent their final opportunity to qualify.

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Stick to your present commitments. Strong emotional undercurrents could lead to a rewarding union. Welcome an opportunity to date someone you have long admired.

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): Lucky events could have considerable impact on a partnership's finances. A household purchase or repair will bring greater domestic comfort. Use your influence on others to help them improve their lives.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): A great day for dealing with publishers or other experts who can affect your career. Listen closely. Profits and savings can be increased. Current business trends will continue; better news is still to come.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Be more careful with your money, especially in social situations. Developing a better understanding with that special person in your life should be a top priority. Shared interests will make your life together more fulfilling.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Keep your wits about you when temptation beckons. Say "no" to potentially embarrassing situations. A "wild" idea could save you money and time. Use any spare hours to work on an important personal project.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Routine assignments will demand special attention today. Co-workers could be argumentative. Unexpected good news offsets any disappointments you might suffer. Guard your valuables when traveling. Share secrets only with your mate or business partner.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Be firm. Refuse to let someone else's problems interfere with your personal life. Taking a commonsense approach to financial matters could work wonders. Your role as a mediator could be questioned. Hang in there.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): The discovery of some forgotten funds will bring smiles. A married couple reaches a new depth in the relationship. Give a wide berth to anyone who is reckless when handling money. Artistic inspiration will return.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): You have the world on a string. Fly your financial kite with confidence. Make room on your agenda for festive gatherings. Giving free rein to your imagination helps you cultivate your artistic and creative talents.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Career progress depends on your showcasing your talents to best advantage. Handle personal matters away from your usual work environment. Your solutions are inventive and will produce lasting results.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): A family or property- related crisis may be lessened this morning. Use greater tact when dealing with a lonely friend. Attend to loved ones' needs immediately, even if you must juggle your work schedule.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Brilliant ideas seem to come to you in waves. Thank your lucky stars! A romance or business venture sets sail on a sea of promise. What you launch today will have a big impact tomorrow.

Baseball splits double dip with Black Bears

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

Ryan Jette and Muchie Dagliere were the difference offensively for the University of Massachusetts baseball team in a doubleheader against the University of Maine at Earl Lorden Field yesterday.

The duo set the table and accounted for three of Massachusetts' runs in a 4–3 victory over the Black Bears in the opener. However, in the nightcap, the Maine pitching staff shut down the pair at the top of the Minuteman line-up for the first four innings, en route to a 15–6 win for the visitors.

The split of the double dip ended Massachusetts' undefeated streak at home (12 straight wins). The Minutemen now stand at 24–9, while Maine sits at 18–28.

Jette, the left–fielder for the Minutemen, and Dagliere, the second baseman, gave the Black Bears fits all day long, beginning in the first inning of game one. Jette singled off of Maine's starter Dave Foran to open the contest.

The junior proceeded to steal second and third base on consecutive pitches. Then, with Dagliere at the plate, Foran (0–7) uncorked a wild pitch, allowing Jette to scamper home for a 1–0 Minuteman lead.

After the Black Bears took the lead with single runs in the second and third, Dagliere haunted Maine again. The freshman blasted Foran's 1–1 offering deep to rightfield for the second homerun of his career (second in three days), knotting the game at 2–2.

The tandem would strike one more time in the fifth to give the Minutemen the lead for good. With one out, Jette was hit by a pitch and stole second, his third theft of the ballgame. Dagliere promptly sent a running Jette home with a hit–and–run single to right for the 3–2 advantage.

Dagliere went 2–for–3 in the game (5–for–7 on the day) with a run scored, two runs batted in and the HR; Jette raised his team–leading stolen base total to 18, in addition to scoring two runs.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Mark Pileski connects in the first game of the Massachusetts baseball team's doubleheader against Maine. The Minutemen split with the Black Bears (4–3, 15–6).

Massachusetts right–hander Jason Bennett (4–0) scattered seven hits in six and two–thirds innings of work to notch the win, but ran into trouble in the seventh. After allowing a run in the final stanza with one out, Bennett was replaced by Chad Sullivan, who shut the door on the Black Bears with two flies to right, picking up his third save.

Maine starter Brad Veilleux kept Jette and Dagliere off the bases for the majority of game two, while the Black Bear offense battered Minuteman pitching. Massachusetts right– hander Steve Levy (0–1) was touched up for four runs on three hits in the first inning alone and was saddled with the loss.

Levy, who normally sees time out of the bullpen, received the start for the Minutemen and only lasted two and two– thirds innings, allowing five runs on six hits and walking four Black Bears. Massachusetts went through three pitchers as Maine seemingly did what it wanted at the plate, beginning with the four–run first.

The Black Bears built a 10–3 lead through five innings, before Jette and Dagliere got the Minutemen on the board again. After Jette walked, Dagliere roped a double to left– centerfield, driving him home and cutting the lead to 10–4, the closest Massachusetts would get.

The Minutemen return to action today on the road against Siena College (4 p.m.), before heading to Morgantown, W. Va., for a huge Atlantic 10 three–game showdown with West Virginia.

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

Kelly Daut won her 19th game of the season as the Massachusetts softball team clinched the A-10 regular season title.

Softball wins A-10 title for fifth consecutive year

The University of Massachusetts softball team captured the Atlantic 10 Conference regular season title yesterday afternoon, sweeping Rhode Island 6–2, 3–0 in a doubleheader played in Kingston, R.I.

With the two wins, the Minutewomen (29–14), who increased their league record to 9–1, won the regular season conference title for the fifth consecutive season, and seventh overall.

Freshman Kim Gutridge extended her hitting streak to 21 games with a hit in each of the games. Gutridge hit a double in the opener, and a belted a home-run in the second game.

The streak ties Gutridge for the second longest in Massachusetts softball history, along with Sam Cardenas, whose streak came earlier this season. The record is 27 games held by Barb Mareau, set during the 1992 season.

Kelly Buckley blasted a home-run, which went back–to– back with Gutridge's homer, and gave the Minutewomen a 2–0 lead. They managed to score another run for the shutout over the Rams.

Dani Ortega (10–8) registered the victory, allowing no runs on seven hits while striking out two URI batters.

In the first game, Kelly Daut won her 19th game of the season, and hit a triple that knocked in three runs in the fourth inning. Heather Dorsey led the Minutewomen offense, going 2–4 and scoring a run.

Massachusetts return to action on Thursday, April 27, when they host Army in a doubleheader. Today's doubleheader with Yale was cancelled.

Syracuse names Kater as coach

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts athletic department lost another top assistant coach to a head coaching vacancy yesterday.

Less than a month after men's basketball associate coach Bill Bayno was named head coach at the University of Nevada–Las Vegas, UMass assistant women's soccer coach and UMass graduate April Kater was named head coach at Syracuse University.

"I'm excited. It's a great opportunity," Kater said. "It's good for me, and just for women's soccer and female athletics. Syracuse is sound both academically and athletically."

Kater was also interviewed by Boston University, Old Dominion, Fresno State, the University of South Carolina and Memphis State, along with several other Division I schools.

April Kater

Kater is expected to start on June 1. The Syracuse program is brand new and will begin play in 1996, giving Kater a full year to recruit. A new soccer stadium is currently being built.

"All of the support system is there. Across the board, Syracuse is top of the line. It's big time. It's very attractive," Kater said. "Syracuse really has it together. It is providing me the opportunity to be successful. They're really going about it the right way."

Kater was an assistant at UMass for the past two years. Prior to returning to Amherst two years ago, Kater was an assistant at West Virginia Wesleyan College, a NAIA/NCAA Division II women's soccer program, for a year.

"I think working at a school like UMass has taught me a lot about the way to run a program," she said.

During her playing days at UMass, Kater played on three NCAA Tournament teams and was a three–time NSCAA first–team All–America selection, a two–time Adidas Academic All–America selection and a three–time Olympic Sports Festival participant.

In 1990, Kater became the only UMass soccer player, man or woman, to receive the Hermann Award, given to the nation's top collegiate man and woman soccer player. The Hermann Award is the most prestigious award a collegiate soccer player can receive.

Kater expressed sadness about leaving UMass.

"I love UMass. I like the area and I like the people. I'm definitely not going to forget UMass," she said. "I think the hardest thing will be leaving the players."

UMass head coach Jim Rudy expressed both happiness and sadness about his former player and assistant's departure.

"It's a great loss for us and a great victory for us.

No. 10 men's lacrosse to face Bulldogs today

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Today at 3 p.m. the No. 10 University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team spends another Wednesday as guest of an Ivy League foe, Yale, and here is the question: will it be cold, close, or both?

The Minutemen are coming off a pair of tight, crucial wins over then–No. 18 Harvard last Wednesday, 8–6, and then–No. 11 Notre Dame, 10–9, on Saturday. Forecasts call for sunny skies in New Haven, Conn., and with the Bulldogs outscored 45–19 in its last three games, all losses, the answer for UMass may be none of the above.

After a lackluster defeat to unranked Delaware on April 15, UMass coach Greg Cannella said his team had to run the table to make the post–season, an obvious goal for a team returning 25 lettermen and key starters at each position for last year's 9–5 squad. UMass appeared in the NCAA tournament in seven of the previous eight seasons.

The Minutemen will be without standout senior goalkeeper Tom LoPresti, who suffered a right thigh contusion in the win over the Irish. He was expected to miss two weeks but may attempt to play in Saturday's pivotal home game against No. 2 Syracuse.

John Kasselakis will likely start in goal for UMass. The freshman native of Manhasset, N.Y., started one game (a 19– 5 defeat of New Hampshire) and has a 6.3 goals against average and .444 save percentage in four appearances.

Senior attack Jeremy Murphy, second on the team in goals with 16, strained his left hamstring Saturday but will play today. Murphy has a long history of left knee problems but this injury is not considered serious.

Yale typically finds itself picking up the rear in the conference standings behind Princeton, Brown, Harvard and Dartmouth, and this year is no different. The Bulldogs, 5–7 (2–4 in the Ivy), have not found the net while leading opponents there without obstruction. Yale has been outscored 144–106.

Yale's man down unit is in arrears: opponents have connected on extra man opportunities at a 42.2–percent clip (19 of 45). The Bulldogs have only converted 14 of 56 chances, a 25–percent rate of efficiency.

There's no doubt who the focus is in Yale's meager attack. Tom Zaccagnino leads all Bulldogs with 30 goals, though four of his teammates are in double digits. Tony Rousou is second with 16 (and 25 assists), which make him the team's leading scorer with 41 points.

"I think Zaccagnino's one of the best midfielders in the nation," Cannella said. Dennis Kelly will cover Zaccagnino.

Yale goaltender Peter Tourian has faced a barrage of shots this year, an average of 23.7 on net per contest. He's not stopping enough of them, as his 50.7 save percentage and 11.81 GAA attest.

If Brendan Glass fails to surpass his 1994 goal total of 33 this afternoon, he will have had an off day. Glass enters today's game with 30 goals, an average of 3.75 per game.

Yale only has one win in its last seven games, and it was taken to overtime by Boston College before winning 12–11 in overtime.

Today's game and all others can be heard on WMUA 91.1 FM, the flagship station for UMass men's lacrosse.

Tolhurst's NCAA trip finishes season

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The return to Athens, Ga. was what capped off the season for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (14–12), as junior JJ. Tolhurst competed individually in the NCAA Championships last week. The Northeast Region's all around champion was there with the best in the country, and it was not a new scene for her.

On March 12, the star Minutewoman, with the rest of the team, performed in the Lady Bulldog Invitational. The top teams were there also, as then No. 1 Georgia, No. 7 UCLA, No. 10 Penn State and No. 16 Nebraska represented the cream of the national crop.

The team did well, but the talent level of the best in the nation was too much to overtake, as UMass finished last out of six teams with an impressive 190.525 overall tally.

The same occurred for Tolhurst last Thursday in her return to Athens, as she only scored .200 of a point below her Regional title score of 38.350, but it was not enough to advance to Saturday's finals.

Tolhurst's fall on the balance beam (9.10) took away from a potential career–high performance. Her scores on the uneven bars (9.60), the vault (9.65) and an incredible 9.80 on the floor exercise showed the competitive steadiness which is her trademark.

For second year coach Dave Kuzara, Tolhurst's NCAA appearance, and the team's performance against the tops in the land this year, signifies a big step forward from last season for the program.

"Last year at this time, the team did not want to see gymnastics anymore," Kuzara said. "Now, they can not wait to get back into the gym, and work on new things and iron out some wrinkles before next season.

"So, we are really happy with the overall attitude. With the way we competed in meets, and the way we were able to train in the last month, we felt for the first time since we have been here that all our work has been showing."

The last month of the season was a marker for the team, as the Minutewomen's schedule featured meets not

Minutewomen, UNH battle at Totman Field

By Allison Connolly

There could be a second chance at greatness for the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team when they host the University of New Hampshire (5–3) today at 1 p.m. at Totman Field.

The Minutewomen (3–7) are coming off a big win from last weekend, having defeated Vermont 17–9. This win was especially sweet as the team was still smarting from the tough loss to Hofstra, where UMass was defeated 11–10 on a penalty shot.

The team was also without the midfield defensive talents of Michelle Warrington, who was injured in the Hofstra game.

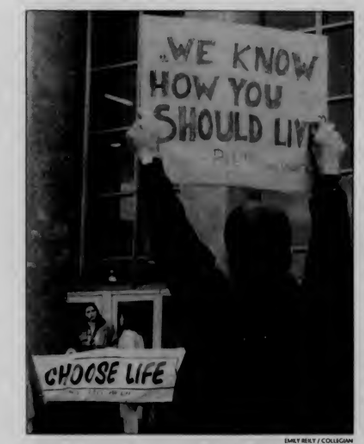
Pro–life rally faces hostile crowd



EMILY REET / COLLEGIAN
Carri Stapp, director of the American Rights Coalition, spoke of misinformation in abortion services at yesterday's pro–life rally on the Student Union steps.

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student organization held a rally yesterday afternoon to urge people to fight for increased regulations on abortion procedures.

Students for Life, a registered student organization which promotes a pro–life stance in the abortion debate, assembled an hour-long rally on the Student Union steps to "educate and inform," according to Veronica Breckheimer, president of Students for Life. Approximately 70 attended.

As the rally shifted from a political discussion to a religious debate, the shouting outside the Student Union grew progressively louder and signs declaring messages such as "Freedom From Religion" and "U.S. Out of My Ovaries" danced atop a small crowd of protestors.

By the end of the rally, the last speaker's speech was nearly inaudible. The audience wrapped up the event with a chant of "One, two, three, four — take your dogma out the door."

Prior to the commotion, Debra Olish, a woman who had her first of four abortions as a freshman in college, told her story.

She emphasized the importance of giving people appropriate information and resources before allowing them to decide on an abortion.

"I was never warned about complications, I didn't have medical check–ups and they knew nothing about me.

"I just want them to give out the truth and the right information," Olish said. "I was not given information — I was given a solution."

Her story was not unusual, but typical, according to Carri Stapp, director of the American Rights Coalition in Boston.

The abortion industry intentionally rushes people through the process in order to make a profit and does not take into account patients' physical and emotional needs, Stapp said.

"It is an unregulated industry. There are no options discussed — they don't care if people are informed," Stapp said.

According to Stapp, information rarely distributed at abortion clinics is that the procedure can potentially result in infection, hysterectomy, infertility or death.

Patients are not informed of health problems that can take place long after the abortion is performed. The risk of breast cancer is increased from 50 to 90 percent for women who had their first abortion when they were under the age of 18, she said.

"We want to protect the industry," Stapp said. "One hundred and thirty women have died from abortions since they were legalized, and there are 200 more cases being investigated."

Some audience members saw the speakers' approach as a deceptive ploy to make an extreme statement appear moderate and put female speakers in front of a male–dominated movement.

"[These women are] pawns," said Emma Goldman, a graduate student in anthropology. "They're like aluminum siding on a rotting house."

Clinton fights terrorism with bipartisan agenda

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Trying to prevent a repeat of the Oklahoma City bombing, President Clinton on Wednesday proposed adding 1,000 federal workers to the fight against terrorism and endorsed stiffer penalties for attacks on government employees.

"We cannot allow our entire country to be subjected to the horror the people of Oklahoma City have endured," Clinton said at the start of a meeting with congressional leaders from both parties.

The president, who on Sunday offered an initial series of recommendations to fight terrorism, proposed additional initiatives just hours after attending the funeral of a Secret Service agent killed in the bombing.

Clinton said the measures were "grounded in common sense and steeled with force."

Flanked by Sen. Bob Dole and Rep. Newt Gingrich, the leaders of the GOP-controlled Congress, the president said he was hopeful his proposals would find bipartisan support.

"I want us to work together to get the job done," he said. Likewise, Dole, R-Kan., held out hope for bipartisanship, saying, "We've got a lot of ideas, the president's laid his out, we hope to incorporate all or most of those and add ours." He said he was hopeful for congressional action by Memorial Day.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., said many of Clinton's suggestions were positive. He added that the proposal to add 1,000 federal workers — costing $1.2 billion over 5 years — was "expensive and so we'll have to look at those issues."

The move to expand law enforcement powers has some civil liberties and conservative groups concerned about interference with constitutional rights, but Clinton said he was confident "we can strike the right balance."

"For anyone who dares to sow terror on American land, justice must be swift, certain and severe," Clinton said. "We must move so that we can prevent this kind of thing from happening again."

House Speaker Gingrich promised congressional cooperation, adding, "I think it can be done with everybody's civil liberties protected."

The newest proposals from Clinton would expand law enforcement officials' powers to investigate and prosecute, as well as increase penalties for those who attack federal employees or provide firearms or explosives used in violent crimes or drug trafficking. He would add 1,000 new agents, prosecutors and support personnel to fight terrorism.

Committee votes on partnership policy

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — After nearly two hours of discussion at a public forum, the Northampton Ordinance Committee voted Tuesday night to send a domestic partnership ordinance to the Northampton City Council, where it will be voted on at a later date.

If passed, the ordinance will establish a framework for the recognition of domestic partnerships within the city of Northampton. Such recognition would extend the rights of unmarried couples who are "in a relationship of mutual support, caring and commitment and intend to remain in such a relationship."

City Council Member Maureen Tobin told a packed meeting room that the forum had been called by the Ordinance Committee for "decision-making purposes."

After the forum and a lengthy discussion by the council involving amendments, two councilors voted to send the ordinance to City Council. One councilor abstained.

The ordinance will be given a "first reading" at next week's City Council meeting and a possible "second reading" at the meeting after that, Tobin said. The council will vote on the ordinance two weeks after the final reading.

Qualifications and rights

To qualify to register for the ordinance, domestic partners must not be related by blood closer than would bar marriage in Massachusetts and must be over 18 years old. Individuals would have to be each other's sole partners and "consider themselves to be a family."

The primary beneficiaries of the ordinance would be residents who are in same–sex relationships and are unable to marry, but heterosexual couples would also benefit.

Under the terms of the ordinance, a domestic partner would be entitled to the following rights:

- Same visitation rights as a spouse or parent at any public health care facility owned, operated or controlled by the city of Northampton.
- Same visitation rights as a spouse or parent of a person in custody at all city–run correctional facilities (e.g. holding cells, jails and juvenile facilities), but not facilities owned or operated by Hampshire County or by the state.

In addition, a domestic partner who is also the custodial parent or legal guardian of a child would be able to notify any public school in Northampton that his or her domestic partner may have access to the child. The partner would be able to consult the child's school records, discuss the child with school personnel, and remove the child from school in case of sickness or family emergency.

The ordinance also applies to non–resident couples who are visiting Northampton and registered as domestic partners in other cities and towns.

To be eligible for benefits, Northampton couples would have to file a domestic partnership registration form with the City Clerk. Fees connected to registration would be equivalent to fees paid for a marriage license.

Domestic partnership would terminate with the death of one of the partners or the filing of a termination statement.

Except in the case of death, a domestic partner would not be able to register another partnership for a period of 90 days after the termination of his or her previous partnership.

Residents speak up

By the time the public forum began at 7 p.m., City Council chambers were packed to the rafters with residents concerned about the ordinance. The audience filled all available seats, sat on the floor in front of the council tables, and stood in the aisles, at the back of the hall, and even outside.

During the forum, Tobin opened the floor for a maximum of three–minute speeches and alternated speakers between those in support of the ordinance and those opposed.

More than 20 speakers addressed the committee with their concerns, which came from a wide variety of political, social and religious backgrounds.

Restating the position taken in a paid advertisement in last weekend's Hampshire Gazette by local Catholic clergy, Rev. Donald R. LaPointe of the Sacred Heart in Northampton stated that "[this legislation] not only rejects moral norms ... but also undermines the institutions of marriage and family."

Rev. Vincent M. O'Connor of St. Catherine's Parish in Leeds said the recognition of domestic partnerships runs contrary to the idea of family dictated by the Bible. In the Biblical story of creation, God created the family as man and woman, O'Connor said.

"I'm relying on what [God] thinks not so much on what I think," he said.

The clerk of the Northampton Quaker Meeting, Bruce Hawkins, had a different take on the ordinance. Following a measure adopted by the Meeting last year, Hawkins supported the ordinance as a measure that affirms the goodness of good relationships.

He said passage of the ordinance would follow the teaching of Jesus to "love your neighbor as yourself."

Some speakers were gays and lesbians who are in relationships that would allow them to registers as domestic partners. Northampton resident Jack Warner told people at the meeting that he is seeking validation for the "happy, comfortable, devoted relationship" he has with his partner.

Space applications due May 1 for new 'international house'

By Herndn Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts are being invited to take part in new opportunities involving an international approach to student interaction and with an emphasis on multiculturalism in everyday situations.

Thatcher Residence Hall, in the Northeast Residential Area, has been renamed Thatcher International House, providing a change for students to learn about other cultures. The residential program will begin in the fall semester.

"[Students will] have a place to prepare international meals, to hold cultural events, to host other people from other countries who to come to UMass to give a talk," said Thérèse Pasquale, associate director of Residential Academic Programs.

A similar, less developed program of international–style living had been located in the foreign language suites in Brown Residence Hall since 1986.

An interest in languages should be a priority for interested students, although majoring in a foreign language is not required.

The application deadline for space in the new Thatcher International House is May 1. For more information, please contact Thérèse Pasquale at 545–2882.

Holocaust survivors and their children relive their experiences

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

Saying she hadn't thought of herself as a survivor until she was labeled as such, Hedy Rose spoke as part of a panel discussing the effects of the Holocaust on survivors and the children of survivors Tuesday night at Hillel House.

Also speaking to the 30 people in attendance were two children of survivors, Shlomit Shalfi and Erica Katz. The panel was a part of the events for Holocaust Memorial Week organized by Hillel's Holocaust Memorial Committee.

Story of a survivor

Rose explained that she decided to tell her story when she heard a rabbi say on the radio, "'Someday this whole thing will be made into a holiday ... and people will say it couldn't have happened,'" Rose said.

Rose said she felt her voice was needed to say the Holocaust was real.

Rose told her story of being hidden like Anne Frank, in a friend's home in Amsterdam. She spoke of her excitement, when she was only 6, of going to school. But very quickly, Jews had to wear a yellow star to differentiate them and then lost the privilege of going to school.

She also related the story of how her best friend lived next door at the time. One day she went out into the yard and called for her friend to come out and play. Her friend did come out, but only to spit on Rose and call her a dirty Jew.

Later, when Nazi soldiers came to take Rose's father to Auschwitz, they told the rest of the family, "We'll come back for you later." Rose's mother grabbed her and her sister and brought them to a friend's home where they stayed hidden for four years, not allowed to go outside for fear of being captured.

Rose said her experiences in the Holocaust still affect her — when travelling through Europe almost 20 years later, she refused to go through Germany until a snowslide forced her to. Even then, said Rose, she was shaking, though the soldiers in Germany were very polite.

A child's shame

"I was ashamed," Shalfi said. "Ashamed my mother had an accent."

Shalfi relayed her story of growing up as the child of two Holocaust survivors who emigrated to Israel after the war was over.

She said for many years her mother wouldn't talk about what had happened because it was too painful. It wasn't until last year, almost 50 years after the Holocaust ended, that her mother did speak.

She told a story of how her sister was sent to a "Jewish adventure camp," and never came back. It wasn't until after the war that she found out her sister was in the first batch sent to Auschwitz to be killed in the gas chambers.

Shalfi told of how her mother survived by being passed off as a Polish Catholic and she was told she was "too pretty to be Jewish."

She said the effects of the Holocaust have carried on into her, through her parents that survived.

"It's part of me," Shalfi said, relating how she was named after her grandfather who died in the Holocaust.

According to Shalfi, her parents still treat her like a 5-year-old, who could be taken away at any minute. She also spoke of her parents' fear of leaving Israel because they were afraid something bad would happen.

Her parents also deal with the basics first when they talk, Shalfi said. They ask "how do you eat?" before asking "how are you?"

She also said she fears her parents will pass away and she won't know enough about what happened to them during the Holocaust.

Unconscious impact

Katz, also the child of Holocaust survivors, spoke of the unconscious impact her parents had on her.

She said her parents didn't talk at all about their experiences and now that they are both dead, she will never know their whole stories.

Her mother worked in a labor camp until relatives were able to bribe someone to release her, and then she moved to England. Katz said she didn't know how her father escaped to England.

She said she grew up in poor flats in London, which were 90 percent "damaged people." The term survivor wasn't used then, Katz said.

She also spoke of being embarrassed of her parents and their foreign accents.

"It was hard to grow up in a family where your parents have been through the unspeakable," Katz said. "Your problems seem trivial."

She said growing up with her parents has left her with irrational behavior and thoughts at times. For example, Katz said she was at a theater in Brandeis with a predominantly Jewish audience and she was afraid someone was going to bomb it.

While the panelists spoke of their experiences and how they have been affected, a different view came from the audience.

Frieda Kliger, an audience member who was also a survivor, said it hurts at times when people don't ask about life before the camps.

"We are not just survivors — we carry with us our families and traditions," Kliger said. "We are people, not only survivors of Auschwitz."

Correction

In yesterday's front-page story regarding possible taxation of the Campus Center Hotel, the amount of money donated in free services to the University of Massachusetts was incorrectly reported. According to Hill Boss, Amherst selectboard member, the town of Amherst provides $1 million in free services to the University.

This story also incorrectly said the town of Amherst provides police services to the University. The University has its own police force for the campus and University-owned apartments.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

Artist awarded degree

By Gina Larson
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts saluted the internationally renowned artist Chuck Close Tuesday at a convocation ceremony held in the Fine Arts Center.

Close was presented with an honorary doctorate of fine arts by the University for his extraordinary accomplishments in painting.

The ceremony itself was highlighted by colorful performances by the University Jazz ensemble and a special presentation of "This little light of mine" from Horace C. Boyer and the A-Caffellas.

Lee R. Edwards, the dean of humanities and fine arts, opened the celebration with words of welcome for the artist who had formerly taught painting at UMass for two years, ending in 1967.

"This return has been a long time coming," Edwards said. "Your life has been marked by genius. Your genius has come to marvel us."

Present at the ceremony was Nan Rosenthal, consultant to the Department of 20th Century Art at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, to discuss the genius of Close's work.

Close's work displays an infallible intuition for color and form, Rosenthal said. She pointed to a recent self portrait standing 5 feet 4 inches recently painted by Close.

"Hastily, you would describe this painting as a black and white painting," Rosenthal said. "But upon careful scrutiny, I was able to count 72 different colors."

Close's work has been recognized throughout the world for his unique style of photo-realist painting in which he composes human faces of friends, family and other artists with mosaic-like grids of dashes, dots and even fingerprints.

Rosenthal outlined a portrait of the artist's work over the past 30 years pointing out the change Close has made from black and white to color, from primaries to pastels, and then from agonizingly accurate detail to distortion of the focus in his images.

Chancellor David K. Scott presented the diploma and vested Close in his hood.

Upon his acceptance, Close said he has always been grateful for his time at UMass.

"It was here, 30 years ago in September, that I came to Amherst and the seeds of my life and my mature work evolved," he said.

Close first began working with photography at UMass and began experimenting with the style of painting that he has come to be recognized for, he said.

There can be seen a "flowing of the spirit" in the art that Close has created, according to Hanlyn Davies, chair of the art department.

"The body of work that [Close] has produced over the past 30 years has emphatically and indelibly secured his place in the long history of art."

SGA to review budget for 1996

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

An overview of the fiscal year '96 budget for Registered Student Organizations (RSO) was presented to the Student Government Association senate, which later bickered about the possibility of a size modification in its body for the upcoming year at last night's meeting.

The senate will introduce its proposed budget for all RSOs to the senate on May 3, according to Sean Carter of the senate's Ways and Means committee.

Prior to spring break, each RSO seeking funding presented the senate with their requested budget, Carter said.

"The RSOs came to a hearing and [the Ways and Means Committee] deliberated. We recommend based on their budgets, interviews, group hearings and other information."

The May 3 meeting will be open to RSO members who wish to protest or support the senate's proposed budget for their group, Carter said.

"It is all RSOs' best interest to show up for this meeting," he said.

The meeting will pose changes in the proposed budget brought forth by the Ways and Means committee, he said.

"The bottom numbers [the senate] comes up with cannot be changed," Carter said.

According to Speaker Tom Darby, meetings concerning the budget usually drag on until midnight or later.

Casa Latina offers diversity course exploring Latino, Spanish culture

By Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Correspondent

Casa Latina, Inc., a community educational and cultural awareness center in Northampton, is sponsoring a functional Spanish course, giving students a chance to learn Spanish in a non-traditional atmosphere while simultaneously exploring the dynamics of Latino.

The emphasis on linguistic detail is supplemented by an approach concentrating more on individualized communication skills. "This sort of Spanish allows a student to express themselves and talk," said Ana R. Rodriguez, cultural education coordinator of Casa Latina.

"Emphasis is given to the ability to communicate effectively without excessive mental gymnastics," she said. "The students not only develop the ability to learn and reproduce basic messages in Spanish, but they explore the richness of the Latino culture."

Such in-classroom freedom is necessary, she said, since it lessens tensions and allows for a more relaxed environment.

The cultural elements of the course cover a broad range of issues, from learning to appreciate Puerto Rican culture to discussing matters of race and colonialism. "Students get bombarded in every sense," Rodriguez said.

Holyoke, Springfield and, to a lesser extent, Northampton, are homes to thriving Latino communities. The course, said Rodriguez, will "help build a bridge between both communities," meaning not only among Latinos but also between Latinos and non-Latinos.

As the Latino population continues to grow, both locally and throughout the country, the need for the knowledge and skills which stem from functional Spanish will only increase in value, Rodriguez said.

Many people are aware that Puerto Rico is an annexed territory of the United States, but nonetheless they may still "not understand how that came into being." This historical context gained from the course will have a beneficial effect on community relations, according to Rodriguez.

For over 25 years, Casa Latina, Inc. has played a varied role in the local community, said Amarilis Flores, interim managing director, but the "nature of Casa Latina has been changing."

In addition to education programs such as the Spanish course, Casa Latina operates an Information Resource Center, which provides the community with Spanish language materials from newspapers to videos.

The company also sponsors workshops which "facilitate personal empowerment" for Latinos. Programs such as these are establishing Casa Latina as a "center for development of Latino leadership," Flores said.

The functional Spanish course will consist of beginner, intermediate and advanced sections. Classes run from May 2 thru June 22; registration deadline is May 1. For more information on Casa Latina, contact Ana R. Rodriguez at 586-1569.

Opinion/Editorial

Paralyzed by fear

"There is no such thing as a self–satisfied blow to the system. These are human beings and there are consequences to this kind of behavior."

President Clinton is angry about what happened in Oklahoma City. I, myself, am scared. The events of April 19 hit pretty close to home, both geographically and emotionally. The Oklahoma Department of Labor and Employment was in the targeted federal building — the same office my mother works for just a short drive away in Colorado. She and I have talked extensively in the past week about what has happened, and we have reaffirmed our love for one another, which is more than we can say for those families and friends who lost loved ones in the terrible explosion. At the time of this writing, there are 86 victims, and search and rescue squads predict that number to reach well over 200.

Erin Barnes

We would have liked to point our fingers at any number of international terrorist groups that we believe could have executed this heinous act. However, the fact that this is "homegrown terrorism" makes it all the more alarming. President Clinton believes we do not have to give up our liberties in order to combat both foreign and domestic terrorism, yet he goes on to say that we need some discipline on our freedoms in order to combat those people who want to destroy the way of life that Americans have come to enjoy.

It has not yet been confirmed that 28–year–old Timothy McVeigh has direct ties to the Michigan Militia, or any other right–wing para–military group, yet most experts would not doubt his connection. They believe, as does the president, that McVeigh was motivated by hateful words and rhetoric. I, on the other hand, believe he was motivated by the wisdom, or lack thereof, underlying those words.

Does McVeigh truly think the government is out to get him, or was he coerced into believing this because of his narrow–minded misuse of more positive social and political avenues? We certainly need to consider the implications of the words we use, the consequences of what we say and the kinds of emotions our words instill in people.

At the same time, we need to think about the audience we are addressing. Timothy McVeigh, and others like him, should not be fed lies simply because they cannot handle the truth.

Norman Olson, the self–appointed commander of the Michigan Militia, denies that the bombing suspects have anything to do with his group, although McVeigh and friends thrive on the kind of incendiary propaganda of which Olson speaks. The fact that Commander Olson is both a Baptist preacher and a gun shop owner demonstrates he is capable of mixing language with power. And he is not alone. Experts say that 26 states, mainly in the West and Midwest, have well–organized, armed citizen–brigades guided by Olson–type leaders preaching paranoia. This self–incited angry rhetoric is galvanized by the fact that these groups use the 1993 incident in Waco, Texas, as their rallying cry. Norman Olson, unlike most if not all reasonable Americans, sees an understandable connection between what happened in Waco and the explosion in Oklahoma City.

The Michigan Militia, and other groups like them, believe if the government does not stop distancing itself from its people, war and revolution are inevitable. How do weekend– warrior para–military training sessions bring the people and the government closer together? Norman Olson has even suggested that the federal government may have had a hand in all of this. That is about as likely as the Pope blowing up the Vatican. What next, Commander Olson?

Andy Rooney's most recent commentary on the subject suggested that those individuals involved in the gas attack in the Tokyo subway and in the bombing in Oklahoma City are the same people. They have a different race and a different cause, but they are generally the same people. Obviously, hate and insanity transcend the globe and it does not really matter who encouraged the use of the bomb, rather, that there are people in this world who would actually plant it. These crazy thoughts are just as terrifying as the actions they inspire and we will never really know just what our foreign and domestic neighbors are thinking.

Even if punishment to those found guilty of the bombing is swift and severe, it cannot erase the fact that our freedoms have voluntarily been lost, and our fears and vulnerabilities will forever be exposed. If Timothy McVeigh, Norman Olson and others have beaten us, do we come back fighting? And if so, where will this lead?

Out of shape, pathetic and happy

The ball is checked in, and the three–on–three showcase has begun. The ball is in my already sweaty palms. Clearly not mistaken for Michael Jordan, and feeling like complete crap from the night before, I slowly dribble around the perimeter, waiting for my two teammates to get open.

Andrew Bryce

The expectations of last weekend's Haigas Hoopla ran thin and thick. I did not expect to win any games, yet I did expect to be winded throughout the games. So, with my ankle aircast underneath my arm, a pair of sneakers borrowed from one of my teammates and an inhaler close by, I was ready.

I was set, after waking up just 20 minutes prior to game time, fully clothed with my hood on over my hat and my shoes still on my feet, passed out on my couch next to the phone. The last I remember, I checked my messages when I got home the night before. My memory was easy to recall because the phone was off the hook next to my face when I woke up.

So there I was on the court a little before 5 a.m., getting set to play a basketball game, my head throbbing and begging for water. It was the first time in a while I had done anything athletic, never mind play hoop. But I didn't care, it was fun then. Even if I was too early, and I was still hurting from the night before, and I was not even close to any type of playing shape, I was excited to play.

The game was about seven seconds old, and I could hear myself wheezing. Still dribbling, I passed it off to a teammate. I roamed around the court, vying to get open. About 19 seconds in, my face was full of sweat. By half a minute, the legs felt heavy, because they are, and the arms were sore. Actually, so was my back and my feet and my hands and my shins and my ...

It was hard–fought and intense. It was war. Two teams fighting for pride, for dignity. In reality, it was two unathletic teams who were out of shape and pathetic, acting as if the result of the meaningless game would make a difference in the world. It came down to the wire.

My face was beet red and I was exhausted. Yet as I was sucking wind and my outside shot was sucking, I sucked it up. We went up by one, 12–11, and our opponents had the ball. Guarding them tight, we stayed with them. The ball was passed to the outside, and my buddy on the other team shot from three. Bank shot. Good. We lose, 14–11.

The finger–pointing was done, as the opposing team gloated. My teammates were pissed off that we lost, ashamed by the result. Me? I was disappointed with the loss, since the damn kid shot the ball from his knees and hit what seemed like his only basket at the buzzer to beat us. But I was given more thought to how my hangover began after the first game was finished, and how tired and sore I really was.

As we won the second game by forfeit, and dropped the third game by a point, I was extremely fatigued by the end of it all. This was the first time I had sweat from actually doing something. It was all worth it, though.

I was a part of this large–scale event. I stood in line in the pouring rain last Friday afternoon, cutting a ton of people to sign the waiver form. I received the bag given to all players that included coupons, a tube of Sportscreme and a Haigas Hoopla T–shirt. I looked at the brackets, and I was actually on one of those gazillion teams.

I was absorbed in this event. I felt important. The pain I was experiencing and the games I was playing were just a microcosm of the large gathering.

And as I limped off to go back to my room following the last game, I felt good. It didn't matter that I hurt my knee on the final play of our last game. It didn't matter that I was still drunk through the first game. It didn't matter we lost both games we actually played.

Letters to the Editor

Campus should offer child care facilities

To the editor:

As members of the UMass committee that organized a sizeable conference at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center on April 21 and 22, we want to both appreciate the facilities and support offered by the University and also address one problem. The conference, entitled "Marxism and the Politics of Anti–essentialism," drew speakers and artists from around the country as well as large audiences from the Five College area and beyond.

However, one problem needs to be addressed: the current impossibility of legally arranging for child care in the Student Union or Campus Center Hotel. Since we could not provide day care to conference attendants they faced significant obstacles in participating in our conference. Yet conferences like ours are an important part of the educational experience outside the classroom. We should be able to offer legal, safe child care at the University — much as we now can offer parking, food provision, security and other services — to enable all those who want to participate to do so.

We would like to ask the University to take the steps needed to make such facilities available for future conferences as well as for all the other aspects of the educational experience.

Series misses real causes

To the editor:

I was both heartened and disappointed by the three–part series on Black/Jewish relations in the Collegian last week. I was heartened to see it front–paged and not relegated to the Black Affairs page. This reflected recognition by the Collegian's editorial staff of the extreme importance to the entire UMass community of race and ethnicity in today's America. I was also heartened by the sensitivity and much of the wisdom the writers demonstrated, particularly in their choice of quotes by the "antagonists," represented by Shomwa Shamapande, president of the Black Student Union, and Nurit Ben–Harav, president of UMass Hillel.

I was disappointed, however, in the failure of the writers and the Collegian editorial staff to see themselves as contributors to a concerted, nationwide and in large measure successful campaign to disguise the problems and tensions in Black/White relations as Black/Jewish problems and tensions. Turn Jew against Black by charging Nation of Islam Minister Louis Farrakhan with being an anti–Semite, and his wide appeal among African–Americans throughout America and the manifold efforts of the Nation of Islam to empower Black people is ignored and negated. Turn Black against Jew by attacking the most highly visible Black leader in America today and, in his defense, Black energy is directed against a false enemy. The enemy is White racism!

Using the age–old tactic of divide and rule, friends of neither Blacks nor Jews assert that the problem is Black anti–Semitism. Rather, the problem is the insult and injury of the persistently repeated manifestations, attitudes and expressions of White superiority that are often unconscious, largely ignored, and always minimized by the perpetrator, giving rise to the growing rage among Black youth. Americans have been reared in a society that from its inception viewed Africans as inferiors. Today's popular television, the media generally, and much of academe treat Africans as an inferior people. Therefore, who among non– Blacks can be blamed for feeling superior to, better than, persons of African origin and African descent? Particularly when primetime TV consistently presents African–Americans as dope addicts and criminals, happy–go–lucky clowns and entertainers, or demented super jocks!

Shamepande is reported as saying that in the community he represents on this campus there exists "a feeling of being besieged." With developments nationally, beginning perhaps with the beating of Rodney King and its aftermath and culminating in the now growing clamor in Washington, D.C., and throughout the nation for repeal of affirmative action legislation and practice, the entire Black community in America is developing a feeling of being besieged.

The issue on UMass campus, as throughout the U.S., is Black empowerment and equality. As long as there is wholesale denial of the existence of feelings and attitudes of superiority toward peoples of color, and particularly African– Americans, progress toward the goal of a color blind society will be slow and halting. As long as those dedicated to Black empowerment and equality on this campus (as Ben– Harav asserts she and her organization are) are diverted from that commitment by deliberately inflated Black/Jewish tensions, we can unhappily look forward to an increase in the far more serious and far more widespread tensions in Black/White relations — and more Oklahoma City tragedies committed by the largely ignored, apologize for and explained away White supremacist, para–military formations that are proliferating in America's heartland across the country. These are the real threats to our democratic society. Not Farrakhan or Tony Martin.

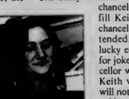
Notes from the Basement

Up until last week, I was convinced Morrill Science Center was the most confusing building on this campus. With the wings and all those shortcuts, it is fairly easy to get lost. Rumor has it students have gotten lost in Morrill and never been found. That's what those funny smells are — oh, you thought it was the labs? Sorry to burst your bubble.

Recently, I have decided Goodell library is, by far, the most confusing building on campus. Granted, it does not have four wings — but think about it, you walk in the front door (the one facing the campus pond) and you are on the fifth floor. Does that make sense to anyone?



Tracy Monahan

There are staircases that suddenly stop, so you have to exit the stairwell and search for another more conducive to your downwardly mobile needs. Why? Why can't anything on this campus just be simple? And for that matter, why don't any of the buildings on this campus match? Were there 18 different architects or just one on speed?

I have a new plan of action to fix up the campus. We all know many of the buildings are falling apart and there is no money for repairs. So to fund such projects UMass should have "Adopt a Building."

Similar to the "Adopt a Highway" program already in use by the state, each building would be sponsored by a group. This would work the best if the groups were registered student organizations, fraternities, sororities and sport teams.

For instance, the water polo team could adopt Mahar Auditorium. They would keep the building clean, mopping up sticky soda stains and removing trash. They would change light bulbs and do light repairs, like screwing desks back on. Big repairs would have to wait for the Physical Plant Department, but the group would keep an eye and have someone contact the Physical Plant when a fixup was needed — essentially, keeping them aware and ensuring that repairs would not go ignored for months. There would also be a small plaque announcing who adopted it.

When big repairs were necessary, the group in charge could hold some sort of fundraiser to help defray costs. It needs a little work, but it's an idea.

So, Keith Williams is moving back to Michigan State University. Hmmm ... very interesting. I wonder if the chancellor will be hiring another crony to fill Keith's spot in his tailor–made vice chancellor position, or will the job go unattended. Maybe — of course we are not lucky enough for this to happen, but just for jokes let's go along with it — the chancellor will admit he just created the job so Keith would have something to do, and will not abolish the position.

Honestly, who can blame Keith? He came to UMass because his wife got a job and to keep them in the same state, a job was created for him. He became the associate vice chancellor for University relations, a job overseeing University relations — with who, of course, is unclear — publications, photographic services and the alumni magazine. Do we really need someone to do all those things? Of course not, so Keith probably sits in his office all day, drinking coffee and going out of his mind with boredom.

MSU offered him the job of executive director of the MSU Alumni Association, which boasts 400,000 alums. This same job is held at our University by John Feudo, a man who never seems bored, attending every basketball game and going on trips to chat with alums across the country.

As for the separation, neither Keith nor wife Marcie are worried. Marcie put it like this: "I tend to think of the world as a home with lots of rooms. We will be in the same house but in different rooms." Yeah, but it doesn't cost me a couple of hundred bucks to travel from my living room to my kitchen.

Go Spartans.

Documentary faces problems

I'm all for TV programming that examines issues of cultural identity in America. I wholeheartedly support the efforts of network executives to provide portraits of people struggling against persecution. I just wish that a few of these shows had more backbone and complexity in their narration, and were willing to take some risks to portray believable, three–dimensional characters.

Tube Notes By Tracy Gavel

Such are the problems that face "500 Nations," Kevin Costner's eight–hour documentary on the history of Native Americans, which began airing on CBS last week (the last two segments will air sometime in May). Essentially, this is an earnest but bland attempt to document the Native American experiences that have largely been excluded from traditional literature in American history.

Its main problem is it fails to engage viewers on a personal level — as the conflicts between Native Americans and the prevailing governments are depicted as uninteresting battles of good against evil, while the sense of horror and suffering behind the Natives' oppression is never effectively communicated. Furthermore, an overabundance of nature images provides a dull narrative backdrop, while Costner's decision to step in front of the camera to deliver a few pious monologues reeks of pretentiousness. I mean, the commentaries might have worked if Native American actors had been allowed

Hidden Treasures

20 of the best discs & movies you've never heard of...

New York, New York (1977)

It's not often that a director's indulgence makes for entertaining fare, and Martin Scorsese's overlong, opaque musical–drama is only slightly an exception. But there is something there: an interesting — if sometimes infuriating and/or goofy — vibe that keeps this tale of a singer (Liza Minelli) and a saxophonist (Robert DeNiro), who battle the big band scene and each other's egos, swinging along with nervous energy.

It's not quite the moody riff on A Star Is Born it wants to be, but the musical numbers are superb (the 10–minute "Happy Endings" is as good as anything in the MGM canon), the sets are gorgeous studio–bound impressionistic and the performances are top–notch (even if the characters are alternately selfish and self–effacing). Scorsese made this in between Taxi Driver and Raging Bull. It makes sense.

Dangerous Liaisons (1988)

A comedy of manners with dark and tragic consequences, Stephen Frears' (The Grifters, The Snapper) drama is a cold and vigorous dissection of love, revenge and power. Set in pre–Revolutionary War France, Liaisons stars Glenn Close, John Malkovich and Michelle Pfeiffer (in perfect, marvelously modulated performances) as combatants in a battle of seductive prowess — all with the bittersweet taste of vengeance and true love overshadowing the Game.

Frears directs in spare, spirited style — this is a costume drama that crackles with vivid life — and he knows when to go for the jugular. Liaisons swims along from one funny and stirring sequence to another — just about every line is quotable — until it spellbinds with a quick succession of devastating crescendos whose force is profoundly haunting. Frears even manages to pull a surprisingly non–atrocious performances out of dullard Keanu Reeves as a dolt ish suitor. And that's a feat worth celebrating all by itself.

Quentin Tarantino may name the 1981 Brian De Palma thriller Blow Out (with Mr. Fiction John Travolta) as one of his greatest influences, but this small absurdist shocker is a better De Palma. Better because it plays to all of De Palma's strengths: the look–at–me visuals, the Hitchcock aping, the under and overstated sense of humor and his sneaky, schoolboy audacity to push things to the limit and take it one step further.

Sisters stars Margot Kidder (pre–Superman) as both halves of separated Siamese twins, one of whom is a psychotic murderess. A geeky news reporter (Jennifer Salt) sees the murder through her apartment window but nobody believes her. Then things get extremely weird. De Palma pulls off some showy tricks with an extended split–screen sequence and while it always fun to check off the Hitchcock homages, it's his cheeky sense of humor and use of irony that keeps the pulp moving along.

The Dead (1988)

Few filmmakers are lucky enough to have such a superb film as their swan song. Directed by the great (if terribly erratic) John Huston via video monitors and sustained with ample oxygen tanks, this adaptation of James Joyce's short story is a lyrical ode to affinity, regret and reconciliation, laid out with such care it seems that at a time when his body was at its most ravaged, Huston was working at the peak of his prowess.

Scripted by Huston's son Tony and starring his daughter Angelica (talk about a hidden treasure!), The Dead focuses on a 1904 Dublin dinner party, where the carefully arranged festivities encounter the delicate friction supplied by the prickliness of Joyce's prose and the sublime potency of Huston's images. Its charm sneaks like a silent watcher — like the equally deliberate music score it offers comment and reflection. But it's an enchantment that also mirrors the characters' illusions, quietly shattering them with the glorious quality of an understated epiphany.

When Milos Forman (One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, Amadeus) filmed his version of the 1968 hippie musical, America elected Ronald Reagan and needless to say, the film was indifferently received. Hair plays better now, mainly because it works both as an exuberant satirical musical and as a nifty self–parody. Twyla Tharp's choreography is loose and uh, groovy — as are the nicely–drawn, affecting performances by John Savage and Treat Williams (whatever happened to them?). Highlights include Hair standards like "Aquarius," "Let the Sunshine In" and the delightfully subversive "White Boys" and "Black Boys." The ironic ending is chilling, in a way most movies only aspire to be.

Heavenly Creatures (1994)

The lost movie of 1994. Of all the films people kept

10 To Hear...

The Kinks/ The Village Green Preservation Society

Although their contributions to the music world have often been criminally overlooked due to the popularity of contemporaries (The Beatles, The Who, The Beach Boys, etc.), The Kinks have crafted some of the finest British pop of the '60s — or any other decade for that matter.

The crowning achievement of a career spent avoiding any pretensions or gimmicks (not a drug reference, extended solo or good hippie vibe to be found) resulted in their 1968 release The Village Green Preservation Society, a sort of concept album (before the '70s exploited the idea) dealing with rustic life and simple pleasures. But the album's real appeal lies in the irresistible hooks, la–la–las and sing–along choruses that permeate the whole affair.

From the folky opening title track to the bluesy riffing in "Last Of The Steam–Powered Trains" and the brooding rock of "Wicked Annabella," Village Green takes the listener on a glorious storybook ride through the English countryside, continually stopping to smell the roses along the way. The '60s gave us plenty of great pop, but song for song it doesn't get much better than this. (Matt Audette)

Tom Waits/ Blue Valentine

Over the past two decades Tom Waits has steadily garnered a relatively small but fiercely dedicated following among fans and fellow musicians alike with his distinctive, ever evolving style. Released some 14 years before the Grammy–winning Bone Machine, Blue Valentine is without a doubt the definitive Waits album.

Less experimental than his later works, Blue Valentine is a virtually flawless blend of jazz, blues and balladry, all delivered with Waits' unique, nicotine–stained vocals. With equal parts bitterness and sentimentality, Waits takes the listener down rain–soaked city streets on an inebriated tour of the misplaced dreams and lost loves of an unlikely array of small–time thugs, prostitutes and vagabonds.

With Blue Valentine, Waits established himself as one of the last representatives of that eternal sense of classic cool that America hasn't seen since the days of Charlie Parker. (Matthew Justin Faerber)

The Fall/ A Sides

Trying to get into The Fall, one of music's most respected as well as most influential new wave/punk bands, can be a daunting experience. With a back catalog of albums that reads as long as your little brother's Christmas list and a career that has twisted and turned alone while the rest of the music world marched on, knowing where to start is half the battle.

A good place for neophytes to begin is A Sides (recently reissued by Beggars Banquet), a collection of the band's singles from 1984 — 1989, that chronicles the band's often shifting styles and Mark E. Smith's nonsensical poetic musings. Starting with their literate and sometimes dissonant punk days and following on up through their flirtations with disco beats in the '80s, the A Sides wonderfully outlines the band's extensive career in a wonderful and somewhat accessible package.

Tracks such as "Cruiser's Creek" and "Dead Beat Decendant" find the group at their raunchy (and repetitive) best, while "Victoria" (a Kinks cover!) and "L.A." explore the band's love for a good pop groove. A great introduction to one of music's most underrated bands. (Matt Audette)

St. Etienne/ So Tough

If the world of indie rock ever had the chance to dance to the beat of a techno drum then St. Etienne would be the ones pounding it out. One has to wonder with their plethora of booming bass, hooking samples and overall danceability why America hasn't caught onto this group so obviously meant for club life.

A hit in Europe, St. Etienne has three albums out but this one by far is the best of the bunch. Tracks like "Join Our Club," "Mario's Cafe" and "Calico" are just a sampling of how good this group can be. The whole album is an eclectic mix of violins, flutes and xylophones laced heavily with a hip–hop liquor that will give any listener a heady buzz.

Preceding a few of the songs is a snippet of nonsensical dialogue spoken in a crisp upper–class dialect that ties the tracks together and proves to be more memorable than the mundane "Party people in the house." Now there's originality for you.

While some groups tend to overuse this technique, making everything into one homogenous sound with a beat, St. Etienne carries it through with a certain "je ne sais quoi" that enhances the individuality of the song and makes it a cohesive sounding album. Francophiles rejoice, techno lovers shake, and dancers run to the store cause once you turn it on there's no turning back. (Tara MK Connelly)

Yo La Tengo/ Fakebook

Some say simplicity is best when trying to reach the world through music. The husband and wife duo of Yo La Tengo are a perfect example of those who let the music make the album.

Fakebook is a clever acoustical mix of covers intertwined with original tracks that softly carry you through the album. Folksy and whimsical, the album has some

People and Pop Culture in the News

Everybody wants to be something different, especially celebrities. Dionne Warwick wishes she was psychic but has to settle for a lame bunch of friends. Carnie Wilson is boosting her self-esteem with a talk show and now David Bowie wants to create wallpaper for Laura Ashley. One would take him more seriously if he decided to add a number of signature eyeliners to his wife Iman's cosmetic company.

Also trying to prove something is John Grisham. No longer content to milking the law profession for all its worth in his novels, the lawyer turned author will turn lawyer again this fall. The multi-millionaire is taking on Illinois Central Railroad on behalf of an employee who was killed on the job. He apparently accepted the case after The Firm, his first novel was published. Could it be another story line? Do all his protagonists win their cases?

Liz Taylor is unhappy and for once it isn't because of her weight or Michael Jackson. Two new biographies are being written about the violet-eyed starlet and one claims she was given over 300 prescription for pills in 1981. Taylor's lawyer Neil Papino said a lawsuit is imminent, but has failed to squash an NBC mini-series based on the book.

Everyone is waiting for the season finale of "Melrose Place," a two-hour special of trash, sex and psychos. However fans may have to wait longer than May 22. Because the plot involves Melrose Place being bombed, producers are worried it will hit too close to home in light of the Oklahoma City incident. Stay tuned for further developments.

Drew Barrymore is having a busy year. Beside's starring in Boys On the Side, Batman Forever and Mad Love she is on the cover of this month's Elle. She bared all for Playboy in January and in February flashed her chest at the New York Blue Angel Erotic Club in case they didn't catch her in January. Plus (no, it wasn't enough) she jumped on David Letterman's desk this past Wednesday and gave him his own private peek. And hey! Lucky her, the show was being shown in Times Square. Watch out Demi Moore.

How boring is the O.J. Simpson case? Well, boring enough for both Newsweek and People Weekly to do extensive reports on Marcia Clark's new hairdo. Yes, she ditched the perm and for $150 got her hair shagged and tinted auburn. Also changing her hairdo or is Niki Taylor who returned to the runway at Ralph Lauren a sunny honey blond and the mother of five-month-old twins. Marisa Tomei also went blond and changed her hairdo or is Niki Taylor who returned to the runway at Ralph Lauren a sunny honey blond and the mother of five-month-old twins. Marisa Tomei also went blond and yes, it's true, some people just can't carry it off without looking like Malibu Barbie.

Book Now I Know Everything

Andrew Postman has been a columnist for Glamour magazine's "Jake: A Man's Opinion" for four years. Under the nom de plume "Vince" Postman explores the difficulties, triumphs and pitfalls of being a single man in the '90s. From date rape and one night stands to relationships and commitment, Postman fears no topic. Now fans of the column can enjoy a lengthier version of Postman's wit in Now I Know Everything, a novel based on Postman's experiences. The book contains conversations with friends on column material, writing the column and includes a letter asking for a reader's subscription be cancelled because of what he wrote.

Subjects covered by Postman include "5 Ways Men Can Be Changed" and "What Men Don't Tell Women About Sex, But Want To." As in his articles, the author has a clear, concise way of presenting information and keeping readers entertained with wit and intelligence.

Book Cheap Advice

Following in the footsteps of such famous people as Wayne and Garth, Beavis and Butthead, and Dave Letterman, Calvert Deforest (alias Larry "Bud" Melman) from the Dave Letterman show is now just itching to share his secrets of life with you.

The result is Cheap Advice: A Guide To Low-Cost Luxury, answering the age old question of just how to live the high class life of Calvert Deforest (c'mon, you know you want to be just like him).

The book is chock full of handy tips on dating, travel, dieting, exercising, saving money (tip #1: steal everything), art, public speaking and — hold on — getting rich (putting out a book is on the list somewhere).

Cheap Advice is a book on a literary plane all its own. It's not too clear what plane that is, but when Calvert helps you choose a pet by how much it bites or goes to the bathroom, well, what you see is what you get.

TV "My So-Called Life"

It almost died. The teen angst and true-to-life antics of Angela on My So-Called Life were not enough to keep ABC from putting the show in television limbo.

Now thanks to a grass roots campaign to save the show, and enough critical accolades to keep people interested, MTV (the final word on what is hip) is reshowing the 19 episodes that originally aired on ABC and sticking it in the "Buzz Bin" (uh, okay). Of course that means we will be subjected to countless My So-Called Life marathons, but hey — if it means reaching a larger audience in order to keep the show alive, by all means.

The show is an excellent portrait of teen-age life, allowing its characters to have flaws and make mistakes. The acting is superb, with in-depth performances given weekly by rising star Clara Danes — plus, Jon Lupo gives big thumbs up to Bess Armstrong, who plays Danes' mother. What more do you need?

Film festival showcases local talent

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

This Friday at Amherst College's Stirn Auditorium, the Valley will have a chance to see the best in student-made films from throughout the area as the second annual Five-College Student Film Festival takes place.

Coordinated by Michael Bowes, a University Of Massachusetts student, and president of the UMass Film Society, the Film festival allows local filmmaker hopefuls to showcase their talents.

The festival is sponsored by the Five-College Council which funds the festival from money in their budget.

According to Bowes, this year's applicants to the Film Festival almost doubled from the 25 they received last year. Only 16 films will be shown and judged Friday night due to time constraints. Judges will consist of one professor from each of the five colleges.

The four categories in which the films will be judged will be narrative, experimental, animation and documentary. According to Bowes, most of this year's applicants were in the experimental category.

Winners will be selected from all four categories and one film will receive the "Best of the Festival" award. Cash prizes will be given to each of the winners. Last year's winner was Cristopher Johnsons' film Letter To Tennessee.

The Five-College Film Festival will be held at Stirn Auditorium at Amherst College tomorrow night. Admission is free. The event begins at 7 p.m. and is expected to run over four hours.

to give them — but seeing Costner himself get on his soapbox every half-hour to declare what a sensitive, enlightened White guy he is was just slightly more than I could bear.

Similar problems plagued ABC's Hallmark Hall of Fame production of Lanford Wilson's play "Redwood Curtain." The story itself is a worthy one about an adopted Vietnamese-American girl's relentless search for her father and for a more definitive sense of cultural identity. Too bad the writing is so incredibly heavy-handed. Every improbable line of dialogue is burdened with gut-wrenching melodramatic significance, while poignant piano strands in the background place a dark cloud over the entire production.

Now I would like to clear up all the confusion for those viewers who still haven't figured out the difference between Fox's "House of Buggin" and NBC's new sitcom "In the House."

Let's start with the stronger of the two, "Buggin," which is a Latino-centered sketch comedy featuring the charismatic John Leguizamo. Like many shows of this sort, the jokes are frequently one-note and somewhat superficial, but this ensemble exudes enough energy and good cheer to outshine the majority of recent sketch fare, including "The News" and last year's "She TV."

More importantly, though, "House of Buggin" seems to have learned an important lesson from the creative decline of "Saturday Night Live" — which is to never let a lame skit go on for more than three minutes. Realizing that brevity truly is the soul of wit, Leguizamo and company wisely limit their antics to 30-minute episodes, and within that time usually manage to squeeze in at least one decent joke (which is more than "SNL" can do with 1 1/2 grueling hours).

Admittedly, the show isn't perfect (it doesn't approach the offbeat genius of "Kids in the Hall," for example) but a few changes in the supporting cast and tighter writing could really do wonders for next season.

"In the House," on the other hand, is a show that perplexes me. To be frank, I have no idea why this so-called comedy about a sports star who, after going broke, ends up renting his house and even serving as housekeeper to a single mom, was chosen by NBC to replace the soon-to-be-departing "Blossom." I mean, "Blossom" was hardly great entertainment, but even if the gags fell flat, it still looked professional, but this show looks ... well, weird. Almost like it was filmed in somebody's basement with a Polaroid camera, or something.

And its plots so far have been as creaky as the production values, with most of its characters and situations having been borrowed from such established series as "Who's the Boss," "The Brady Bunch," "Family Matters" and "Three's Company." No wonder star LL Cool J appears listless and bored. He resignedly reads off his cue cards while co-star Debbie Allen frantically tries every technique out of Acting 101 to bring life to this mess. Overall, it's enough to make one yearn for the comedic brilliance of Joey Lawrence.

New film a shell of classic noir

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

KISS OF DEATH
Directed by Barbet Schroeder with David Caruso, Nicholas Cage
Playing at Mtn. Farms Four

You've got to admire the effort, even if you don't admire the movie. In an age when Tarantino is no longer the new kid but a new standard, director Barbet Schroeder (Reversal of Fortune) opts not to jazz up his remake of Henry Hathaway's 1947 noir about a "reformed" small-time crook caught between the cops, the Feds and a low-level Mafia — though all he wants to be is a family man. So thankfully, there's not a lick of super-slick visuals or glib, excessive violence to be found.

Instead, Schroeder plays it cool, very cool, going for a noir-colored, gritty integrity that's commendable, if not successful. In fact, the movie is so understated, it's hardly there, with a plot that doesn't so much unfold as it trickles and a lead performance that, when it's not stretching the bounds of credibility, is pretty darn lame.

David Caruso is that performance, and to call him a bad actor is difficult because he's not much of an actor to begin with. Whatever intensity Caruso had on TV in "NYPD Blue" is lost on the big screen, translating into an uneasy form of intellectual constipation. Squirreling away emotion inside his outwardly interesting mug, Caruso seems to think his relentless internalization is Method-style shorthand for decency and honor. No such luck.

The movie confuses this too, keeping everything at arm's length, hushed and secretive — only there's nothing behind the creaky allure. And the exceptions to this unspoken rule are done away with or painted with such broad strokes, as if they were Donald Duck stuck in Maus. But there's a bigger consequence to all the understatement: the movie doesn't move. The story simply doesn't build; it stacks up scenes and confrontations, but there's no mounting dread — it's like a benign carousel, spinning ably enough, but going nowhere.

And not just plot-wise. The characters are also stuck in this frustraing cycle of supposed emotions and ostensible motives. Throughout the movie the plot says Caruso is in danger and that he's weary about always getting a raw deal by everyone. But all this is told to us; we never experience it through actual drama or suspense. Despite enough screw-overs to plot-pulate a few Death Wish movies, Caruso never really seems riled up by his increasingly crappy life. Maybe he's tired, but we're never really sure. And neither is the movie.

How, then, are we supposed to make sense of Caruso's relationship with the film's villain, Little Junior (Cage), a guy who bench presses strippers? I always thought Cage was too much of an instinctual actor to ham it up, but since his character is an ineffectual cipher — never more than the sum of his script-demanded idiosyncrasies — it doesn't leave much room for subtle maneuvering. I suspect Cage smelled a career-resuscitating show piece in the Little Junior role (he bulked up, DeNiro style) but it's an embarrassing effort, crudely drawn.

The supporting players of Kiss of Death — a meaningless title — suffer the same fate. The film's only potent characters (i.e., they seem to have a heartbeat) are fleshed out with spirited turns by rising stars Michael Rappaport (Higher Learning) and Helen Hunt ("Mad About You"). But they're soon out of the movie, apparently squelched because they're interesting and don't seem to participate in the film's overwhelming dour mood.

But maybe that would be asking too much. By the time the film stumbles toward an anticlimactic, unsatisfying finish, even the initial respect has worn off. Schroeder may have intended Kiss of Death to be a thoughtful yet faithful riff on the noir-burnished anti-heroes (the ghost of Richard Widmark haunts the film's Bronx streets) of a subgenre cycle long dead but still flickering in the minds of screenwriters and cinephiles alike. But all this ruminating anesthetizes instead of entertains, and all we're left with is the hollow, paralyzed shell of the original movie — one that wasn't too good to begin with. C-

Caruso talks on movies & TV

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — As Detective John Kelly in TV's "NYPD Blue" and as Jimmy Kilmartin in his first starring film, Kiss of Death, David Caruso displays an edgy quality which seems to carry over in the man himself.

In an interview, the actor was cordial yet wary, as if, like Kelly and Kilmartin, he is slow to trust anyone. The events of the past year may have contributed to that attitude.

His departure from "NYPD Blue" after its sensational first year aroused a storm of controversy. His fellow actors on the series grumbled that he was endangering the future of the show by leaving so soon. Media critics assailed him as "greedy" in seeking a bigger salary.

Caruso admitted that his early departure may have caused bad feelings, but also criticized the popularity of controversy.

"I think we're all so prone to controversy," he said. "I think this is the new drug in this country: Cocaine is out, controversy is in, to such a ridiculous proportion that people get hooked on it. I think there is an angle that gets decided upon, then everybody jumps on the bandwagon. It's not even rational. It's not based on the facts. It's not based on anything."

Caruso claimed that he didn't want to leave "NYPD Blue" but hoped the show's schedule could be more flexible so he could accept the movie offers he was receiving.

"I was hoping that we could do both the series and features," he said. "Loosen the schedule, and factor in new characters, which they've done anyway, and the show's even more successful. But at that time, nobody was open for it. It was an either-or situation."

The offers included Jade, directed by William Friedkin (The French Connection) for Paramount Pictures, and Kiss of Death by 20th Century Fox. Caruso gets top billing in Kiss of Death, which also stars Nicolas Cage, Samuel L. Jackson, Helen Hunt and Michael Rappaport.

It bears little relationship to the 1947 film noir of the same title, except for the situation of a former gang member (Caruso) whom the cops force to be an informer. Victor Mature played that role in the original, which is remembered for Richard Widmark's film debut as the psycho killer.

The less-informed might think Kiss of Death is Caruso's first movie. Far from it. He made his debut in the 1982 hit An Officer and a Gentleman. His other credits: King of New York, First Blood (the first Rambo), Thief of Heart and Mad Dog and Glory.

"I've always admired his film work, I didn't see any of his television work," says co-star Cage. "He's very dedicated, very serious about the work. He reminds me of myself when I started out. I would create an environment of turbulence around myself. I think I saw the same thing in him to connect with the character."

Caruso's sense of self-preservation stems from growing up Irish-Italian in the New York City borough of Queens, son of a magazine editor and a librarian.

"If you're looking for trouble, you can find it in Queens," he said. "I wasn't real fascinated with my own self-destruction. But I grew up with a number of people who grabbed that early ring and are no longer with us.

"That's what I describe as short-term thinking. You may have $5,000 in your pocket tomorrow, but you've got people looking for you. That's a big trade-off."

Caruso believed there was something different out there for him. He may have found it while ushering in a movie theater, watching the same movie dozens of times. At 18, he felt the need for independence and moved to Manhattan, not certain of his future. An agent suggested he could make money doing TV commercials, and he appeared in a few.

Spring Heeled Jack to headline ska show

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

COURTESY SPRING HEELED JACK

Spring Heeled Jack headlines a five–band ska extravaganza tonight at Pearl Street.

Ska is one of those genres of music that is best appreciated in a live setting. As any die–hard ska fan knows, the only real way to hear your favorite ska band is skankin' yourself senseless in a small club, jam–packed with a bunch of equally frenzied dance hall enthusiasts.

Local ska fans will have this opportunity again tonight when Pearl Street hosts a five–band ska show headlined by New Haven's Spring Heeled Jack. In the relatively short time they have been together (just under two years) this seven–piece outfit has developed a faithful following in their hometown — and the buzz is spreading steadily elsewhere.

Spring Heeled Jack's sound is a multi–faceted blend of innovation and dedication to the old school ska sounds of The Toasters and The Hi Hats. Incorporating driving, uptempo rhythms with a decided knack for melody, Spring Heeled Jack create potent, well–crafted songs for a new generation of ska enthusiasts.

The air–tight rhythm section of Rick Omonte and Dave Karcich is amongst the best in the genre and the three–piece horn outfit of James Riley (saxophone), Pat Gingras (trumpet) and Chris Rhodes (trombone) is also first–rate.

Triangle series closes out with unique jazz show

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Jazz enthusiasts should take note, the Tom Varner Quintet will close The Magic Triangle Series tonight in Hampden Theater at 8 p.m. with a show promising to live up to it's famed reputation.

What differentiates this jazz performance from the others is the presence of the French horn — not only as an accompanist but also as a solo instrument.

Difficult to play and never quite accepted by jazz musicians, the French horn seemed doomed to forever occupy a classical role when it came to music.

Tom Varner, however, has lifted the French horn out of a relatively obscure position and has taken it to the cutting– edge of jazz, using it in ways no symphony could imagine.

Varner, who has won rave reviews from critics, has been described by the jazz trade magazine Downbeat as a "studied composer, thoughtful arranger and ardent band leader ..."

Influences on Varner include a mixture of such jazz greats as Miles Davis, John Coltrane, George Russell and Charlie Mingus.

But not to downplay the typically traditional and classical role of the French horn, Varner also draws inspiration from European composers such as Berg, Schoenberg and Stravinsky. His interest in classical performers show in his technique and how he utilizes the instruments sound.

The musician has performed in such diverse locations as the Parallel Worlds (Vienna Konzerthaus), the Vancouver, Moers and Groningen Jazz Festivals and on numerous occasions at The Knitting Factory in New York.

As a sideman, Varner has performed and recorded with Steve Lacy, Dave Liebman, Lamont Young and Miles Davis.

In addition, Varner has been recognized for his work with two grants from the National Endowments for the Arts and has topped polls in both Downbeat and Jazz Times. He has written music for various other projects including the soundtrack for the Paul Mones film Saints and Sinners, scheduled for release this spring.

Still not convinced?

Varner also appears on over 25 recordings, including a 1991 Montreux recording with Davis and Quincy Jones. He is backed by an equally talented quintet comprised of Ed Jackson, alto saxophone; Rich Rothenberg, tenor saxophone; Drew Gress, bass; and Bobby Previte, drums.

The Magic Triangle is in its sixth consecutive year with the University.

The series is funded in part by the UMass Arts Council, Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund, Student Government Association, Residential Arts, Residence Life, Graduate Student Senate, Commuter Area Government, The Fine Arts Center, WMUA and the Greek Area Cultural Enrichment Fund.

Tickets for the last Magic Triangle jazz series show featuring The Tom Varner Quintet are $7/general; $5/students. Advance tickets are available through the Fine Arts Center Box Office or can be purchased the night of the performance. For tickets or more information call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545–2511.

release, captures some of the band's power and enthusiasm on songs like "Ruder Than You" and "Let's Get Together," but live is where they really shine. Anyone who has seen Spring Heeled Jack live can have little doubt that the future holds big things for this band.

Also appearing on the bill tonight will be fellow up–and– coming ska purveyors J.C. Superska. Products of the same Connecticut scene as Spring Heeled Jack, J.C. Superska have been getting a good deal of attention lately, appearing on a number of compilations including the much–heralded Moon Records double–CD Skarmageddon.

Just one week after winning the Battle of the Bands at the Student Union Ballroom, UMass favorites Knuckle Sandwich will return to the Pearl Street stage as part of tonight's show. While not strictly a ska band, Knuckle Sandwich borrows elements of ska to create their unique, high–energy fusion of styles.

Rounding out the bill will be the acclaimed Northampton act The Marshes and Drunk In July.

Spring Heeled Jack, with J.C. Superska, Knuckle Sandwich, The Marshes and Drunk In July, will be performing tonight at Pearl Street nightclub in Northampton. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $5 in advance, $6 at the door. For more information, call 584–7771.

talking about last year, it's a crime this visually stunning, smoothly thrilling and gulp, darkly comic marvel was overlooked. Peter Jackson (Dead Alive) took the true-life tale of two teenage girls and spun it into a deliciously malicious fable of obsession and imagination that leads to murder. The girls' fervent imaginations (one would go on to write bestselling mysteries under a pseudonym) led to a creation of a fanciful netherworld which the film treats matter-of-factly. It's the best fiction film of last year — and yes, that includes Pulp Fiction. Will you see this movie, please?

Stardust Memories (1980)

One of Woody Allen's most maligned — and most misunderstood films. While most reviewers like Allen when he's benign and autumnal like Hannah and Her Sisters (which doesn't age well — aside from smart performances, it's a bit too reverent), they savaged him for this blisteringly comic film all about a filmmaker (Allen) who's reevaluating his frustrating life amid a weekend retrospective of his movies. Stark, surreal and sometimes outright hostile, Stardust proves a probing, complex portrait of a complicated man who may be his own worst enemy. A fearless tour-de- force, and Allen rises to the occasion.

Parting Glances (1986)

This comedy-drama was the late Bill Sherwood's only film (he died of AIDS in 1990), and that's a true shame — he had the stuff of a major talent. Evidence of that is found in Glances, a warm musing on the typical love triangle — the kind with all the strings attached real life affords while Hollywood ignores.

Book editor Michael (Rich Ganoung) lives with his beautiful if stoic lover Robert (John Bolger), who's ready to leave for a job in Africa and cool down his relationship with Michael. Michael's ex is Nick (played by Reservoir Dogs' Mr. Pink Steve Buscemi, in his best screen performance to date), a musician with AIDS who still tugs at Michael's heart. Although fiercely protective of his characters, Sherwood nevertheless manages to make them flawed, funny and real. Entertaining without being patronizing (see Philadelphia, or rather, don't).

Near Dark (1987)

I've given up on horror movies until I caught up with Kathryn Bigelow's (Blue Steel) smart, stylish, seductive, genuinely horrific vampire thriller. In days when these words are tossed off so often they mean less and less, Near Dark earns them with its unsparing blend of moonlit desire and world-weary melancholia — all wrapped in the guise of an entertaining, suspenseful midnight movie.

Adrian Pasdar is a farmboy whose flirtation with a petite, out-of-town girl (Jenny Wright) leaves him a reluctant member of the undead. This sends him into the nightmare world of a band of vampires (led by Aliens co-stars Lance Henriksen and Bill Paxton) who are not happy to have another along for the ride. Pasdar is tortured — torn between his growing love for Wright, his innate desire for blood and his distaste for killing. Bold performances all around, coupled with a nihilistic morality (!) that's a smooth critique of '80s repression. Good stuff, with a coolly subversive sense of humor and just enough gross-out gore.

Maurice (1987)

In between directing adaptations of E.M. Forster's A Room with a View and Howards End, the folks from Merchant Ivory tackled Forster's most controversial novel; one that, because of its explicitly homosexual theme, Forster deemed it publishable only after his death in 1970. With his usual restraint and honorable care, director James Ivory manages to pull an effective romantic melodrama out of a sketchy and essentially mediocre novel — this is one of the few times when the movie is actually better than the book.

James Wilby (Howards End) is the title character, a befuddled gentleman of Edwardian England who begins an affair with classmate Clive (Hugh Grant) only to be dumped when Clive feels the (criminal) pressures of the society. He finds true love with the underclass gamekeeper (always underrated Rupert Graves) ... but can it survive? It's better than it sounds, with Ivory communicating Forster's humanistic romanticism and subtle social satire with grace, honor and dignity. The final clinch is deeply romantic in ways Hollywood will never understand.

Because of the extensiveness of the budget debates, Darby said, next Wednesday's meeting will end at 11 p.m. and will be continued Thursday at 7 p.m.

Since the resignation of Ruth Malkin as chair of the Ways and Means two weeks ago, the committee has put a great amount of work into the budget, Carter said.

"We have had a full team effort," he said. "This [budget] is the product of thousands of hours of work by the Ways and Means committee."

The SGA voted themselves a cut of $4,000 due to the amount of funding available.

"We got a fee increase approved by the senate last semester but it is not enough to cover [the budget]," he said. "We need constant, small increases to keep up with inflation."

The senate is also in the process of debating how senate seats will be appropriated. "The judiciary negged the part of the constitution that involved districting a few weeks ago," Chair Larry Piano said.

The senate failed a motion to keep the senate at the present size, which is one seat to every 200 constituents.

"I proposed to keep the body the same, so people have a chance to participate and be involved," Piano said.

BALTIMORE — A federal judge Wednesday blocked the Navy from discharging a gay sailor who is fighting the military's "don't ask, don't tell, don't pursue" policy.

U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Young said he granted the six-month injunction because of questions about whether the sailor's rights to due process had been violated.

Lt. Richard "Dirk" Selland had been scheduled to be discharged Friday.

A federal judge in New York ruled last month that the Pentagon's policy on gays in the military is unconstitutional. That ruling stopped discharge proceedings against six servicemen. The Justice Department said it will appeal.

Under the policy adopted in 1993, gays can serve as long as they keep their sexual orientation to themselves and do not engage in homosexual acts. Otherwise, they can be honorably discharged.

In addition, commanders may not ask a service member his or her sexual orientation.

Selland, a supply officer, declared he was gay more than two years ago by telling his skipper aboard the attack submarine Hammerhead. He said he hoped to get his commanding officer's help in stopping harassment by other sailors who suspected his homosexuality.

He was ordered off the Hammerhead. He has since had several onshore assignments and now supervises more than 80 people as deputy director of the Fleet Industrial Supply Center in Norfolk, Va.

Selland argues that the Navy's case against him is based solely on his statement and that the Navy has never presented evidence that he engaged in homosexual behavior.

Alumnae show glimpse of future in women's studies

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday, University of Massachusetts graduates returned to the Campus Center to tell a small audience what they have done with degrees in women's studies.

The program, titled "Variety and Choices: Women's Studies Careers" was sponsored by the Mather Career Center, the UMass Alumni/Ae Association, and the Women's Studies Department as part of the Edwin M. Rossman Alumni Career Forum series.

The program was hosted by Ginger Goldsbury, assistant director of the career center. She explained that Rossman "had a great interest in careers and work," and he donated money to the University because he "felt that students needed to do a lot more exploration before they started working."

The panelists were Michelle Boardman, a 1991 graduate who is the Kate Fowler Merle-Smith curator of textiles for the Allentown Art Museum; Andrea Fox, a 1982 graduate and associate director of the Massachusetts Nurses Association; and Liz Bennett, a 1982 graduate who is a psychologist at Bridgewater State College and in private practice.

All the panelists discussed how funding and privatization, labor issues, changing credentials and political organizing influenced their careers.

While earning her undergraduate degree, Boardman focused on clothing, textile design and the history of costumes. She earned her master's degree in textile history and the behavior and historical aspects of dress from the University of Wisconsin.

"In the four years since I left Amherst my women's studies degree has taken me far and served me well," Boardman said.

"To me [textiles] tell a story. I use historic textiles to talk about art, culture, politics and history," she said.

Boardman said she was a political activist but had to keep that fact under wraps at work.

Fox, the second speaker, told how political activism influenced her career choice. She focused on health care while earning her undergraduate degree, earning certification as a registered nurse at Greenfield Community College and her master's degree in labor relations from the University of Massachusetts.

"I am grateful that I have the background in women's studies to be able to identify these problems," Fox said. "My women's studies background gave me a value system to work through and work with."

Fox said she has always been involved with unions as a business agent, representing employees.

Nursing is primarily a female occupation, said Fox. Because of this "we have a set of unique kinds of problems that are different than [other unions]," said Fox.

Fox deals largely with the "marginalization of women," she said, adding that they do not need to put with poor treatment.

"I teach people to say no," she said.

Fox explained that she has had difficulty in her field because "there aren't a lot of women [in her position]." The men she deals with have learned to respect her in her job capacity, she said.

"I am grateful that I have the background in women's studies to be able to identify these problems," Fox said. "My women's studies background gave me a value system to work through and work with."

Bennett, the last speaker, earned her master's degree in counseling with a specialty in women's issues from Boston University.

"One of the things that really started exciting me was the whole issue of oppression and racism — exciting me in the sense of I felt I wanted to do something," she said.

It was the 1982 gang rape of a woman in New Bedford that made Bennett an activist. She explained that women's studies taught her activism, and she helped to organize the candlelight vigil that was aimed toward revoking the liquor license of the bar where the rape occurred.

Bennett also helped start a rape crisis center in the city. She was hired to coordinate community education and to do some counseling.

According to Bennett, it was because of her background in women's studies that she was asked to do this work. "What women's studies gave me was a language to talk about what was happening to all of us and a language to talk about where to take it, what to do," she said.

But she said she felt burnt out after three years. "Working in the field of violence against women is working in a war," Bennet said.

She now works at Bridgewater State College where she said she enjoys doing a combination of community education and psychotherapy.

great listens. "Here Comes My Baby," "Griselda" and "Tired So Hard" are quiet sincere songs that make you want to kick back and sigh with satiety. At the same time they are memorable and just catchy enough to find yourself humming along after a few listens.

Versatility is this band's name with covers like Daniel Johnston's "Speeding Motorcycle" which, despite its horrendous original version, manages to come out as one of the most memorable tracks. Preceding it is "Emulsified," a 2:45-minute '50s-sounding song, complete with a doo-wop chorus. However, it is the plaintive plea of a lover in "What Can I Say" that is by far the best. (Tara MK Connelly)

David Byrne/ Rei Momo

David Byrne has always been something of an enigma. As the frontman and primary creative force behind the seminal art/pop outfit Talking Heads, Byrne was one of the chief icons of the pre-"pre-Nevermind" alternative music generation. It is ironic then that Byrne's greatest musical achievement came years after the heyday of the Talking Heads.

With his first solo album, Rei Momo, Byrne turned away completely from the keyboards and synthesizers of his old band's sound, opting instead for more danceable arrangements highlighted by feverish Latin rhythms and full horn sections. Presiding over the whole ensemble, of course, is Byrne's inimitable croon. From the haunting bomba "The Rose Tattoo" to the infectious rumba "Good and Evil," Rei Momo is a bold and highly successful departure from musical tradition on the part of one of the most influential forgers of it. (Matthew Justin Faerber)

Branford Marsalis Quartet with Terrence Blanchard/ Music From 'Mo' Better Blues'

OK, so the movie wasn't that successful, but this collection of tunes is certainly deserving of a higher level of praise. Branford Marsalis and Terrence Blanchard offer up half a dozen tracks that feature some furious soloing, syncopated melodies and the backbone of a rhythm section second to none (Jeff "Tain" Watts on drums and Robert Hurst on Bass), all coming together to touch on many of stylistic bases that jazz covers.

The sonically depressing "Again Never" and the controlled fury of "Knocked Out The Box" only serve to augment the range that this album covers. The sweetness of Cynda Williams' voice on "Harlem Blues" is matched only by Marsalis' soprano sax playing and "Pop Top 40" is a perfect stab at top 40 radio with quotes from commercials and stale love songs topped with unusual rhythms and biting lyrics.

Probably the most surprising track on the entire album is "Jazz Thing" by Gangstarr, using rap to take the listener on a trip through the history of jazz with some classic samples thrown in along the way. (Mike MacLean)

Aimee Mann/ Whatever

Even after her beautifully poppy contribution to the Melrose Place Soundtrack, "That's Just What You Are," the mainstream has yet to sink their teeth into Aimee Mann's solo work. The ex-frontwoman of 'Til Tuesday's solo debut of two years ago is chock full of pop/folk gems that avoid all of the folk clichés by staying simple and yet thoughtful thanks to the highly talented musicians she has surrounded herself with.

From the rock influences of "I Should've Known" and the circus-esque musical instrument lineup (complete with toy piano and whistles) of "Way Back When," Whatever is a light and cheery sounding album. Don't let the light hearted guitar and punchy bass fool you though, take a closer listen and you will see that Whatever is a dark album. Mann fills her effort with images of failure and depression, summoning up enough emotion to make even the most chipper soul a little sullen.

"Jacob Marley's Chain," "4th of July" and "I Know There's a Word," just as the rest of the album literally drip with pathos. The perfect remedy for those late nights when your love life is in ruins. (Mike MacLean)

Madonna/ I'm Breathless: Music from and Inspired by the Film Dick Tracy

Don't laugh too hard. Next to Like A Prayer, this is Madonna's best disc, a concept album that showcases the Blonde One in one of her most assured personas. It's one that, in spite of her less-than-stellar performance in the film, nevertheless finds its truest fruitition on this exceedingly well-written, performed and produced record.

As Breathless Mahoney, Madonna is the sassy, dangerous femme fatale with a clever sense of humor and some truly irresistible hooks. From the Academy Award-winning "Sooner or Later" and the other Stephen Sondheim-penned songs to Madonna's own comic ("Hanky Panky," "Cry Baby"), seductive ("He's A Man") and sad ("Something to Remember") tracks, there's a sneaky charm at work here, merging trademark Madonna wit with showtune brassiness. The everlasting dance hit "Vogue" ends the Breathless experience and it fits in nicely — a smooth groove in marvelously good company. (Jon Lupo)

Tony! Toni! Toné!/ Sons Of Soul

From the opening bars of "If I Had No Loot," the track that kicks off the Tony's 1992 sophomore effort, it is evident that this is not one of those slickly overproduced R&B recordings of late.

What makes this album so distinctive from the rest of the pack is the Southern Californian trio's ability to infuse the modern musical aesthetic (check out the Ice-T sample that periodically pops up in "Loot") with the smooth '70s grooves that they so clearly revere (demonstrated in the lush instrumentation of "Anniversary" and "Slow Wine").

Yes, the album did sell over a million copies. And, yes, "Anniversary" did receive endless airplay. But what makes this collection of tunes so great in my book is the use of real musical instruments.

Without a doubt, these sons of soul are new dogs who have learned the old tricks. (Chris Conner) season. Her percentage was an impressive 0.622 going into this game against senior New Hampshire captain Steph Olsen, who had a 0.605 save percentage.

Another force for the Minutewomen, also in her first collegiate season, is Joanna Dignazio, who leads the team with 27 goals, scoring in every game this season.

The defense was made solid with the cooperative talents of sophomore Erica Bryan and freshman Rhonda Landers, both of whom battled the New Hampshire offense fiercely, sending them back to their own side of the field.

Freshman midfielder Cindy O'Brien provided an important link between the Massachusetts defense and offense, setting up several scoring opportunities.

The Minutewomen accomplished their game plan in producing an effective team effort.

McClellan's aims were met, but where they fell short was apparent.

"We had a couple of goals today," McClellan said. "One was to keep them from dominating, and we did that very well.

"Our other goal was to pass the ball through. When we didn't pass, we turned it over, so it was really clear when it worked and when it didn't."

UMass has improved their intensity and consistency over the past few games and was able to put UNH on the defensive in this one. Going into the game, the Wildcats had a 12–9–2 advantage over the Minutewomen and a 5–5 record, coming off a 13–6 win over Penn State on Monday.

"I think that on the whole, we have really improved," McClellan said. "You can see a big difference looking at the beginning of the season until now."

Massachusetts will end their season this weekend against Boston College on Saturday and Harvard University on Sunday.

Puleri picks up win; baseball pounds Siena

On the strength of the pitching by Jeff Puleri, the University of Massachusetts baseball team pounded Siena 12–2 yesterday in Loudonville, N.Y.

The freshman righthander scattered two runs over seven innings of work, striking out five, to pick up his first win of the season against one loss.

Freshman Scott Barnsby worked the eighth inning while sophomore Adrian Softic pitched the ninth. Barnsby and Softic both struck out two and gave up a hit in their one inning of relief.

With the game tied at 1–1 in the second inning, Mark Pileski drilled a solo home run to give the Minutemen a 2–1 lead. The junior shortstop went 2-for-4 on the day with two runs scored and one run batted in.

The Minutemen scored three more runs in the fourth inning before exploding for seven runs in the sixth inning to pull away. UMass strung together seven straight hits in the inning with sophomore centerfielder Nate Murphy (1-for-3, two runs scored) and freshman second baseman Muchie Daglieri producing key two-run singles.

Junior first baseman Justin Kelly had an impressive day at the plate going 3-for-5 with a double while Nelson Ubaldo went 2-for-4 with two RBIs.

Rob McShinsky homered for Siena while catcher P.J. Buonocore went 3-for-4. Eric Anderson (2-2) took the loss giving up four hits and seven runs (five earned) while walking three, in four innings of work.

UMass improves to 25-9 on the year while Siena drops to 23–14. The Minutemen next will be in action this Saturday against Atlantic 10 foe West Virginia for a doubleheader.

O'Neill and Greg Millen. How many starting jobs have these guys held down? Here's a thought: Neilson hires Florida stopper John Vanbiesbrouck, a bona fide Vezina Trophy candidate for the second year running.

• The Edmonton Oilers have gone belly up since I wrote they'd make the playoffs, and they blew their chance to corner the market on young forwards. The St. Louis Blues offered Denis Chasse and Mike Grier plus two other prospects for Shayne Corson, guaranteed to be dealt in the off-season, likely for less.

• I hope no one considers Stan Fischler hockey's media ambassador. He's so visible, yet so transparent. His columns are fluffier than cotton candy and he sounded dead on a recent WFAN radio appearance. All his colleagues at The Hockey News have left him in their wake. If only Mike Brophy, Eric Duhatschek and Jay Greenberg could catch up in publicity.

• NHL owners have never had to ask their teams' stars to be especially nice to fans because it comes naturally to most of them. Consider Blaine Lacher, Bruins rookie goaltender, who showed up right on time to sign autographs at a suburban mall, even though he still suffered from the worst flu of his life. Ever humble, he had a great quote in The Boston Globe, speaking on his unfamiliarity with the Islanders' Nassau Coliseum: "I must be a rookie. I've been looking for my sticks for ten minutes."

Boston Red Sox pound Twins on opening day

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Jose Canseco and Mo Vaughn had a strong start as Boston's one-two slugging punch. Minnesota struggled simply to get the ball out of the infield.

In the first game at Fenway Park in 262 days, the Red Sox beat the Twins 9-0 Wednesday as Mike Greenwell added four hits. The Red Sox didn't even need Roger Clemens, who missed his first opening day start in eight years with a strained right shoulder. Led by starter Aaron Sele, five Boston pitchers gave up just two hits, both singles.

Boston led just 2-0 until sending 13 men to the plate in a seven-run sixth inning. With the full house warming to the moment with loud cheers, Canseco came up with the bases loaded. After a foul and a ball, he lined a two-run single to left as the fans roared. Then Vaughn, the cleanup hitter, followed with a two-run double to the gap in right-center. He and Canseco each went 2-for-4.

Sele pitched brilliantly while Clemens, who is on the disabled list, stayed at the Red Sox spring training site in Fort Myers, Fla. Sele (1-0) threw only 65 pitches in five innings, allowing one hit and one walk. Only four of the 17 batters he faced got the ball into the outfield.

Scott Erickson (0-1) allowed run-scoring singles to Greenwell and Vaughn in 4 2/3 innings.

The crowd was mostly subdued during the pre-game introductions, reserving its biggest cheers for former Boston slugger and current hitting coach Jim Rice, who got a 30-second standing ovation.

working in the same direction. I think the team could not have performed the way they did this season without [assistant coach] Steve Christensen."

Johnson also received one of the seven President awards given from the National Association of Collegiate Gymnastics Coaches (NACGC). The award was for his hard work and dedication in providing continued excellence at the NCAA Championships. Johnson was also elected to return as president of the Coaches Association.

The team as a whole compiled a record of 9-2, including two exciting victories over national powers Army and Syracuse.

"I feel we got off to a slow start at the UMass Open," Johnson said. "After we got some training in, we went to the Rock Mountain Open and performed well there.

"I think if you had to say what the team highlights for the season was, it was beating Army and Syracuse on back-to- back weekends. We did all the right things in progression to win the ECAC Championships, we really peaked at the right time."

The post-season accolades that the team possesses are claiming their seventh straight New England Championship, as well as winning the ECAC Championships on their home floor and placing third at EIGL Championships.

The Minutemen will be returning all but three members of the 94-95 squad, which means the team will continue to get better with the added experience. With the addition of recruits to be announced within the next two weeks, UMass men's gymnastics will continue to be in the national spotlight.

Royals and Yankees victorious

Royals 5, Orioles 1

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Maybe if there had been normal spring training, Kevin Appier might've been able to pitch a no-hitter. And certainly there would've been more people to see it.

Instead, only 24,170 fans — including those admitted for free — saw Appier pulled after 6 2-3 innings with a no-hitter in progress. Reliever Rusty Meacham gave up a hit with one out in the eighth, and the Kansas City Royals went on to beat the Baltimore Orioles 5-1 Wednesday.

Appier, who said before the game that he expected to throw only 90 pitches, was pulled after making 98. He struck out seven and walked two, and was the winner. Boone was booed after bringing in Meacham, who gave up a one-out single in the eighth to Leo Gomez. Baltimore starter Mike Mussina pitched five shutout innings, threw 49 pitches and allowed three hits. Jamie Moyer relieved to start the sixth and gave up two runs, and was the loser.

Yankees 8, Rangers 6

NEW YORK (AP) — Other than a few empty upper-deck seats and an umpire wearing an old-fashioned chest protector, things looked pretty normal for the New York Yankees on opening day.

Jimmy Key was on the mound, the other team couldn't put much together against him and New York beat Texas. Key won his third straight opening day start for New York and improved his career record in openers to 6-0. The Yankees won at home in their season debut for the sixth straight time.

Danny Tartabull homered and drove in three runs, Bernie Williams hit a solo homer and Pat Kelly went 3-for-4 for New York. Key lasted five-plus innings and gave up seven hits. John Wetteland pitched a perfect ninth for his first American League save. Kenny Rogers (0-1) allowed four earned runs on five hits in three innings.

you've got the big boys coming to town this weekend," Bailey said.

Lax notes: Senior goaltender Tom LoPresti, who missed the game with a bad bruise in his thigh, said he plans to play against Syracuse on Saturday ... Glass' blanking marked only the second time in his career that he has been held without a goal, and it snapped his 13-game scoring streak.

Traditionally, the Syracuse game has drawn the most fans to Garber Field, and the team is hoping that this year will be no different. Several team members will spend time tomorrow hanging flyers around campus hyping the game. Glass promised if the fans attend the game, they will not be disappointed.

"It's going to be a great game," he said.

Center in Ozone Park, N.Y.

Lopresti currently attends St. Francis Prep High School, and was the all-around champion at the New York Level 10 State Championship. In 1994, a No. 4 rank nationally on the floor exercise and a tenth place finish in the all-around finished out the year for the Glendale, N.Y., resident.

A student at Townsend Harris High School in Flushing, N.Y., Colucci won the all-around title at the Region VI Championship last weekend. At the Level 10 State Championship, she finished second in the all-around to her future teammate Lopresti, with first places in the vault and floor exercise. She also held top 10 rankings in the all- around (fifth) and floor exercise (seventh) nationally last year.

The two Marylanders also possess impeccable credentials coming out of high school. Gaithersburg High School's Johnson is presently the Maryland Level 10 State Champion in the all-around, with second places in the vault and floor exercise. Last year, she added a third place in the Capital Cup all-around and the East Coast Classic crown to her trophy case.

Sanyal is also familiar with her Maryland teammate, as she competed against Johnson in the Level 10 State Championship, placing fourth on the uneven bars and the all-around. The Eleanor Roosevelt High School student rounded out a successful 1994 with the USAIGC National all-around title, going along with her '93 Maryland all- around championship.

Men's lacrosse defeats Yale

Minuteman defense steps up to hold Bulldogs to two goals

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — In one of the lowest scoring games in recent memory, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team came out on top, winning the battle of defenses and beating Yale 6–2 on the road yesterday.

The win improves the Minutemen to 6–3 on the season. They are currently undefeated in the New England region at 4–0. They will face off against Brown, who is also unbeaten in the region, next Wednesday to determine the New England Champion.

Massachusetts	6
Yale	2

The pregame hype was for a potential showdown between high scoring attackers Brendan Glass of UMass and Tom Zaccagnino of Yale. A showdown did occur, but it was the defenses that captured the spotlight.

The Bulldog defense was solid. They kept Glass, who torched Yale for seven goals last year, off the board and limited the Minuteman offense that had averaged almost 12 goals a game to only six. The Massachusetts defense did the home team one better, however.

To give up only five goals in a Division I game would have been noteworthy, but to give up only two is unheard of. The Minuteman defense forced the Bulldogs to keep the ball on the perimeter, where they couldn't get many scoring chances.

"The defense played outstanding," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "It's been like that all year."

When they did get shots though, freshman goaltender John Kassalakis was solid turning back 10 shots in his first complete collegiate game.

"I think it was a good overall day," Kassalakis said. "We played well defensively."

"He played a great game," said junior Eric Bailey. "He stopped everything low. He stopped everything high, and he stopped everything in between."

The Minutemen got on the board first, as 2:51 into the contest, Henry Stanziale took a pass from Jim Kennedy in front of the net and tucked it past Yale goalie Peter Tourian to give UMass a 1–0 lead.

When Buddy Hoffman scored his sixth goal of the season 37 seconds later, it appeared like UMass might be headed for another offensive explosion, but it wasn't meant to be this afternoon.

Bob Berls cut the Massachusetts lead in half on an extra- man opportunity. Kassalakis had no chance on the play as Berls fired from close range.

In the second period, UMass assist leader Mike Valente got in the goal column for the sixth time this season. After sprinning around the back of the Yale net, he fired a shot past Tourian while being hit by a Yale defender to put Massachusetts ahead 3–1 with 1:26 left in the first half.

The Minutemen furthered their momentum going into intermission shortly afterward, when Casey Costello fired a shot through Tourian's legs to give Massachusetts a 4–1 lead.

COLLEGIAN FILE

The UMass men's lacrosse team overcame a tough Yale defense on its way to a 6–2 victory yesterday in New Haven.

Yale scored the only goal of the third period when Shawn O'Rourke had an unassisted strike to cut the UMass lead to 4–2, in a quarter completely dominated by defense.

Bailey's highlight film goal, 4:22 into the final stanza, ended any hopes of a Yale comeback. Bailey's fake to the right fooled both the Bulldog defender and Tourian, leaving Bailey the entire left side of the net to shoot into. Chris Grande added some insurance with 4:31 left to close out the scoring.

The Minutemen return to action on Saturday for the marquee game of the year, as they will take on the No. 2 nationally ranked Syracuse Orangemen at Richard F. Garber Field. After the game, some UMass players were already looking ahead to the match–up.

UNH topples women's lax at home

Minutewomen unable to capitalize on 4–2 halftime lead

By Allison Connolly

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was unable to follow through on a 4–2 lead going into the second half and were defeated by the University of New Hampshire, 9–6, yesterday at Totman Field.

Massachusetts	6
New Hampshire	9

Outscoring UMass 7–2 in the second half, UNH (6–5) was able to pull ahead and capture this hard–fought defensive battle.

The Minutewomen (3–8) came out strong and fearless, scoring four big goals in the first 10 minutes.

Sophomore Stephanie Walsh scored the opening Massachusetts goal on the first break, with only a couple of minutes off the clock. Freshman Joanna Dignazio followed with what would be her first of three goals of the game. Freshman Vicky Nedomansky scored a goal in each half to round out the scoring for the Minutewomen.

UMass only allowed the Wildcats two goals in the first half, going into the second with a lead of 4–2.

In the second half, UMass came out strong again, with Dignazio scoring in just a minute and a half. However, her goal was followed seconds later by a New Hampshire. Within the next 10 minutes of the half, the Wildcats had the game tied at 6–6.

The Minutewomen never gave their opponents a second to savor their lead, playing hard and aggressively until the final buzzer. The Wildcats did their best to run down the clock, until they ended with a final lead of 9–6.

Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan was pleased with her team's steadfast effort against a more experienced New Hampshire team, consisting mainly of seniors.

"Overall, I was thrilled with this game. I think we came out strong and played strong. We had two turnovers that they really capitalized on," she said. "They are a very experienced team, most of whom will graduate this year.

"I think we did some really good things out there. Our draw positions were excellent against these tall, big girls. It's getting better and better."

The UMass defense was successful in frustrating their opponents by staying tight and working closely with the midfield to keep the ball in the control of the offense.

Freshman goaltender Kate Brew had an outstanding game, making consecutive big saves. She has remained in the national top 10 for save percentage every week of this

Canucks miss Quinn, Renberg worth money

Will a Pacific Division team make round two of the playoffs? Only the Calgary Flames will be favored to advance, and don't expect any deja vu if there's a Detroit– San Jose rematch.

Vancouver? The feeling is last year's trip to the finals was a fluke, but that's an unfair assesment. The Canucks are a quality team that has finished this year on a high; they also bolstered their roster with the additions of Russ Courtnall, Jiri Slegr and Roman Oksiuta.

Ted Kottler on the NHL

But they miss coach Pat Quinn, a tremendous motivator and tactician, and the two best players in the lineup, goalie Kirk McLean and sniping winger Pavel Bure, have not played their best hockey this season.

In every season's playoffs there seems to be one masked marvel who propels his club above and beyond all expectations. Last year there were two: New Jersey's Martin Brodeur and McLean. Captain Kirk was the most porous of sieves early this season, but he's helped settle Vancouver into the sixth slot. Don't forget, the Canucks were seeded seventh last year.

So what's Bure's excuse? I'm afraid he has none. With only 16 goals, he's been a shadow of the scorer he was each of the last two seasons. Even worse, the Russian Rocket hasn't inspired fear in opposing defenses as he once did, when he could take over a game on his own. Did last year's crushing conclusion drain his desire?

Trade rumors have flown all around Bure, but it would be nice if he'd make it clear whether he wants to stay or go. Vancouver deserves better than a disgruntled Bure sabotaging its playoff bid. Either he gives his all or Quinn, now general manager, gives him up.

• Eric Lindros will probably haul in the Hart Trophy, but his linemate, Mikael Renberg, is easily the league's best player–per–dollar. Renberg carts home just $280,000 per annum, less than 10–percent of Lindros' take. Lindros leads the league with 66 points (26 goals, 40 assists), but Renberg has 54 (25, 29).

• Also from the Flyers' camp: if the Red Sox are looking for another veteran power hitter, they could always sign Ron Hextall. He could lobby for the legalization of aluminum bats.

• Coming to an AHL rink near you: the Ottawa Senators. Not actually, but they make a good case for relegation. One reason: their 1994 first round draft choice, Radek Bonk, is ESPN's Chris Myers' dream. ("You, you're not good!" Myers could say of Bonk on any SportsCenter broadcast.) In cycling, "bonk" means to suddenly lose all one's energy. In hockey, it may come to mean playing like this overrated goon.

• No doubt Florida Panthers' coach Roger Neilson preaches the neutral zone trap, designed to limit an opponents' scoring chances, at Trinity Hockey School as well. Among the goaltending instructors: Ron Tugnutt, Kay Whitmore, Mike

Men's gymnastics season one to remember

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

As the 1994–95 men's gymnastics season drew to a close over the weekend, the University of Massachusetts squad has many positives to hold on with them over the summer, as they prepare for next season.

Receiving national attention this year were three members of the Minutemen. Freshman Kevin Schwartz was the first Minuteman since 1993 (Jason Brown on the floor exercise) to advance to the NCAA Championships. He qualified for the national meet by scoring a 9.80 on the still rings at the regionals held two weeks ago, placing him fourth in the meet.

In his first ever collegiate meet, the UMass Open, he broke the school record by scoring a 9.80. He then went on to break the record twice more as first he scored a 9.90 in a dual meet at Air Force, and then set the UMass record that now stands at the New England Championships by scoring a 9.95.

With one non–requirement in his routine, a missed handstand, he dropped to a finals score of 9.25 which placed him ninth in the country. Though Schwartz was disappointed with his performance in the finals over the weekend, he kept in mind that he is only a freshman and has the opportunity to return in the future.

"I have a lot to prove out there," Schwartz said. "But then again, I do have three more years left."

"The first three quarters of his routine was as good as any he had all year," UMass coach Roy Johnson added. "I think he just lost focus and got too far ahead of himself in his routine, and not thought enough about the handstand. He'll be back."

The other Minuteman to qualify for the NCAA regionals was sophomore Ruslan Shupak on the vault. This was his second trip to the event. With both attempts he has fallen just short of advancing to the nationals. In both meets his score was .05 from placing him in the event.

For the second time in his 18 years at the helm of UMass mens' gymnastics, Johnson was named Coach of the Year for the East region. Over his tenure, he has led the Minutemen to a record of 123–71, and has been a driving force behind the development of Schwartz, Shupak and his other athletes.

"I think when a coach wins regional coach of the year, it is a real team effort," Johnson said of the honor bestowed upon him. "I think we have a bunch of guys in the finals over the weekend, he kept in

Women's gym signs new recruits

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

There have been hints and allegations, but yesterday the letters–of–intent for the 1995–96 season were announced for the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team.

Speculation has been that this recruiting class for coach Dave Kuzara would be considered one of the best in the nation, and with the four student–athletes signed, it does not disappoint.

The four signees for UMass all have Atlantic Coast connections, with two New Yorkers, Betsy Colucci and Michelle Lopresti, and two from Maryland, Denise Johnson and Anita Sanyal. All have been on top of either state or national competitions, and the winning national tradition second year coach Kuzara wants to build appears to have its solid foundation.

"This is clearly the best class we have had in the history of the program, and is probably one of the top five classes in the nation," Kuzara said.

"They will all fill key positions for us next year, providing a solid lineup which will enable us to qualify for Nationals. We are excited because they are not only good athletes, they are all great students as well."

The two New York natives already are experienced with each other's talents, as they both worked under the tutelage of Nina and Igor Kolpakchi at Nina's Gymnastics

Minutewomen to face Lady Knights

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

If there is one thing for certain about the Army softball team, the Lady Knights will be in playing shape.

"Obviously, they will be fit. They will be in good shape," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said.

What's uncertain about the Lady Knights is if they are talented enough to take Massachusetts in tomorrow's doubleheader at Totman Field at 3 p.m.

Army heads into the double dip with a 7–25 record (2–4 in the Patriot League). The offense fails to offer a hitter with a .300 average or better, and the second pitcher in the rotation has a 1–13 record with a 5.95 earned run average.

As for Sortino, she is not particularly familiar with the Lady Knights.

"We haven't played against them in two years, so I don't know too much about them," Sortino said. "We're looking for two big games. For our kids, it's important because we want a good feeling heading into the weekend swing."

The Minutewomen sport four players hitting over .300. Leftfielder Chris Martens leads the team in batting with a .380 average. Third baseman Sam Cardenas is tops on the team in runs batted in (31) and runs scored (33), and has 50 hits while batting .365. Second baseman Tracey Osier (.351), who was caught stealing for the first time all season in the Rhode Island doubleheader, still leads the team with 14 stolen bases.

The hot player coming out of the batter's box as of late is first baseman Kim Gutridge, who has hit in 21 consecutive games. The freshman is in a tie for the second longest streak in school history (with teammate Cardenas), and is inching her way closer to the record set by Barb Mareau (27 games in 1992).

Kelly Buckley, who hit a homer in the second game against URI that was the first of back–to–back dingers with Gutridge, is batting .298 and was noted by Sortino after Tuesday's games.

"Kelly hits a homerun, and then Kim takes the first pitch over the fence," Sortino said. "They can belt the ball. The wind was going the right way. It was that kind of day."

Kelly Daut enters the Army games with 19 wins under her belt. The senior co–captain is 19–6 on the year, and owns an outstanding 0.90 ERA. She only let up one earned run against the Rams, and gave up five hits while throwing four strikeouts, despite feeling sick throughout the game.

"Kelly was definitely under the weather. She probably shouldn't have been out there. But she was a trooper, and she pitched a solid game," Sortino said.

Dani Ortega pitched an impressive 3–0 shutout in the second URI game. "Dani gave one of her finest performances. She had a great game," Sortino said.

As for the team's effort, Sortino is pleased.

"The team's playing well," Sortino said. "We're just taking it one step at a time."

University daughters get down to business

■ University Health Services, women's athletic teams show options at second annual event

By Marni E. Helfner
Collegian Staff

"I just wanted to work with my mom," summed up Bianca Humphries, age 10 of Amherst. Such was the common sentiment of the many young girls and women and their parents who participated in the annual "National Take Our Daughters to Work Day" yesterday. Young women from age 5 and up participated in the event.

As part of the Ms. Foundation for Women, "National Take Our Daughters to Work Day" has taken place nationally for the past three years and at the University of Massachusetts for the last two years. Sponsored primarily by the Faculty Senate Status of Women Council and the Chancellor's Office, the event has grown extensively between last year and this year. Taking place on the Mullins Center Concourse, every part of the day's activities was donated to and sponsored by various campus offices and groups including the Everywoman's Center, PVTA, the Affirmative Action/Equal Employment Office, the Campus Center and the Mullins Center.

Events of the day

The day was scheduled with various activities for the young women who participated. They started the day with breakfast and a round of informational tables; next, they chose a tour to take them from various departments; then, they had lunch on their own, and finally spent the rest of the day with their respective parents.

The tables on the Mullins Center Concourse represented 33 UMass departments and offices including a fairly popular table from the women's basketball and volleyball teams. Various members of the teams were present signing posters for the enthusiastic girls. Junior communications major and center for the basketball team, Melissa Gurtle, said, "I had never heard of it before, but I think it's a great idea."

UMass women's basketball coach Joanie O'Brien said, "Well, for us, it's great because a lot of these girls have been to our games and it gives them the opportunity to see the team members out of uniform. It helps us to get out into the community and thank our fans and be a role model for the girls of Amherst."

"I think this year's been a big success for the team, and they're more than happy to give back — especially to these young girls who might aspire to what they do," said O'Brien.

Sabriya Mitchell, sophomore education major and guard for the basketball team, said, "I was more than willing to come and help out for the girls."

Campus departmental representation

A wide variety of tables were present including academic departments and administration offices — some of which were swamped. Particularly busy were the tables around math and science fields.

The first table on the concourse was from University Health Services, which had a slide show and lighted x–rays. "It's been overwhelming — we've had a wonderful response. We had one young lady come through earlier who said she wanted to be a brain surgeon," said Maureen Townsend of the UHS personnel office.

Maria Coach, financial manager of UHS, added, "I didn't expect so many people, and one of the things we want girls to realize is that Health Care is a diversified field, and the number of opportunities are numerous. The health care is so wide, there's a lot of interest in the health care support services."

Participant viewpoint

Created in order to expose young girls to the opportunities within the workplace, most of the young women present were with mothers or other female adults. However, quite a few fathers were present as well. Tom Carroll, a trades worker for Housing, brought his daughters, Eileen, 14 and

Service remembers victims of Holocaust

SHINICHIRO SUZUKI / COLLEGIAN

UMass student Tessa Milofsky took part in the lighting of the Yartzeit Candles at the Holocaust Commeration Service held yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge.

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

Society has the responsibility to "make sure it never, never happens again," said Gita Mann, Holocaust Memorial Week Committee Chair, during the commemoration service held yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Mann was the opening speaker for the service that entailed poetry readings, speakers from the University of Massachusetts community, yartzeit candles lit in memoriam of the victims, a violin solo, a prayer for the dead known as the mourner's kaddish and a moment of silence that ended the service.

"I would give my life to ensure the Holocaust never happens again," Mann said. "There is a part of me that trembles every time I hear the word 'Holocaust.'"

Nurit Ben–Harav, president of UMass Hillel Foundation, said she spoke at the bequest of her grandfather who survived Buchenwald, a Nazi death camp in Germany.

In his early–20s after having been a prisoner at the camp for six years, he weighed 68 pounds upon liberation from the German camp, she said. He then immigrated to Israel.

"The pain of the memories never left him," Ben–Harav said.

She said that he told her before his death last summer that it was her responsibility for telling the stories, and she asked the audience to convey the stories to others, as well.

Jaime Resnick, a Jewish UMass student, spoke about the anti–Semitic sentiments which exists today. When discussing the UMass campus, he pointed to certain articles in the Collegian as an "outlet" for the sentiment of "evil people."

He paraphrased a high ranking Nazi SS leader who said if you tell a lie enough times it becomes the truth.

"People must stand up and refute lies," Resnick said, before he lit a commemorative candle. "We must constantly fight people trying to split us apart."

According to Kaiya Hahn d'Errico, director for the Center for Student Business, who is German, she attended the service because "it would be easier to be silent, but that's what Germans did, so I must speak out.

"I'm lighting this candle as a German, with the hope that my courage as an individual and the courage of my government might grow," d'Errico said.

David Bloom, professor in the school of education, spoke about his recent trip to Germany when he attended a conference. He spoke of the xenophobic graffiti he saw which read "Turks get out. Turks Die."

Bloom said he went to Dachau, another German concentration camp, and it was a "gorgeous day."

However, while walking around the camp, Bloom said he "began to resent the sun" because it should not be a beautiful day at Dachau.

"It's not enough to remember the past," he said, before lighting a candle. "We must remember the present, we must remember the future or remembering the past has no meaning."

Tessa Milofsky, also a UMass student, spoke about a survivor's lecture she heard in high school. She said that students sitting behind her, who were not Jewish, were "cracking jokes, chewing gum, talking and being very rude."

Before she lit a candle, she said she was scared that these people "showed [the Holocaust] off to the side."

Paul Entis, a UMass graduate student and Hillel Outreach Coordinator, said he found difficulty in understanding the "cataclysmic and inexplicable events" when "Jews, gays, asocials, political prisoners, and gypsies" were killed in masses by the German regime.

He criticized those who were "complicit and did nothing" and who collaborated, then commended the "righteous gentiles ... these good people who helped the Jews ... we must remember them" before lighting a candle.

Robyn Novick, also a UMass student, described her collegiate experience and her attempts to "understand human behavior."

She talked about her experiences travcling in Poland and touring the concentration camps.

"Why do these people hate us?" she asked. She asked the audience for increased involvement in fighting ageism, sexism, elitism, classism, racism, anti–Semitism, homophobia and other forms of hatred as ways of "disempowering the murderers," and then lit the last of six candles, each of which were in memory of one million murdered people.

Mann then played a violin solo of John Williams' "Theme from Schindler's List."

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, Hillel Director, led the "prayer for the dead," before asking that the audience observe a moment of silence.

McVeigh incriminated, ordered to stand trial

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Timothy McVeigh, incriminated by "an indelible trail of evidence," was ordered yesterday to stand trial in the Oklahoma bombing, while authorities put out an alert for his missing Arizona license plate in hopes it will lead them to the second suspect. Their fear: John Doe No. 2 may bomb again. Federal magistrate Ronald Howland also ordered McVeigh held without bail.

The decision came after four hours of testimony from special agent John Hersley in which he described accounts of several witnesses, including one man who saw McVeigh's yellow Mercury speeding away from a parking lot near the building with McVeigh and a second passenger.

Hersley said at the hearing his "primary responsibility is to find the other subject to prevent another bomb from going off." The death toll in the nation's largest terror attack, meanwhile, passed a grim milestone: More than 100 bodies have now been found in the rubble of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

Another witness, a meter maid, told the FBI she saw the defendant driving a Ryder truck headed toward her in the direction of the building shortly before the blast. The truck was moving slowly enough that she thought the driver was going to stop and ask directions.

She described only one occupant in the truck, but other witnesses said there were two.

Other witnesses claim to have seen McVeigh in the area a few days before the bombing. One, who claimed to have seen McVeigh on April 13, 17 and 18, made a positive ID of him in a Dunup Saturday.

In his ruling, Howland said: "The court finds an indelible trail of evidence that starts in Junction City and ends up at the front door of the Murrah building." Junction City, Kan., is where McVeigh rented the truck that authorities believe carried the bomb to Oklahoma City.

McVeigh followed the proceedings intently, showing little emotion but chuckling a few times during light–hearted moments. He seemed most interested when one of his attorneys showed the court a large collection of newspaper headlines about the case.

New student meal plan makes off–campus restaurants available

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

If you are moving off campus next semester, but worried you might starve because you do not know how to cook, there are dining options.

Off campus students now have the option of a new dining program known as the Off Campus Meal Plan (OCMP) which two University of Massachusetts alumni began as a supplement to the dining halls.

The Off Campus Meal Plan exclusively offers juniors and seniors who live off campus the opportunity to dine at various restaurants in Amherst such as Rafters Sports Bar and Grill, El Acuna Tex–Mex Cantina, Delano's, DP Dough, Subway, and D'Angelos Sandwich Shop.

There are some restrictions upon the program such as no alcohol or appetizers, and no seating during weekends at Rafters and El Acuna.

Like the dinning halls students pay for the service in advance and are issued an identification card which is used to keep track of meals.

Students can have lunch or dinner at any of the participating restaurants during regular business hours.

"A program like this has to be easy for the customer and the restaurant which will be good for business," said Jerry Jolly, owner of Rafters and UMass alumnus.

Students will receive a $6 or $7 meal at a cost of approximately $5.50. Students interested in the program can choose either five, seven or 10 meal plan at a cost of $385, $539 and $770 per semester respectively.

Many of the participating restaurants are putting together special menus or complementary menus for OCMP customers.

"We have a special menu along with the regular menu which will provide a varied selection," said Jolly.

Kiernan Boyle, founder and sports management graduate from 1990, and David Diana, founder and marketing graduate from 1994, said they wanted the food options to be healthy and culturally diverse.

Boyle and Diana said they had both lived off campus when they attended the University, and they often did not eat very healthy. Diana said he survived on raman noodles, and Boyle said he survived on hot dogs.

"It is a step above home cooking, and it has more structure," Diana said.

To cover the cultural aspects Diana and Boyle signed El Acuna which serves Mexican dishes, and Delano's which serves Italian cuisine. Diana said he is hoping to add a Chinese restaurant in the future.

Last spring Diana thought up the idea of OCMP while sitting by the campus pond penniless and hungry, he said. He then proceeded to investigate the idea by conducting a survey

UM engineers set sail with concrete canoe

■ Students participate in annual exhibition

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts engineering students were weighted down with praise Wednesday, after launching and successfully sailing a concrete canoe across the campus pond.

The canoe, dubbed "Greased Lightning," is the entry of the American Society of Civil Engineers (ASCE) UMass chapter into the Northeast Regional Concrete Canoe Competition.

The concrete canoe project has been ongoing since early last November, according to Kerry McCormick, president of ASCE.

The project team consists of 25 UMass ASCE student– members, and is headed by McCormick and Travis Mitchell, a UMass engineering major.

"The biggest advantage of working on this project is that it gets [engineering students] to work together," Mitchell said, "and it's a lot of fun as well."

The competition is a student project which earns them no credit, but does help them to gain knowledge in civil engineering practices.

While the contest as a whole is sponsored by the national ASCE, the local chapters get no financial or technical support from them. This being the case, the University's project team had to look to outside companies for support.

Amongst the companies which lent their support were Daniel O'Connell and Sons, from Chicopee, who lent sanders and other equipment and concrete supplies.

Norlite, a company from Cahose N.Y., also donated aggregate, in this case a special type of ceramic beads to make the canoe light, McCormick said.

This year's team has a leg–up on its predecessors, because last year was the first time a set of detailed notes on the project were kept. Before this year, every team had to start from scratch, said John DeCrout, the liaison between the ASCE and its school chapters.

This year's project is a major suc–

Grad student panels discuss women's lives

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Graduate students will "address women's lives" this afternoon by presenting academic papers from several disciplines in the first of what organizers said they hope will be an annual conference.

Sponsored by the Women's Studies Program and the Graduate School at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst two sets of panels will present papers on topics such as sexuality, politics, women's progress, stereotypes and gender construction.

Co-organizer Joyce Avrech Berkman, a history professor at UMass, said the paper topics are "diverse in terms of race and ethnicity."

Graduate student Valerie Carey is co-organizing the conference with Avrech Berkman. She said the goal of the conference is for graduate students "to try to make connections between disciplines."

Carey said it will be a forum for students who are doing research to share ideas. Avrech Berkman said the conference intends to recognize graduate students "on the cutting edge of disciplines," to bring them together to learn how to think from different perspectives.

The organizers said they would like to see future conferences draw more academics from the natural and physical sciences.

Currently graduate students cannot major or minor in Women's Studies, said Avrech Berkman. She said many students relate their academic papers to women's issues, prompting the conference to bring those academics together on common ground.

Charlene Seymour, dean of the Graduate School, said when the idea was brought to her, she "recognized the importance and gave it my full support."

Seymour said she is encouraged by the "mentoring role" of the faculty. She added, "The best scholars mentoring graduate students ... will lead to further scholarship."

The dean said she would like to see "more collaborative works between the faculty and students to be showcased on campus."

The Panels

The first of the two panels will run from 3 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. in the Campus Center. Three simultaneous discussions will be held, each with three students presenting.

In room 165, Karen Adkins, a philosophy graduate student will moderate "Discursive Practices, Sexual Subjectivities and Affinity Politics."

Anthropology graduate student Mary Anne Levine will moderate "Historical Perspectives on Gender Relations" in room 168c.

"Preconceived Notions: Society's Biases as Barriers to Women's Progress" will be moderated in room 169 by history graduate student Denise Pieczynski.

The second set of panels will run from 4:45 p.m. until 6:15 p.m.

"Re-Discovering Women Writers from Other Cultures Into the English Speaking World" will be moderated by Ymitri Jayasundera, an English graduate student in room 165.

In room 168c, Suzanne LaGrande a communication graduate student will moderate "Bad Girls, Victims, And Exotic Others: Media (Mis)Representations of Women."

Carey will moderate "Intersections of the Female Self: Orality, Social Control and the Construction of Gender" in room 169.

Virginia Supreme Court takes lesbian's daughter

By Larry O'Dell
Associated Press

RICHMOND, Va. — Gay-rights advocates assailed a Virginia Supreme Court decision denying a lesbian custody of her son, while conservative groups hailed it as a victory for decency.

In a 4-3 decision last Friday, the court said Sharon Bottoms is an unfit mother and 3-year-old Tyler Doustou should remain in the custody of his maternal grandmother.

"Common sense tells us a parent's sexual practices have a strong influence on a child," said Kristi Hamrick, spokeswoman for the Washington-based Family Research Council, a group she described as a pro-family public policy organization.

"One of the messages of lesbianism is that men are not necessary, that men and women are interchangeable puzzle pieces," Hamrick said.

Mike Russell, spokesman for Pat Robertson's Christian Coalition, said the ruling "is in keeping with what we think is mainstream Middle America's wishes." He said the 1.5 million-member coalition believes courts "should do all they can to strengthen the traditional family."

Elizabeth Birch, executive director of the Washington-based Human Rights Campaign Fund, had a different view.

"Anyone who truly cares about families should be morally outraged that the government has taken a child from his own loving mother because of other people's prejudices," she said.

Kate Kendall, legal director of the National Center for Lesbian Rights in San Francisco, said Virginia is one of a half-dozen states whose highest courts appear to have taken the position that homosexuality alone makes a parent unfit. She said the others are Mississippi, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota and Oklahoma.

But Kay Bottoms, who retained custody of Tyler while the case was appealed, said the court recognized there were factors other than homosexuality that made her daughter a bad mother.

"Thank God they proved her unfit besides just being a lesbian," she told radio station WFLS in Fredericksburg, Va. "She neglected this baby a lot. I didn't fight her just because she turned lesbian."

Kay Bottoms accused the American Civil Liberties Union and the media of turning the case into a homosexual-rights issue.

Sharon Bottoms was advised not to talk to reporters for a couple of days, said one of her lawyers, Player Michelson. Michelson said her client was "floored" by the ruling.

"There's a lot of anger, and we don't want to say anything that could be taken wrong," said Sharon Bottoms' companion, April Wade.

In the ruling, the Supreme Court said lesbianism was one of many factors that made Sharon Bottoms an unfit mother. Sharon Bottoms testified two years ago that she and Ms. Wade have oral sex, a felony in Virginia for heterosexuals as well as homosexuals.

Other factors cited in the court's decision included her history of moving from place to place, relying on others for support and "difficulty controlling her temper," the justices said.

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Barbara M. Keenan wrote that the intermediate appeals court properly ruled that "adverse effects of a parent's homosexuality on a child cannot be assumed without specific proof."

WOMEN making WAVES

Evers-Williams stepping up

In 1994, the NAACP nominated rapper Tupac Shakur for one of its Image Awards, despite the fact that he stood accused of sexual assault at the time. C. DeLores Tucker, chair of the National Political Congress of Black Women, said that the nomination "offended African-American women."

Now black women are hoping that such incidents are things of the past. Last February, the board of the NAACP selected as its chair Myrlie Evers-Williams, a longtime activist whose first husband, civil rights leader Medgar Evers, was assassinated in 1963.

Evers-Williams' 30-to-29 victory was a triumph for the NAACP's woman members, who have long noted that although they outnumber men two to one as general members, they constitute only 25 percent of the organization's board.

"Myrlie Evers-Williams is charged with a difficult task," says Senator Carol Mosely-Braun (D-Ill.), the only African-American female senator. "But, there's an old expression: 'Where God can, he sends a women.'"

Understanding gender

Author Deborah Tannen tells why men and women have a hard time understanding each other in her book You Just Don't Understand.

Tannen's best seller said women speak rapport talk, "the language of conversation and a way of establishing connections." Men speak report talk and are "more likely to want to hold center stage through storytelling, joking, or giving information."

Women are more comfortable talking when they feel safe and connected; men when there is a need to establish status in a group.

Judging Women

When Nancy Gertner arrived at work on her first day as a U.S. district court judge last summer, she donned her robe and plunked herself down in a judge's chair designed for a man who was a foot taller than she. She said that her first court order would be for a couple of phone books.

Despite the oversized chair, Judge Gertner, a former Massachusetts criminal defense lawyer, said she feels just right in her seat on the federal bench—and so do the 45 other women nominated to the 837-person federal judiciary during the first two years of the Clinton presidency.

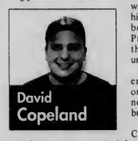
Beating on childhood icons

This past weekend in Boston a man delivering balloons to a children's party while dressed as Big Bird was beaten up by a gang of beer-drinking youths.



Wayne Quinn, the victim who has worked as a bouncer in the past, told the Boston Globe "It's scarier to be Big Bird than it is to be a bouncer at a nightclub."

Quinn joins a Barney, a panda bear and a pink gorilla who were attacked in Massachusetts this past year, as well as a Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle who was performing at a Karate school and used for kicking practice by students who were encouraged by their instructor.

What this represents is further proof that stupid people will commit stupid crimes.

I am a sociology major. In addition to meaning that I will be hopelessly unemployed when I graduate in December, it also means that I am supposed to take a keen interest in why people do things like that. And if I have a tremendous amount of initiative I may even conduct a study on this stupidity.

But why should I? I suppose I could dress one of my roommates up as Ronald McDonald and beat the bag out of him to try and understand what motivates these people, but in either case my conclusion will be the same: These people are not bright.

Take for instance the Garden City, N.Y. executive who was arrested for shattering car and store windows while cruising through Westbury in his Lincoln Continental last month.

Gabriel Scibelli, 42, an import-export executive was arrested in front of his home after a witness gave police his license plate number. The Associated Press reported that the motive was unclear.

The motive is clear enough to me. This once respected man is nothing more than a buffoon.

In March, a California man was sentenced for 25 years to life in prison for stealing a slice of pizza. Under California's new "three strikes, you're out" law, the petty theft was treated as a felony, as the defendant, Jerry DeWayne Williams, had previously been convicted of robbery, attempted robbery, unauthorized use of a motor vehicle and possession of a controlled substance.

In this case I can't decide who is more mentally challenged: Mr. Williams for getting caught for stealing the pizza while on parole or the judge for ending a man's free life for such an insignificant crime.

Sometimes dumb criminals are busted for the actions of their even dumber children. In Albuquerque, N.M., a convicted murderer who broke out of jail tried to elude police by hiding in his refrigerator. He might have gotten away had his two-year-old daughter not pointed to the refrigerator and said, "Daddy's in there."

Remind me that if I ever become a criminal to make sure my kids are in on it too. The family that steals together, stays out of jail together.

Last weekend at Haigis Hoopla a lot of people were asking my team where we got our name. After all, it's not everyday you see a top notch team like ours with the name "Pimps Of Pimpyness."

The name comes from a gang still at large in Toledo, Ohio who stole a 6-foot, 300-pound Big Boy statue from the local Big Boy restaurant. As if stealing this sacred sacrament of American pop culture was not bad enough, the Pimps Of Pimplyness used a hack saw to cut Big Boy into seven pieces and deposited each of the pieces around town.

On the back of each piece was written "Big Boy Is Dead," except for the note attached to one of Big Boy's severed limbs which read "Big Boy is almost dead. Never mind. Now he's dead."

Attached to Big Boy's severed right buttock was a newspaper ad that read "Strip Steak $2.29 a pound." Each of the notes was signed "Pimps of Pimplyness," hence the name of our sad Haigis Hoopla team.

Sgt. Richard Murphy of the Toledo Police Deparment said, "It's really hard to keep a straight face when you talk about it. We've been trying to put him back together again like Humpty Dumpty. I think he looks pretty good for a guy who's been cut up."

What I want to know is how the cops could have missed the Pimps stealing a 300-pound statue in what is presumably a commercially-zoned section of Toledo? With cops like that it's no wonder that stupid criminals can get away.

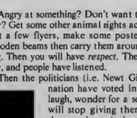
Sitting back with a cold one

I love America. Our country is truly a great place to live, and while the political activists, feminists, environmentalists, or any other naysayers of our fantastic nation are up in arms and complaining, I'll be sitting around eating a big fat McBurger, drinking a 40 and watching Animaniacs. Why? Because I can. The reason I can be a waste of good oxygen is because America allows me that freedom. America gives us all the right to be basically useless.



But isn't it great? I can sit around all day and do absolutely nothing. Or, if I'm feeling a little spunky, I could get up and change the channel on the TV, then fall back into the couch for a few more hours.

As I stare at the screen and listen to the spoon-fed philosophies spewing forth I can relax, look at the ceiling, and wonder why it seems like everyone else is complaining when I am so content.

Why is everyone complaining? What is the great melting pot coming to? Is it a fast food, plastic-wrapped, oppressive to minorities and women and gays and anyone else who's got a problem, injected growth hormone, middle class white male run, television and cartoon violence, rape culture that is plugged into the computer where sitcoms are reality and AIDS gets more publicity when there are millions of others dying of homelessness, drug addiction, cancer, gang violence, drive bys, drunk driving accidents and elevator surfing?

Maybe.

But the wonderful part about America is that you can either sit around and gather dust all day (which is rather enjoyable) or you can actually get something out of the education process that we are all a part of, get angry, get off your lazy ass, and make a change.

At least, that's what everyone thinks. Because that's what we're told. We hear it coming from the megaphones at rallies and marches, on the evening news, in Time magazines and Boston Globes. They have all implied that if the people unite for a cause, this country will change. We have all been duped into thinking that, if we really want to make a difference, America and the great institution of Democracy gives power to the people and changes will somehow result if enough people get annoyed.

Angry at something? Don't want to eat the veal at dinner? Get some other animal rights activists together, hand out a few flyers, make some posters and nail them to wooden beams then carry them around, yelling and chanting. Then you will have respect. Then you have had your say, and people have listened.

Then the politicians (i.e. Newt Gingrich) that we as a nation have voted into office will watch, laugh, wonder for a second if their backers will stop giving them campaign money, then continue signing the papers that keep the calves living in boxes. Maybe, if you're lucky and your group has gotten big enough and raised enough awareness, then these politicians won't get elected back into office and someone new takes over.

But then someone else gets angry, and the process starts all over again with a new group fighting for a different cause.

The problem with America is that it needs a revolution. Not just a little one, but a very big revolution that not only changes the way the system runs, with the way people think about themselves and others. America needs a dictatorship run by someone who can please most of the people and the ones that aren't happy can either go to hell or Greenland wearing a backpack and a smile. America needs sweeping changes to get rid of all the bureaucratic deadweight that has been building up so that it can become the truly great country that it has never quite been.

As these thoughts of revolution come to me as I sit here, I still can't help but to think of one thing: The glory of America is that it will allow me to sit here and do nothing, yet bitch and complain and wonder. America may not be a great place to live, but it's good enough for me and a lot better than some people think.

So until the revolution comes, put down your banners, for they will do no good. Pick up the remote control and grab a beer. Appreciate our country for what it is, for all the freedoms you have; think of the other half of the glass, the half that is full.

Opinion/Editorial

Renewing the love affair

Every year they do the same thing to me. But this year, they really did it to me. By September I'm let down but come April, I'm hooked. Hooked on baseball that is. Hooked on the Red Sox.

During the heart of the worst baseball strike in history, I wanted to write a column condemning the attitude of Major League Baseball, especially on the players' part. I've proudly been a diehard fan for more than 10 years and I figured that I had this right. This right to release my anger and frustrations. Faithfully, I have basked in the sun of the Fenway bleachers every year for the last decade and this is my reward.

I really wanted to tear the players apart. I wanted to accuse them of being money-hungry, self-centered traitors. They were traitors to the game and to the fans. These supposed role-models and hometown heroes showed the world that they'd rather play golf than what they're paid to play, baseball, the game of our national pastime.

But the strike is over and now the players are trying to do their part in the healing process. They're kissing our butts. They're kissing our butts by allowing us to kiss their butts. So far the players are willing to sign a few more autographs (without charge), pose for a couple of more pictures, shake a few more hands and smile just a little more. It's a beautiful scene.

But when the healing process is over, what's going to happen? Are the players going to revert back to their old selves of, "No, the fans can't kiss our butts." Keep in mind, the players can still go on strike any time they want. Nothing has been settled.

But you got to love it. I planned on having my own strike this year too. I planned on giving up baseball. After all these years I actually thought that I could give up the nose-bleed section of the Fenway bleachers, the mouth-watering aroma of Italian sausages, the great hope-raising starts of April and May and the heartbreaking finishes of August and September.

I didn't plan on watching Opening Day. I didn't think that I could anyway. I figured that it wouldn't be on any of the television stations that the University provides for us lucky on-campus residents. But surely enough, when I returned to my room after work last Wednesday at around 2:30 p.m., I flipped on my TV and there they were, my beloved Red Sox on ABC 40.

I was torn. I sat on my couch and I had to watch, I tuned in just in time to see the big seven-run sixth inning that blew away the Twins. It figures because if there's anything that I'm a fool for, it's a big inning.

I saw Jose Canseco drill a bases-loaded single to left-center to drive in two runs. Then Mo Vaughn followed with a double to the centerfield triangle to drive in two more runs. I couldn't help myself from cracking a smile and getting excited again. This was certainly a scene that I can get used to.

They do this to me every year. Baseball and the Red Sox, it's a love and hate relationship.

How quickly we forget.

Letters to the Editor

Think about your fellow UM students

To the editor:

A few days ago, I was emerging from my Shakespeare class, and I took the time to hold the door an extra second or two on my on my way out for a man that walked behind me. He looked up at me and smiled. It was really strange. He was so happy that I had held the door for him, and it made me feel good to make the day of this stranger a little better.

Why am I writing this, you may ask? Because it doesn't happen enough. I'm not saying I'm some saint for holding a door open for some guy, but small acts of benevolence are in high demand on the UMass campus.

Developing nations caption was spiteful

To the editor:

I am writing in regard to the picture of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building and the caption reading "Musta' been the A-rabs!," which was run on the Developing Nations page Tuesday, April 25. Surely the editor of that page must realize that the investigative bureaus of the Federal Government, when dealing with such an atrocious crime, cannot leave even the most unsubstantiated scenarios uninvestigated. In light of the vicious foreign terrorist attack on the World Trade Center in February of 1993, it is only natural that the immediate speculation regarding the Oklahoma City bombing would center on the possibility of foreign terrorist involvement. The editor will please note that it was within mere hours of the bombing that the FBI had traced the rental truck used to deliver the bomb, assembled a composite sketch of two American suspects, and initiated one of the most intense manhunts that this nation has ever seen.

It seems spiteful for the Developing Nations page to print such a caption nearly a whole week after the bombing. As a part of the very media decried by that passage, the Collegian should be working to combat anti-Arab and Muslim sentiments in this country by helping to pick up the pieces in Oklahoma City, and not by clinging to bad feelings generated by one of the worst tragedies in the history of this country.

Editorial shows one side

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the article "Victim of a Trigger Happy American" by Syed Raza on April 25. Upon finishing the article I pondered two questions. Who told him it was an American that was responsible for Basim's death? Then, why did he blame an American in the title without giving sufficient proof of who did it in the article?

With these questions unanswered and once again America portrayed as the evil aggressor, I felt compelled to respond. First, let us all be reminded that Saddam Hussein controls all sources of information within Iraq and in all cases makes the United States out to be the "Great Satan," so where did the person from the U.N. receive his information? If the information was released by sources within Iraq it should be suspect, their goal is to make Americans look evil.

Secondly, Mr. Raza, because of your obvious bias, let me remind you that Saddam invaded Kuwait, thus starting the conflict and was (he thought) prepared to fight. In the Iraqi Army the majority of the over 500,000 regular soldiers were ill trained, poorly equipped and of very low morale. These troops were stationed in front of the "elite" Republican Guard who made sure that these soldiers did not surrender or retreat, for if they tried, they would be executed, a doctrine of many regimes with poorly trained soldiers like this one. The thousands of Iraqi soldiers that surrendered to the Americans were happy to be there and did not want to return. They were fully aware of how ruthless dictators treat soldiers who retreat or surrender. So you may want to ask the source of your information if the bullets that killed your cousin were 7.62 rounds from an AK-47 or 5.56 from an American M-16, it is easy to distinguish standard NATO rounds from those supplied from the former Soviet Union.

Lastly, if the rounds were from an American weapon, I encourage you to research the numerous times American units were fired upon after the Iraqis had seemingly surrendered. In addition to happening to ground troops, it happened to pilots of helicopters providing ground support and to tank battalions who encountered Iraqi units with backward turrets, an international sign of surrender, who then proceeded to fire upon them. This appeared to be a doctrine of the Iraqis, as their battle was insurmountable, so white flags are not only peaceful symbols, but, can be instruments of war.

So, Mr. Raza, it would be immensely appreciated if you would not lay blame on an American and possibly incite more unnecessary violence on us and our way of life without even providing justifiable proof.

Digable Planets will bring their blend of rap and jazz to Pearl Street this Sunday.

Planets take rap to new level

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

One part hip-hop, one part jazz, one part Latin and smooth all over, Digable Planets' sound is definitely a tough one to pin down, but you can try to decide for yourself when they roll into town on Sunday night for a show at Pearl Street.

Hailing from Washington D.C., Digable Planets' sound comes from the blending of the musical interests of its three members. Ladybug's love of Latin rhythms, combined with Butterfly's deep jazz roots and Doodlebug's experience in the hip-hop scene have all left their mark on the Planets' sound.

Their debut album, Reachin' (a new refutation of time and space) catapulted them into the limelight on the strength of the single "Rebirth of Slick (Cool Like Dat)," which ended up as the number two rap single of 1993 on Billboard's charts.

The commercial success of "Rebirth of Slick" brought along with it a flood of critical acclaim, including a Billboard Music Video Award, a Soul Train Music Award nomination and a Grammy for Best Rap Performance by a Duo or Group. The highly-attended world tour that followed only helped to further elevate their fan base and increase their popularity.

On tour to support their latest album, Blowout Comb, the Planets' sound has taken a few turns. A more laid back and possibly more serious effort than Reachin', Blowout Comb is still chock full of the intricate rhyming and rapping but tackles some higher issues than before.

Notions of culture, corporate America and its dealings with black society and the tradition of black society in this era are a few of the subjects touched upon on Comb, and the trio enlisted several guests to help them out in recording the album in addition to the five musicians utilized to flush out their sound.

Hip-hop legend Jazzy Joyce and England's acid jazz guru Sarah Webb are just a couple of the cameos on Blowout Comb, contributing to the continued elevation and progression of the Digable Planets sound.

Digable Planets will play Pearl Street on Sun. April 30. The show is 18+ and doors open at 8 p.m. Tickets are $14 in advance and $16 at the door. For more information call Pearl Street at 584-7771.

Wednesday evening a crowd of about 50 people attended a special showing of Unzere Kinder (Our Children) in the Campus Center as part of Holocaust memorial week activities. The film portrays the lives of children who have survived the Holocaust.

Filmed in 1948, in Poland, the film is the creation of four survivors — two actors and two movie makers who are Jewish and Polish. Unzere Kinder is the last Yiddish film made in Poland, and it was filmed under the eyes of the Polish Communist Party. The result is obvious in both the fact that it was never shown in Poland and the obscure references to communist party constructs such as the orphanage and the co-operative.

An original nitrate print of the film was found in 1979, was restored by the National Center for Jewish Film, and released in 1991 with English subtitles.

An emotionally stirring film, the movie explores the relationship that develops between a pair of gentile actors and an orphanage of children who are Jewish Holocaust survivors.

Moving in and out of flashback scenes, the audience is exposed to the unique and sad experiences of three of the children. One young boy speaks of having to hide behind a bookcase for days at a time and is eventually saved by rolling himself up into a rug as the Nazis storm into the apartment. Another young boy talks of how his mother convinces him to run away from the Nazis, and as he runs a scuffle ensues between the Nazis and the resistance fighters. His scene ends with a chilling line, "My mother died not knowing if I was alive or not. I still hear her calling my name."

The third child, a young girl, describes how a truck full of children stopped in a village to make a repair and a Nazi officer offers a "filthy Jewish vermin" to the local peasants for a price. An elderly man sees the eyes of the children and gives the officer a bill. The Nazi picks up the young child and throws her to the ground. With great dignity, the old man picks up the girl and takes her into her arms. Together they watch the truck roll away to the children's impending deaths. She ends the scene by saying, "And that is how I survived the war."

Filmed at and including children from the actual Helenowek Colony Orphanage, Unzere Kinder is a treasure of a find for the Jewish Community and is another resource for remembering the Holocaust.

Sonic Youth, Dino Jr. to play double bill

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Tonight, guitar terrorism will invade the Valley as two of alternative music's biggest names, Sonic Youth and Dinosaur Jr., take the stage at Amherst College's Le Frak gymnasium. In the last few years, both bands have developed into critical as well as mainstream favorites based on their ability to take experimental guitar tactics and deliver them in a nice, user-friendly package.

Although they have not released an album since last year's Experimental Jet Set, Trash And No Star, Sonic Youth have recently seen a rediscovery of their lengthy career. Most of the group's earlier efforts have recently been re-released by the band's current label DGC Records, exposing a new generation to their legendary sound. They are also preparing for an opening slot on R.E.M.'s much ballyhooed American tour.

Made up of guitarists Thurston Moore and Lee Ranaldo, bassist Kim Gordon and drummer Steve Shelley, Sonic Youth have established their reputation by pushing the boundaries of rock conventions, experimenting with elements of punk, alternate tunings and free-form noise.

The group is considered to be the forefathers of "grunge" although they have never received the commercial success of such bands as Nirvana.

Headlining the show will be area darlings Dinosaur Jr., whose humble origins are right here in the Valley, though they have since moved on to international stardom. Led by enigmatic singer/guitarist J. Mascis, Dinosaur Jr. have been propelled into the spotlight thanks to their blend of hard-hitting classic rock cum punk rock.

Beginning under the moniker Dinosaur, the band released their debut album on Homestead Records. Almost as soon as it was released, though, they found themselves sharing their name with an aged hippie band, and to avoid a law suit, adopted a Jr. at the end of it.

After releasing two critically acclaimed albums, Your Living All Over Me and Bug, on SST Records, the band made a jump to the majors, landing a contract with DGC. On their major-label debut, Green Mind, the band adopted a much more polished, radio-friendly sound and the result was a lukewarm reception from critics but a big step in the direction of mainstream success.

In 1993, Where You Been propelled the band into the Alternative Nation spotlight thanks to the success of its first single "Start Choppin'." Last year the group released their follow-up, Without A Sound, and found their first single "Feel The Pain" making a big dent on the radio charts. Now, after gracing millions of TV screens and the main stage of Lollapalooza, Dinosaur Jr. will be returning to the Valley for their first local performance in almost two years.

Matador Records recording artists Come will open the show with their brand blues rock with an alternative edge. The band headlined at this year's Loud Music festival.

Sonic Youth, Dinosaur Jr. and Come will play tonight at the Amherst College Le Frak gymnasium. Tickets are $18 and are available at The Northampton Box Office and Ice The Record.

Author examines nuclear policy

Tells of experiences of Hiroshima and decision to drop bombs

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Correspondent

"If you have a nuclear weapon and you point it at a target, whether or not you pull the trigger, you are still using nuclear terror ... what kind of society would use the threat of mass annihilation, making Auschwitz pale in comparison, central to its foreign policy?" asked author Joseph Gerson.

Gerson spoke this past Tuesday about his book, With Hiroshima Eyes, and his experiences in Japan, which detailed hearing the testimonies of hibakusha (witness/survivors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki).

Gerson began with a testimony from Michiko Yamaoka, "I made my way towards the mountain, where there was no fire. On this flight I saw a friend of mine ... My face was so swollen she couldn't tell who I was. Finally she recognized my voice. She said, 'Miss Yamaoka, you look like a monster!' That's the first time I heard that word. I looked at my hands and saw my own skin hanging down and the red flesh exposed."

Gerson said that one of the purposes of his book was to bring forward the voices and experiences of hibakusha, voices like that of Michiko Yamaoka's, into the consciousness of the people in the United States, in order to show the reality of nuclear weapons.

Gerson spoke of how he wanted to re-explore the decision- making process behind the bombing on Hiroshima and Nagasaki during World War II.

Gerson expanded on this issue, speaking of how Henry Stimson, then Secretary of War under President Truman, advised to the latter that he "did not want to have the United States get the reputation of outdoing Hitler in atrocities." Despite Stimson's advice, Truman dropped the bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Gerson solemnly reminded the audience.

He stated that even before Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the fire bombings in Tokyo devastated Japan so much that advisors to Truman said the Atom bomb wasn't needed in Japan anymore.

Gerson spoke further on how the United States used the Atom bomb to organize the "Post War Order," and to maintain U.S. power domination.

He cited examples in Cuba, where the threat of the Atom bomb was used during the Cuban missile crisis as President Kennedy ordered the Pentagon to mobilize under Operation Mongoose, a plan to invade Cuba and to overthrow Fidel Castro. Another example Gerson cited was the threat by Eisenhower during the Vietnam, where, according to Gerson, he felt the it was a "cheap way" to win the war. Gerson also cited a third example, that of the Gulf War, where troops were taught tactical procedures in nuclear warfare.

Gerson concluded by stressing the need for human responsibility, and how individuals need to educate themselves, and to discuss these issues. He spoke of the courage of Senji Yamaguchi, who, only days after hospital confinement, still managed to address a U.S. nuclear conference in 1993. Yamaguchi, despite obvious contention, still strived to make the world a better place to live, Gerson said.

Russia warns of reprisals before cease–fire

By Ken Olsen
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russian troops shelled a battered Chechen village and squared off against rebel fighters yesterday, hours before a one-sided cease-fire by Russia was set to begin.

President Boris Yeltsin ordered the unilateral cease-fire to coincide with a visit to Moscow by world leaders, but there were few signs the fighting in the breakaway region would stop. The cease-fire was to take effect at 12:01 a.m. Friday (4:01 p.m. EDT) and last until May 12.

President Clinton urged Yeltsin to turn it into a permanent truce. In a 30-minute telephone conversation on Thursday, Clinton welcomed a halt to the fighting but said it had not eased his deep concern about the war-torn Caucasus.

Even before Yeltsin could sign the cease-fire order, Defense Minister Pavel Grachev warned that Russian troops would retaliate heavily for any attack by Chechen rebels.

"We shall respond to each shot with a mass of shots," he said in comments reported by the ITAR-Tass news agency.

With only hours left before the truce was to begin, Russian news agencies and television reported scattered fighting in several villages and said Russian artillery shelled the village of Bamut. Also Thursday, a government commission said eyewitness accounts convinced it that Russian troops had committed "arson, pillage and murder" in the Chechen town of Samashky earlier this month. The Samashky massacre has been repeatedly denied by Russian military officials.

Residents of Samashky have said Russian Interior Ministry troops killed at least 300 civilians when they stormed the little town on Chechnya's border with Ingushetia April 8.

Russian troops kept the town sealed off for days. When survivors finally emerged, their accounts were horrifying.

People described soldiers, drunk and high on drugs, tossing grenades into basements where people huddled in terror, dragging old men into the street and shooting them, setting bodies and buildings on fire.

The Kremlin had hoped to end the war in the breakaway Chechen republic before the May 9 Victory Day celebrations marking the end of World War II in Europe. Dozens of world leaders are expected in Moscow, including Clinton, who will hold a summit with Yeltsin May 10.

Russian forces have been unable to take full control, however, and there is widespread speculation that Chechen rebels will try to embarrass the Kremlin by provoking fighting.

Yeltsin's decree authorizes Russian forces to shoot back if the Chechens attack during the truce period.

The ITAR-Tass news agency quoted Yeltsin's spokesman, Sergei Medvedev, as saying that the combat moratorium "is based on the assumption that both sides should observe it."

In Chechyna, Russian Maj. Gen. Gennady Troshev was expected to meet Friday with the chief of staff of Chechen forces, Aslan Maskhadov, to discuss the truce, the Interfax news agency reported. Interfax and others reported that Russian troops continued to shell Chechen positions Thursday near Bamut, a rebel stronghold 22 miles southwest of Grozny, the Chechen capital, but that the shelling eased late in the day.

The Russians have been pounding Bamut for months but have failed to dislodge the stubborn guerrilla fighters.

Russian troops entered Chechnya Dec. 11 to put down the republic's three-year independence drive. There have been thousands of civilian casualties in Chechnya, provoking widespread criticism of the Russian military operation.

Abortion fund gives loans to women

By Colleen D. Shanahan
Collegian Staff

During the 1970s, members of the Clergy Consultation Service at the University of Massachusetts were concerned about the number of young, pregnant women coming to them, seeking help with their unwanted pregnancy.

At that time, abortions were still illegal and these women were sent to Sweden or Canada to obtain the surgery.

According to Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students, in 1971 the Medical Emergency Loan Fund was created to help women pay for the abortion. Students would go door-to-door in the dormitories asking for small contributions and the money would be deposited into an account in Vermont.

Abortion was then legal in some states, but not Massachusetts, so the women would go to New York to have the surgery.

Eventually, the money was moved to an account on campus and women could sign out a loan with the promise to repay. Like any other fee on campus, if the loan was not repaid, the woman stood the risk of not graduating. This fund finally ran out in 1990, but a representative from health services said university insurance does cover abortions.

Beginning of new hope

In 1987, a new fund was started —the Abortion Rights Fund (ABR), a grass roots organization with the goal of keeping abortions "safe, legal, and funded."

Through donations and pledges, the ABR provides approximately 200 loans each year to low-income women seeking abortions and subsidizes free pregnancy testing through Family Planning in Hampshire County. The median age of women receiving assistance is 21, but no woman is turned away if she is in need.

Sources at the group said the age of the women helps "get rid of the stereotype that we encourage kids to have abortions."

Loans for abortions are granted in the form of checks to clinics and are zero percent interest loans. The woman sets the payback schedule. One volunteer from the ABR said there is only a 10 percent payback rate. "Some women want to forget [the abortion] ever happened, and being reminded of their payback schedule only prolongs the grief," she said.

The ABR receives around $32,000 in donations and pledges each year. To raise the funds, the organization sponsors fundraisers such as concerts, art auctions, and mail appeals.

The group is strictly confidential and the women receiving the loan never see anyone from the Abortion Rights Fund; all contact is over the phone and through the mail. One source said, "we don't ask why she wants an abortion. She knows she is not ready for the pregnancy and we trust her judgment." Twenty-five percent of the women seeking assistance already have children.

Looking towards future

Controversy surrounding the right to abortion leaves the ABR wondering what the future holds. A representative from the group said "women see [abortion] as their right. They don't realize how tough it is to keep offering services. They do not understand the risk involved in providing abortion services."

Heated debates between pro-choice and pro-life groups, protesting in front of the few abortion clinics left, and the actual violence aimed at abortion surgeons are some of the examples of the precarious status of legal abortions.

One volunteer said, "Women need to become more politically involved in abortion rights. There is a good chance we stand to lose our right to abortion."

The volunteers at the Abortion Rights Fund have real hope for the abortion pill RU 486 and the morning after pill. Each pill induces abortion without surgery if taken early enough into the pregnancy.

They also said there will be a real need for nurse practitioners and midwives to begin performing abortions because so many providers are discontinuing their practice due to harassment by anti-choice groups.

However, the Abortion Rights Fund has not received any harassment from anti-choice activists. One woman affiliated with the organization said, "Once in a while we receive a rude piece of mail, but on the whole response has been favorable."

Women who need loans may contact the ABR directly at (800) 450-6000. The organization does staff volunteers who speak Russian, Spanish, Chinese and Vietnamese. "We don't want women unaware of the fund because they don't speak English," said one representative.

Prof discusses teaching methods

■ Works to helps students learn by having them form groups frequent breaks to check notes

By Yinan Estrada
Collegian Correspondent

"Cooperative learning" as a tool for implementing diversity in the economics curriculum has proven to be a success, and this has become visible in the rise of student involvement in the classroom.

Dr. Robin Bartlett, professor of economics at Denison University, introduced innovative ideas on how to increase "connections" among professors and students in the classroom in a lecture entitled "The Diverse Classroom: Connections, Connections, Connections," given last Monday, brought by the UMass Economics Department and Five Colleges Inc.

From the very first day of classes Bartlett makes an effort to connect with students, saying that this is the most important factor influencing how students learn. She begins her courses by making students introduce themselves to each other. "Students learn best from other students," said Bartlett, thus the learning process is maximized by making students feel at ease with each other and with the professor from the beginning.

As an example of one of the various "ice breakers" Bartlett utilizes, in her lecture she made the audience volunteer participants of her teaching and learning technique by dividing it into pairs and asking individuals to introduce themselves, having to come up with curious or notable facts about their respective partner.

In her courses she utilizes examples of these initial introductions throughout the semester, in order to effectively and continuously reinforce the "connections."

Another way Bartlett gets to know students in a classroom is by making them identify their primary and secondary identities in a work sheet. Bartlett said that according to these, "I will ask people to stand up, and I'll get a lot of information on who my students are."

Bartlett has put together a model for the balancing of the economics curriculum, which she has based on content, method and pedagogy. "Because individuals might be connected to many different cultures and identities, for diversity reasons you might want to try different techniques and models," said Bartlett.

Bartlett understands that in a continuum of learning, students may find themselves in different levels ranging from "concrete" to "abstract."

"Students are in experimental concrete learning modes," said Bartlett, and this should be taken in consideration when implementing different teaching techniques.

Through her exercises, Bartlett finds subjects of interest for students. While students relate to the examples given, they become more involved in the learning process. Bartlett encourages professors to rely on students to direct them to material of their interest.

To facilitate students with tangible examples in the current economic situation, Bartlett also utilizes data charts reflecting the differential impact for gender and race variables, when money supplies decrease.

"Lectures are not going to do it for most students," Bartlett said. "Most students tune off ten minutes into the lecture." Bartlett speculates this is due to the strong effect that watching television has had in this generation; she said "they are cued to tune off every so often." To make the teaching/learning process more productive, Bartlett pauses her lecture approximately every ten minutes and has students compare notes to make sure they are keeping up with the lecture. This is at the heart of her cooperative learning technique, she said.

Most of her class structure is organized in teams, which students voluntarily form themselves. Bartlett also believes that professors have to "give students motivation to come to class," so instead of having them read regularly from a text book, she will hand out important material in class meetings.

Bartlett utilizes English as a tool for teaching economics, rather than mathematics. Since economics uses mathematics to explain everything, this alternate technique prevents the anxiety associated with this subject to come into play.

Bartlett said that "there are many ways for balancing curriculum by integrating diversity;" moreover, more professors insist in teaching the way they were taught because of "the less connections we will have with students and therefore, the less connection students will have with the material."

Masspirg looks at food waste, food services explores entrees

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

If someone cleaned your tray for you or handed you a questionnaire while you were eating dinner this week, do not be alarmed, because they were only taking a survey.

This week surveys will be held at the various dining halls across campus.

Last night, MASSPIRG conducted a survey in the Franklin Dinning Hall during dinner to determine how much food students waste.

MASSPIRG Hunger and Homeless group volunteers worked at tray windows where they separated trash from food, said Melissa Finocchio, senior operations management major and MASSPIRG member.

The food collected at the end of the evening was weighed to determine how much was wasted.

Finocchio said the results will be made public at all the dinning halls by University of Massachusetts Food Services which will place the information on the tables.

"The results might be an interest to students to see how much food is wasted because food is a precious resource," said Jean Russell, marketing manager for University Food Services.

Russell said the results will be of great interest to food services as well because it could reveal whether there is a big problem.

Finocchio said that MASSPIRG may offer advice to food services such as cutting portions if there is excessive waste.

"We might be surprised to find there is not a lot of waste," said Russell.

Russell said if there is a problem, food services will be forced to re-evaluate their operations. She said food services will not cut portions without student input first.

Russell also said the MASSPIRG survey may not be very revealing because it will only occur one night and only at one dinning hall.

University Food Services also conducted a survey on Wednesday night at all the Dinning Halls across the University.

"We are trying to determine more specific points" than the MASSPIRG survey, Russell said.

The food services survey was a questionnaire focusing on student opinions of current entrees, new ideas for entrees and ways to better serve the students.

In addition to having a set of predetermined answers such as yes and no questions, the survey will also include a section for suggestions.

"The overall design is to help us move into the future with good student feedback," Russell said.

U.S. files antitrust suit over Microsoft merger

By Rob Wells
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Microsoft Corp.'s $2 billion purchase of Intuit Inc., the biggest software merger ever, was dealt a potentially fatal blow Thursday. The government sued to block the deal as a threat to competition.

The Justice Department's antitrust division charged that Microsoft's buying of Intuit, Inc. — maker of the highly popular Quicken personal finance program — was likely to "lead to higher prices and lessened innovation" in the growing market for such programs. The suit was filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

The merger "threatens to harm consumers in other important areas of commerce," such as home banking services for personal computers, the department said.

At the very least, the lawsuit delays the merger, a stock swap valued at $1.5 billion when the deal was announced Oct. 13, 1994. Microsoft's stock price has since increased, boosting the price tag to more than $2 billion, the Justice Department said.

Microsoft said it's prepared to strongly defend the merger in court.

"Our enthusiasm for bringing Microsoft and Intuit together is very, very strong," Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates told reporters in a conference call after the suit was filed. "This merger is very clearly in the interest of consumers."

Microsoft and Intuit agreed not to close the deal until resolution of the Justice Department's lawsuit, said Steven C. Sunshine, a deputy assistant attorney general who handled the case. William Neukom, Microsoft's chief counsel, described the agreement differently, saying the companies would not close the merger without "two court days' notice to the Justice Department." He declined to elaborate.

Both sides are seeking an expedited trial, but no date was set. Neukom declined to discuss whether there have been any settlement talks with the government, but said the company cooperated fully with the investigation. He added that the company will vigorously contest the suit.

Sarah, 12. "This is the first time I've participated. I think it gives them a chance to see all the things they might be able to do one day. It's a first rate operation, but I wish that they could take more than one tour," said Carroll.

Other parents had similar sentiments. Ted Higgins, the regional director of the Air Force ROTC here at UMass said, "I think that it's really good that the young ones get to see what's available for them as they grow up. She already has an idea, but it lets her see the other areas available and do and see other things."

His daughter, Hillary Higgins, age nine, added, "I want to be a nurse. I got a bunch of stuff about exercise and the food pyramid. My dad's in Air Force ROTC, and I'm gonna help him at his work, and I want to go on the nursing tour. I liked the x-rays."

Older girls also enjoyed the day. Kaya Hazard, age 12 of Amherst, said, "It's going to be fun because we don't have to go to school. There are a lot of things I've never done before that I want to do that are on this list. I want to learn about the learning resource center and the astronomy and physics department — to learn about it and what kind of stuff they do."

Carol Wallace, director of Everywoman's Center and co-chairperson of the Faculty Senate Status of Women Council, said, "I love it. It's so important for girls to be exposed to women in the world and the focus is on the girls and their dreams and aspirations."

"The girls bring an energy that is so different; the girls that were on the committee had some of the best ideas on the committee including inviting the sports teams," said Wallace.

Overall, the girls who participated were exposed to the wide variety of opportunities available to them in the workforce and at UMass. Five-year-old Rosa Lederer-Sabel said she liked it because, "... I get to work with my mom, and I get to eat breakfast out, and I get to get up early to be here."

ces, Mitchell said.

The students came up with a mixture of concrete that is incredibly strong and lightweight. The result is a canoe that's only 185 pounds compared to the 385 pounds it weighed last year, Mitchell said.

The event began with the University drum corps leading a group of approximately 40 people, including five students carrying the "Greased Lightenang," to the center of the East side of the Campus Pond.

Once the procession ended and everyone had gathered around the boat which was placed on the shore, McCormick made a short address to the crowd.

Following this address, the time came for the canoe to make its inaugural run. With the drum corps producing a drum roll to heighten the drama of the event, the boat was lowered into the water.

Once the students lowering it into the pond got it out far enough and had stepped away from it, a member of the team shouted out "It floats!" prompting the onlooking crowd to cheer wildly.

The canoe was paddled on its first trip by McCormick and Dean Joseph Goldstein, head of the Engineering department.

"This is a way to show what civil engineers do," said McCormick. "We're not just stuck in the Northeast corner."

"We don't want to compete with the University because we would lose, but we are competitively priced," Diana said.

Dining Halls

Another option for off campus students besides old fashion home cooking are the dinning halls.

The dinning halls offer students three all you can eat meals a day. Dinning halls also offer students full vegetarian options as well as a Kosher option, said Joyce Frederick, administrative dietician for University Food Services.

Frederick said food services uses low-fat ingredients such as low-fat mayonnaise and two percent milk whenever possible.

The dining hall offers all fresh food including fresh baked items at every dinner. Food services also tries to put on a weekly special such as last week's steak night and this week's top your own grinder lunch.

Frederick said each semester food services has an international night which exposes students to the cuisine of various cultures.

"We try to give students a good deal," said Frederick.

A 10 meal plan costs $794, and a 14 meal plan costs a little more. However, students do not have to pay for a meal plan in order to eat at the dinning hall said Frederick. Students can buy strip tickets of five tickets for $25 for lunch or $29.75 for dinner.

"OCMP will not adversely effect us because most students live on campus," Frederick said.

Women's lax closes vs. instate rivals

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will be wrapping up its season against its in-state rivals, the Boston College Eagles tomorrow at home, and on the road Sunday against the Crimson from Harvard University.

The season has been an up and down one for the Minutewomen (3-8); partly with the ten freshmen on the team, and partly with the team's lack of concerted sixty minute efforts. With Wednesday's 9-6 loss against a veteran squad from the University of New Hampshire, and last Saturday's 17-9 win over Vermont, the tide has begun to turn in the team's favor.

Complete team efforts on defense, especially with the loss of sophomore defender Michelle Warrington, and offense has characterized the last week for UMass, and has not been lost on coach Francesca McClellan. She sees good signs in wrapping the season up on a positive note, and it can start at Totman Field against the 3-7 Eagles.

"Talent for talent, we are much stronger, and especially coming off a game like UNH," McClellan said. "We have come a real long way, and UNH was a great game in as far as we did some things together.

"I feel our kids have settled down a bit, and our freshmen are now starting to play almost like sophomores. In that respect, if we bring that to Saturday's game with BC, we will look pretty good."

Boston College has not been flying too well this season, as its 3-7 record indicates. Similarities with UMass in record end there, as their offense production has been stagnant. Excluding Wednesday's game against Yale, the Eagles have only broken the ten goal barrier twice this season in wins over Holy Cross (16-3) and Villanova (15-6). The leading goal scorers run pretty much in congruence with each other, as Bryn Chave (19 points, 14 goals) and Gaffney McGrath (16 points, 14 goals) lead the team.

In comparison, the trio of freshmen Joanna Dignazio (27 goals), Vicky Nedomansky (16 goals) and sophomore Stephanie Walsh (15 goals) have all outscored the remainder of Boston College's squad single-handedly (57-48).

Harvard, on the other hand, has had no major problems with its offense, with senior Sarah Winters leading the Crimson with 36 points (26 goals, 10 assists). But what appears to be the Achilles' heel for the Ivy Leaguers is defense, especially with their goaltender Kate Schutt. The sophomore keeper has the team's 6-4 record in her name, but with a .566 save percentage (.573 career).

A save percentage over .600 appears to be the marker for Division I success individually, and that is what UMass freshman keeper Kate Brew has accomplished this season. With a No. 10 ranking nationally and an 18-save performance against UNH this week, her .622 this year is impressive. For McClellan, the continued hard work on defense will be needed for a couple of wins to round out the season.

"Harvard is like New Hampshire, at this time they are beatable," McClellan said. "We are going to see pressure like we did against UNH, so if we can grow from that game, we may be able to take them.

"The key against Harvard will be decision making. We have been up in I don't know how many games, and we have thrown away the lead because of our panicking under pressure."

With the Minutewomen's 3-8 record, you could easily switch that to 8-3, as UMass has only lost five of its games by a combination of nine goals. The in-season teaching McClellan has had to do this season with her ten freshmen is beginning to pay dividends.

"I finally feel like we are getting someplace," McClellan said. "We have worked since Feb. 1 on skills, technique and strategy, and that is finally starting to sink in. It is everybody taking responsibility on the field.

"We can not hide from pressure offensively, when we start to run with the ball, it does not work for us. So, making poised decisions under pressure is what I want to see."

Water polo set for Easterns

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

One down, two to go.

The University of Massachusetts women's water polo coach Bob Newcomb set three goals for his team before it started its first season ever competing at the varsity level.

The first goal, to qualify for the Eastern Championships this weekend at Brown University, has been achieved, thanks to last weekend's third place finish in the EWPA North Division playoffs.

The second goal is to win at least one game in the tournament, a feat which his squad failed to do last year in its inaugural appearance. And the third is to keep his team's No. 6 seed, which will likely happen after a good performance this weekend. Although Newcomb would be the first to admit it will not be easy, he certainly thinks the team is capable of being successful.

"The whole team has got to take a big step up," Newcomb said. "We're going to have to raise the intensity level quite a bit, and play solid defensively against these teams."

And "these teams" will prove quite a challenge, to say the least. It will be playing three nationally ranked teams in the span of 18 hours. Maryland, ranked No. 11, will be on the agenda for Friday night, followed by No. 12 Brown on Saturday morning and No. 16 Princeton Saturday at 12:40.

Freshman Laura Zamborsky likes her team's attitude going into the Championships.

"We have a positive attitude going in," Zamborsky said. "We've really come together as a team over the course of the season. Players with more playing time are working with our substitutes, and it's showed in our improvement. We've proven to everyone and ourselves we're a better team than when the season started."

Having lost to Brown 13-5 last week, Newcomb plans to change the game plan a bit, after Alisa Von Hartiszch scorched UMass for eight goals in the defeat.

"We're going to have to keep the ball out of her hands," Newcomb said. "She's one of the best players I've ever seen.

"The key to stopping Maryland is to shut down their counter-attack, as they are very fast. I'll get my first look at Princeton in a game they have before they play us. We've got a lot of strong teams ahead of us, but we belong in this tournament, and we have a lot to prove."

set to etch her name in the record books. When was the last time a freshman had such an impact?

The player was Brian Regan, the keeper for the Minuteman hockey team, who beat No. 1 Maine in an historic upset for the Massachusetts program and this University. If this is the case, can someone tell me why Gutridge hasn't grabbed similar headlines for her hitting streak?

• Pearl Jam likes Mookie Blaylock. Heck, so do I. The NBA playoffs are good for at least one upset, and the Pacers are ready for one.

Reggie Miller and company could be looking past Atlanta, hoping for a rematch with the Brickerbockers. In steps Plastic Man, Mookie and the Hawks, and bye-bye Larry Brown.

It could happen, so you better watch. Oh, sorry – wrong slogan.

• Fan Fest is coming next weekend.

• Chris Herren is leaving Boston College for the promised land of a real basketball program. Hey, Herren is correcting the mistake he made a year ago by committing to that pitiful program in the first place.

Guess who's waiting in the wings – good ole Billy Bayno, hoping to develop a dynasty at Las Vegas before Massachusetts signs another recruit.

Bayno already reportedly has his sights set on Mark Blount. Add Herren to the mix, and the Rebels win their conference title in two years.

• The end of an era finally came last Sunday night, and no one seemed to notice. Lou Roe bid a fond farewell to the University in the tribute to UMass men's basketball in the Mullins Center, and because of poor publicity, hardly anyone knew it was taking place.

Roe and I came to this school together four years ago. Well, not in the same car, but we did arrive at around the same time. Now, when May hits, he'll be in the NBA and I'll be home with my B.A.

Massachusetts coach John Calipari got all choked up while introducing Roe, and for the first time in a long time, I believed Cal.

He may have said it best — "I'm not going to be the same [without you]."

Yeah, I'll shed a tear for Roe's accomplishments. It's been the best four years of my life, and if I had to do it all over again, Lou, I'd choose UConn.

Does a win put UMass in the tournament?

"I would say so," Cannella said.

Things will probably have to be a little different tomorrow than they were in UMass' last game, a 6-2 win over Yale. That score indicates a brilliant defensive effort, which UMass has given in all but one of its games, but six goals probably won't be enough to derail Syracuse. The Minutemen dispatched the Bulldogs on the strength of six different goalscorers, but their top two scorers, Brendan Glass (30) and Jeremy Murphy (16), had none. It will be a difficult task getting untracked versus Syracuse, which starts three All-Americans on defense: Ric Beardsley, Hans Schmid and Chad Smith.

"This is the time of year that the cream rises. Top players will always step it up to the level that they need to play at," Cannella said.

Rob Kavovit (19 goals), Paul Sullivan (15) and Mark Fietta (15) lend depth to the best attack UMass has faced.

"We're definitely utilizing the greater talent we have to the fullest," defenseman Jared Lanning said. "I think we should be able to take it to Syracuse."

Goaltending promises to be a factor tomorrow. Freshman John Kasselakis was the best player for UMass in the Yale win, but UMass would love to have LoPresti back, though he probably can't give it a shot in the final home game of his career. LoPresti's fine season was interrupted against Notre Dame, when he suffered a deep, right thigh contusion.

Alex Rosler has started all 11 games in net for SU.

said. "In the last two years, he's suffered some setbacks with his knee, but he's stayed healthy this year for the most part. He's done a great job finishing, and being a vital part of our attack."

"My career has had its ups and downs," Murphy said. "Through the injuries, all the struggles and all the rehab it's been worth it. I've learned a lot about people, especially these six guys I'll be graduating with. I love these guys."

Vinny Dello-Iacono

"Vinny has been solid this year. He's covered everyone's best attackman," Cannella said. "He's been a real good leader and worked hard everyday in practice. He's really stepped up his game this year."

"It was a great opportunity to step it up to the next level and play division one lacrosse," Dello-Iacono said.

Jared Lanning

"Lanning has done a great job as a captain. He leads the defense. He comes to practice everyday and works his tail off," Cannella said.

Tom LoPresti

"Tommy had the first year that he's been really consistent all year. He's really stepped up his leadership role. He's really been intense and a positive influence on the team."

"Personally I've played my best lacrosse this year," LoPresti said. "I hope that the program can continue to prosper and contend for the national title every year."

Tom Healy

"He's a four year member of our squad. He hasn't gotten the playing time maybe he deserves," Cannella said. "He's a real attitude and is a good person to have on that team."

"It's been a great experience on and off the field," Healy said. "I learned a lot about myself."

The six seniors will be honored in a ceremony, before Saturday's games.

an imposing figure on defense," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "She has already developed her offensive skills tremendously and with her continued hard work, I think she can be an important part of our program."

The Minutewomen will return all five starters from the most successful team in UMass history. UMass won a school record 19 games and was selected to participate in the National Women's Invitational Tournament. At the NWIT, the Minutewomen went 1-2, advancing to the semi-finals of the tourney and in the process becoming the only Atlantic 10 team to ever accomplish that feat.

Next season, the Minutewomen will have a tougher schedule. After opening up the season at the Pre-season NIT tournament, where they will face 1995 NCAA participant Maine. The Minutewomen will host Stanford in the William D. Mullins Center and will also face 1995 NCAA participant Louisiana Tech next year.

inning, and the Minutewomen added four in the fourth for the final score.

The second game resulted much like the first — except with more destruction. The Minutewomen scored six runs in the first inning, with three coming off Gutridge's three run round tripper. They then got a run in the second, four in the third and two in the fourth to put the nail in the coffin.

"I was very glad to see them maintain their intensity through both games, I think it could've been a bad sign to drop off in game two. They just came back and pounded them some more," Sortino said.

Army coach Jim Flowers praised the Minutewomen, and was a class act despite being on the losing side of the two blowouts.

"It's always a pleasure to come to UMass and play the Minutewomen," Flowers said. "They're a class act, they're what softball is all about. Every chance we get, we want to play them.

"We know the games are probably not going to be too close but if we can catch them when they can't keep their minds in the game, make a few errors ... We're not going to give up, we always come to play, and it's just a pleasure to come here."

Next up for the Minutewomen is the Princeton Tournament in New Jersey this weekend. The first of two games in the tourney on Saturday is against Hofstra (10 a.m.), which Massachusetts swept at Totman on April 22. The 4 p.m. game pits the Minutewomen against Connecticut. The two teams split in their two doubleheaders earlier this season.

On Sunday, Massachusetts takes on No. 22 Princeton.

Minutewoman notes: Osier's three stolen bases tied Cherie DellAnno's school record for thefts in a season with 17 ... Martens' five hits in six at-bats increased her average by 22 points, and moved up and over the .400 mark (.402).

Men's lax tries for rare win over No. 2 Syracuse

Minutemen, Orangemen to battle tomorrow at Garber Field

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

It can't quite be described as a rivalry, because the schools lie some 500 miles apart and Syracuse leads the all-time men's lacrosse series with the University of Massachusetts, 16-4.

If the 21st installment, tomorrow on Richard F. Garber Field at 1 p.m., concludes in the host's favor, the previous 20 outcomes, though, will easily be forgotten.

The Orangemen, ranked No. 2 nationally with a 9-2 record, seven straight wins and a lock on their 13th consecutive NCAA bid (the previous twelve all culminated in Final Four appearances and national titles in 1983, 1988- 1990 and 1993), hold similar advantages over most of their opponents. Few teams dominate their respective sports the way Syracuse does in men's lacrosse.

"This is one of the biggest games we'll have all year, and certainly the biggest game we've had on campus," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Traditionally it's been a great game every time they've come to Amherst."

The teams met twice last season, first in the Fleet Invitational at Brown where the Orangemen prevailed 16-9. UMass made a subsequent trip to the Carrier Dome, where Syracuse has drawn an average of 5,751 fans this year, and hung tough with the host, before falling 11-7.

Dick Garber's Minutemen scored the last defeat of their orange clad brethren in 1981, a win that capped one of the greatest seasons in UMass history, a 13-2 campaign.

"We did dedicate this season to coach Garber. If we beat Syracuse on our home field, I know he'd be proud and smile down on us," Cannella said.

Syracuse actually lost consecutive games this season (both at home), which UMass has not done. Virginia dropped then-No. 1 SU handily, 15-7, then the Orangemen were stung by current, undefeated No. 1 Johns Hopkins, 14-13.

Since that setback on March 18, the Orangemen have turned red hot, scorching five ranked teams and two others in the school's emblematic fashion.

"I hate 'em," UMass goaltender Tom LoPresti said. "We have the talent they have, and we're more disciplined."

Syracuse can beat you anywhere and everywhere on the field. Its top three attackers, Casey Powell, Jim Morrisey and Roy Colsey, have combined for 86 goals and 19 hat tricks. Its extra man efficiency is superb: 28 of 61, 45.9- percent. It has topped 20 goals in five games and held opponents below 10 in four games. Syracuse has legendary programs in the top two collegiate revenue sports, football and basketball, but lacrosse is its most powerful outfit.

"They have a lot of confidence in what they do, and what they represent at Syracuse. They're a very confident team. They have a tremendous group of athletes on that team," Cannella said.

No. 11 UMass stands at 6-3, and the feeling is it must earn a split between tomorrow's game and Wednesday's New England Championship bout with No. 9 Brown in Providence.

"If I have to motivate people for this game, then I'm doing the wrong thing and they shouldn't be playing lacrosse," Cannella said. "This is the kind of game you look forward to, playing Syracuse at home. This time of year you have a chance to make the tournament if you beat them. Hopefully everybody will be up for it and I think they will."

Seniors look back as final home game nears

By Matt Vautour

The fact that it is Syracuse makes everything else take a back seat.

For the University of Massachusetts, the bi-yearly home battle with the Orangemen is a much-anticipated event, so is the fact that six seniors will play their final games at Richard F. Garber.

"This is the last time these guys are going to play on their home field, unless we get a home bid in the tournament," said Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella. "That should add some extra juice to it. This is their last shot at beating an excellent program that we haven't beaten in 14 years."

Cannella and the seniors all reflected on their careers, before their final home games.

Mike Valente

"He's a great feeder. He's won our hammer award for the best hit of the game, the last three games. He's proven in lacrosse that you don't have to be 6-foot-4, 210 pounds," Cannella said. "You can excel at this game at his size, with his intensity and with his quickness."

"I've had a lot of good times on and off the lacrosse field," said Valente. "The best way I could think of ending my career, would be to beat Syracuse on Garber Field. If we do, I'll be thinking about Dick Garber and how happy he'd be if he was here."

Jeremy Murphy

"He's provided some leadership for us," Cannella

Around the Horn with Arthur Stapleton Jr.

Juice the Orange.

Two years ago, I remember sitting on the Hill at Garber Field, basking in the sun and getting a lesson about what Massachusetts men's lacrosse is all about.

Syracuse, the only lacrosse team in the nation that could get their athletic department put on probation for the sport, was in town and the students were ready, armed with oranges from the dining commons. Every time the Minutemen scored, an orange found its way onto the playing field. It was ingenious and a way for the University's student body to show the Minutemen their support.

Fast forward to this season and what has been missing for Massachusetts. Where are you, students? Greg Cannella is as fiery a coach as there is in sports, attacker Brendan Glass is one of the most potent scorers in the nation, and goalie Tom LoPresti continues the long-line of Minuteman warriors.

Can you tell me this, then? Why doesn't anyone care? That's right, you don't know either. This 'Cuse game on Saturday (1 p.m.) could be a landmark win for the program.

Do the Minutemen have a shot to beat the Orangemen? Maybe, maybe not — but if you show up and cheer 'em on, they might just do it.

Oh, don't forget to stop at the D.C. for your Vitamin C pellets.

Get well, Freddy, 'cause I can't bear not laughing at Bruin broadcasts anymore.

Massachusetts shows no mercy for Cadets

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

If there was anything on Army's side yesterday afternoon against the University of Massachusetts softball team, it was clear as the Lady Knights' last batter in the second game swung on and missed to end the top of the fifth inning.

Mercy.

The compassion rule that ends a contest if a team is leading by eight runs after five innings was imposed in both games of the twinbill at Totman Field, as the Minutewomen (31-14) clobbered Army (7-27), 10-0 and 13-0.

What does a coach say to her team after scoring 23 runs in a doubleheader while her pitching staff fails to give up one?

"Nice game, kids," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said.

Those Massachusetts kids smacked 28 hits in the two games, while Army could only muster five. As for standout individual performances, there was an abundance of them on the Minutewoman side.

• Kim Gutridge went a torrid 6-for-6 at the plate in the two games, and knocked in seven runs. She hit a three run homerun in the Minutewomen's six run first inning of the second game.

With the unblemished day at the plate, Gutridge extended her hitting streak to 23. It moved her into the lone spot of second place in the school's record book, behind Barb Marean 27-game hitting streak in 1992.

• Chris Martens was 2-for-2 in the first game, including a first-inning dinger, and went 3-for-4 in the second.

• Tracey Osier went 4-for-5 in two contests, including a perfect 3-3 in the second game. The freshman stole three bases to tie the Massachusetts softball record for thefts in a season.

• Kelly Buckley had a pair of 2-for-3 games.

Army	0

And the pitching? Kelly Daut won her 20th game, throwing a three-hitter while recording a walk and four strikeouts. The senior co-captain became Massachusetts' first 20-game winner since Darlene Claffey won 21 games in 1991.

Dani Ortega spun a two-hitter and struck out four Army batters in the nightcap, as her record increased to 11-8.

In game one, Martens put the first run in the scorebook for Massachusetts with her solo homer over the centerfield fence. The second inning saw three Minutewoman runs, as Sam Cardenas hit a double that drove in Gutridge and Heather Dorsey.

Buckley and Gutridge hit RBI singles in the third

Minutemen to take on West Virginia

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will take its show on the road this weekend as it travels south to West Virginia for a key Atlantic 10 series with the Mountaineers.

The Minutemen (25-9 overall, 15-3 A-10) currently stand atop the league standings with a three-game cushion over second place George Washington.

UMass and West Virginia (16-28, 9-9) will play a doubleheader on Saturday, and finish off the three game series on Sunday. The Mountaineers' A-10 mark of nine wins against nine defeats is good enough for sixth place in the league.

The Minutemen won seven of eight in their longest home stand of the year, then travelled to Siena where they blasted the Saints 12-2 on Wednesday. Junior shortstop Mark Pileski smacked his second home run of the year to give the Minutemen a lead they would never relinquish, and freshman righthander Jeff Puleri went seven innings to pick up the win. Puleri, who fanned five batters, evened his record at 1-1.

This weekend's series will mark the first time this year that the two league rivals will match up. On the road, UMass is 10-6 this season, while West Virginia owns an 11- 7 mark in Morgantown.

The Mountaineers are led by second baseman Chris Swaney. The junior is tops on the team with a .368 batting average and eight steals. He is also tied for the team lead with 10 doubles, and has one home run and 21 RBI to his credit.

The big slugger for West Virginia is shortstop Tony Myers. Also a junior, Myers has cranked nine home runs on the year, and also leads the Mountaineers with 39 ribbies and 27 runs scored. He also owns a .604 slugging percentage, while hitting at a .357 clip.

Catcher Jason Frushour has also done a solid job for West Virginia. Frushour is hitting .296, and has smacked four home runs and driven in 27 runs on the year in an offense ranked fourth in the conference.

Meanwhile, the Minutemen own both the league's top offense and pitching staff. The team has a .320 batting average, more than 30 points higher than GW's .286 team average that stands in second. UMass has also hit 32 home runs as a team, led by senior Bill Knight's league leading 12 dingers.

On the pitching end, the Minutemen have compiled a team ERA of 3.55, more than half a run better than second place GW's staff. UMass' starting staff has been one of it's big strengths this season. Sophomore righthander Chad Paronto (4-2, 2.96), senior righty Jay Murphy (5-2, 3.08), freshman righthander Scott Barnsby (3-2, 3.00) and lefty Jeff Michaels (4-0, 3.13) are the league's top four qualifiers in earned run average.

On the offensive end, Knight was named A-10 Player of the Week last week when he broke the UMass career records in home runs (36), RBI (146), and total bases (315). The senior leads the squad with 48 ribbies, 10 doubles and a .765 slugging percentage to go along with his 12 homers. He is also batting a solid .361, fifth in the league.

Junior Nelson Ubaldo, who has primarily been the team's designated hitter this season, leads the club with a .398 batting average, good enough for second in the A-10 to GW's Lance Migita. Leftfielder Ryan Jette, batting .393, is third in the A-10, and leads UMass in steals with 19.

The rest of the Minuteman lineup has also been quite productive. Second baseman Muchie Dagliere (.330, 2 HR, 20 RBI), catcher Andy Pelis (.320, 5, 21), and Pileski (.301, 2, 15) are all hitting over .300 as well.

UMass returns home Tuesday, May 2 to host Vermont at Earl Lorden Field.

Women's hoop signs new recruit

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts added a new recruit to bolster its already deep frontcourt by signing Yolanda Rayside out of Manhattan on Wednesday.

Rayside, a 6-foot-3 center, will join Melissa Gurile, Octavia Thomas, Crystal Carroll, Tez Kraft and Kara Tudman in the frontcourt next season.

"Yolanda's a big, solid post player who probably has her better playing days ahead of her," Massachusetts assistant coach Jill Rooney said. "She'll make a big presence defensively. She has the ability to block shots and she has good court sense. She's going to have the opportunity to play. She's going to be one of those players who if you don't pay attention to her, she's going to hurt you. People are going to have to box her out."

Rayside played her high school ball at the New York High School of Fashion, where she averaged 19.4 points, 15.0 rebounds, 5.4 assists and 6.0 blocks in her senior season. For her outstanding senior season, she was named to the All- Manhatten team and was a second team All-New York City selection. She was also picked to play in the prestigious New York Exceptional Seniors Game, where she was her team's leading rebounder.

She finished as her high school's all-time leading scorer (1,108) and rebounder (1,007).

"Yolanda gives us great size in the middle and

Two men shot near Southwest residence hall

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

Two individuals were shot early yesterday morning in Southwest Residential Area by an unknown assailant.

At approximately 4:11 a.m., University of Massachusetts police responded to a report of gun shots in the area of Washington Residence Hall, police said.

Officers found two men with gun shot wounds, one with injuries to the arm and leg, and the other with a wound to the stomach, police said.

Police are withholding the names of the victims, who are reported to be non-students, until a later date.

Both individuals were treated by the Amherst Fire Department and taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where they were treated and released, according to police.

Police reported that an argument between unknown individuals outside of Washington escalated, and one of the men pulled out a handgun and fired several rounds at a person involved in the argument.

The victims said they were not involved in the argument but were sitting on a retaining wall close to the confrontation when they were shot, according to police.

Edward Merguerian, a sophomore who lives in John Quincy Adams residence hall, located close to where the incident happened, said he saw some of the scene from his tenth floor window.

"I heard about five shots and I looked out the window and right next to the [Berkshire Dining Commons] there was a crowd of people," Merguerian said. "A couple seconds later a blue Blazer flew by through Southwest."

The assailant, described as a Black male approximately six feet tall with a slim build, has not been recovered, and the investigation is still on going, police said.

A witness who wished to remain anonymous said there was another person with the assailant.

In an incident earlier that morning, police responded to a report of a disturbance outside of Hasbrouck Laboratory where an individual said he was assaulted by two males who ripped a gold chain from his neck.

In the ensuing fight, one of the attackers dropped a small handgun and the second assailant picked it up, striking the victim on the head, police said.

According to police, the attackers fled and the victim declined medical attention.

Anyone who has information or may have observed either incidents are asked to call the UMass detectives at 545-0891. Police said that all information will be kept confidential.

Space allocations are appealed by 19 groups

By Henry J. Brier

The Campus Center/Student Union (CC/SU) Commission has finalized plans for University of Massachusetts organizations that appealed for office space at their weekly meeting last Thursday night, according to Esther Salas, Commission vending officer.

Nineteen Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), Graduate Student Organizations (GSOs), and agencies were scheduled to present their appeals to the Commission on Thursday night. Three organizations neglected to show.

Friday afternoon the Commission met for approximately five hours to discuss each organization's appeal, Salas said. Appeals circled around constrained room and security of property.

Results will be publicized today by Matthew G. Auger, commission chair, Salas said. The CC/SU Commission policy allows for all decisions to be appealed.

Before the first organization entered the meeting on Thursday night, Auger prepared the commission members for what he said he believed would be "pretty emotional" appeals. He also spoke of different organizations intimidating him, as chair of the Commission.

Previous to each presentation, Auger told of conditions surrounding the appeals process. Each organization was allotted ten minutes to speak, followed by a five minute period when commission members questioned the organizations about considering case scenarios.

AHORA, the campus' Spanish speaking organization initially placed in Student Union 409 with three other Latino organizations, was represented by student counselor Jalil F. Mendoza Pérez. He said he believed the Commission was "ghettoizing" the Latino organizations.

Jennifer Mueller, treasurer of MASSPIRG, said her organization did not mind being moved, as long as the new space allotted is not "shrunk-in on." She also said MASSPIRG was "nervous [because we] don't want to be moved again."

The Alliance for Student Power (ASP), described by member Lori Schoeman as a "leftist umbrella group," was allotted space to share with the Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC). But RSU member Ken A. Miller said that both were big groups, and "shrinkage will hurt a lot."

The Silent Majority, according to Philip N. Milson, editor- in-chief of the Minuteman, is the representative group for Students for Life, the UMass Republican Club, Young Americans for Freedom and the Conservative Alliance. When asked by the Commission if the UMass mission of diversity and multiculturalism is encouraged, Milson said that although the majority of the members are white, females partake and "membership is kept open."

Lance Brown, CRC office manager, called the commission's plan to place "one of the most successful and popular" organizations with another group "inconceivable."

Nelson Acosta, coordinator of the Office of Third World Affairs (OTWA), said that the office his organization uses has no windows and no ventilation. The OTWA is also used year-round, and air-conditioning would cost $16,000, according to a feasibility study he cited.

The organizations that did not show up and present before the Commission were the UMass Ski Club, the Asian American Student Association, and the Black Student Union, the last of which was not initially given space.

A little buckaroo makes strides in the pie eating contest at the 60th Annual Livestock Classic at Hadley farm. Cows, horses and sheep were judged in categories of appearance and showing ability Friday and Saturday.

Students take part in Livestock Classic

By Scott Martin
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students displayed their skills with animals this weekend while local residents watched and tried their luck in sack races, egg tosses and pie-eating contests.

Community members gathered at the Hadley Farm to participate in the 60th annual Livestock Classic last Friday and Saturday. There were 65 UMass students who participated and approximately 150 spectators, according to Jason Apple, a professor of veterinary and animal sciences.

The Livestock Classic is a competition consisting of showmanship of animals such as dairy cows, horses, sheep and swine. Animals were judged by their appearance and showing ability, Apple said.

The competition itself is open to all students, said Christine LaVallee, a senior animal science major.

"Any student can come down and choose an animal," LaVallee said.

Jason Caron, a junior animal science major, won the Premier Showmanship event with his horse Honore on Saturday and was crowned "grand champion."

Fear propelled Caron's entry into the Livestock Classic, he said.

"I became involved because I was afraid of horses," Caron said. "I wanted to work with them."

His work with Honore included brushing it, talking to it and feeding it carrots, he said.

While the competition was fierce, the purpose of this event was to allow students to gain hands-on experience with animals, Apple said.

"The point is to get kids interested, to show them working with livestock is not as bad as it seems," Apple said. "It doesn't matter who wins or loses, but it's important for students to work with animals they've never handled before."

The Livestock Classic, which began in 1935, is organized entirely by students, Apple said. "The students keep it going. It's an historic event and they work to keep the tradition alive."

The Veterinary and Animal Science Club was one of the groups to sponsor the event, said Stephanie Weagle, a senior animal science major and member of the club.

"The public can come in and take a better look at what the pre-veterinary and animal science department is teaching," Weagle said.

The event was a success with the general public, according to Heather Nelson, a senior animal science

UMass subject of protest against animal testing

By Purva Panday
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Animal rights activists conducted a protest downtown Thursday against the use of animals for laboratory testing at the University of Massachusetts.

Approximately 30 members of New England Animal Action (NEAA), a non-profit organization, and the UMass Animal Rights Coalition marched in front of Fleet Bank. Protesters chanted and held signs, denouncing animal testing, referred to as vivisection.

"UMass does a tremendous amount of animal experiments at all campuses. We want to make sure that they know we're watching them. Amherst will become one of our favorite places," said Joe Taksel, co-founder of the NEAA.

The NEAA, through the Freedom of Information Act, has obtained "partial documentation" of UMass experiments, said Taksel.

UMass, through the psychology, veterinary science, microbiology and biology departments, tested and inhumanely treated nearly 4000 lab animals during 1992 and 1993, Taksel said.

The 4000 animals, Taksel said, include monkeys, hamsters, rabbits, birds, guinea pigs, and "an undisclosed number of mice and rats."

According to Margaret Delano, the UMass-town relation discussed

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The annual Amherst Town Meeting is now in session, and of the 42 articles proposed at the Meeting, three hold potential to affect the University of Massachusetts.

Some issues on the town warrant include a vote of confidence from the town to better University relations, the fate of the Amherst bicycling committee. Also, the local Greenpeace chapter is seeking town support.

Jon Hite of Amherst is petitioning Town Meeting. According to his petition, Hite's objective is to gather support from local and state government in obtaining compensation for the town of Amherst for unfunded services it provides to UMass.

The petition aims "to see if the town will adopt a resolution to the effect that the town strongly supports the Select Board, the Town Manager, and our State Legislators in their efforts to obtain from the University and the Commonwealth fair compensation to the Town for the unfunded services provided by the Town of Amherst to the University."

According to Hite, the petition is an attempt to try to settle differences between the University and Amherst.

"The town, as well as the University, is in severe financial difficulties," he said. "The kind of relationship the town and the University have right now is not the kind of relationship that good neighbors should have."

The petition is not meant to obtain money from the University, only to have the two parties talking about their future plans together, he said.

Hite believes financial problems and a lack of interest in community affairs "on the third floor of Whitmore" have estranged relations between the town and the University.

"This is not an attack on the University," he said. "We're in this together. We're neighbors."

The Amherst Committee on Bicycling may be merged with the town Transportation Committee with both positive and negative results, said Marianne Jakus, bicycling committee member.

"There might be a little bit of conflict, but the process of working out on the conflict will be productive to working for change," Jakus said.

The bicycling committee is responsible for increasing public awareness of biking safety, reviewing all bylaws concerning biking, recommending bike routes, and reviewing plans for town sidewalks and roads, Jakus said.

The resolution Greenpeace is sponsoring is essentially a show of support — a petition which towns like Amherst sign onto, instead of individual people, said Bryan Harvey, chairman of the select board.

"There is no force of law in this," Harvey said. "This is just a petition to the state and federal government."

The resolution calls for Amherst to oppose the placement of any nuclear waste in or around Amherst. It would ask that the state require town approval before any waste is brought in.

Amherst Town Meeting will convene every Monday and Wednesday at 7 p.m. at the Amherst Junior High School until all 42 warrants are voted on.

director of UMass animal care, the number that the group sited is too high. It is closer to 2000.

"The University of Massachusetts believes that the use of animals is necessary in studies that advance the health care of people, and other animals. We also recognize our responsibility towards these animals," said Karin Sherbin, Director of the UMass News Office.

UMass has "strict requirements" for the treatment and housing of animals, according to Sherbin, as well as a committee who understands research and animal care issues.

The event marks World Laboratory Animal Liberation Week, coordinated nationally by In Defense of Animals, a California–based animal rights organization.

"I'd like to get the information out that a lot of animal testing is done and is unneeded," said Stephen Zwink, a sophomore member of the UMass Animal Rights Coalition. "The University keeps it secret. I think they do it on purpose."

NEAA claims that alternatives to vivisection are effective. They sight epidemiologic studies, in vitro research, clinical research and computer modeling as positive alternatives, Taksel said.

NEAA sites advances such as "the isolation of the AIDS virus" and "the development of hormonal treatment for cancer in the prostate and breast" as proof that medical research can advance without vivisection.

"The use of animals in studies is an issue that demands great thought and sensitivity," Taksel said, "and we strive to meet the needs of the animals while meeting the needs of society as a whole."

Students to march over GOP contract

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

The Alliance for Student Power (ASP) is organizing buses for a demonstration in protest of the "Contract With America" in New York City on May 6.

People will be marching on Wall Street to protest many of the financial objectives involved in the Republicans' contract, according to ASP member Phillip Copeland.

The march is part of the "National Day of Protest." Marches will also be held in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, Rhode Island and other locations.

The National People's Campaign, the coalition that organized the "National Day of Protest," is holding the protests for American people to demand welfare, health care, education, labor rights, public housing, affirmative action, environmental protections and many other rights, according to ASP literature.

"The organization feels that the contract contains legislation which is unjust and disempowering to the American people," Copeland said. "We want to give students on campus an opportunity to participate in student activism on a national level."

Students can buy bus tickets at Tix Unlimited in the Student Union for $20. Buses will leave Haigis Mall, UMass at 8:30 a.m. on May 6, and return at 11 p.m.

The ASP has one bus for the trip. If enough interest is shown by mid–week, the ASP can get more buses, Copeland said. He said this march gives students a chance to prove that young adults are not apathetic to the events going on around them.

These nationwide demonstrations on May 6 are endorsed by groups and individuals such as Professor David Graham Dubois, a visiting professor of journalism and African American Studies at UMass; Diane Kelley, who represents Emergency Mobilization Against Racism; The Coalition for Basic Human Needs; authors Alice Walker and Leslie Feinberg; Leonard Peltier, and the Gay and Lesbian Labor Activist Network.

Correction

In Friday's Collegian, the participants in the photo of the concert canoe event were incorrectly identified. The individuals were Travis Mitchell, a senior civil engineering major and professor Don Johan Degroot. The Collegian regrets the error.

GLB office is named for Stonewall

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

After ten years serving the University of Massachusetts and the local community, the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns is no more.

Instead, the office is being renamed The Stonewall Center: A Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay and Transgender Educational Resource Center.

The change was announced in a memo released April 26 by Felice Yeskel, director of the office, which operates as part of UMass Student Affairs.

The location, phone number, and function of the office will remain the same.

Yeskel outlined several reasons for the name change.

First, the office decided that it was time to have a name that was inclusive of transgender people. The Chancellor's Task Force for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender Matters expanded its name earlier this semester.

Second, Yeskel wrote, "[the office] wanted to help the community distinguish our office from the student group, the [Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance].

"Our name was long and cumbersome to say, so often it was referred to as the Program for GLB Concerns. The use of the initials lead to the confusion of our office with the LBGA."

Finally, office staff hope that "The Stonewall Center" will be easier to remember, Yeskel wrote.

According to the memo, the new name reflects a desire to honor part of GLBT history. By many accounts, the GLBT rights movement began in June 1969, with a riot at the Stonewall Inn in New York City.

The Stonewall Inn was a gay bar and, like other GLBT bars in the city, had been the victim of police harassment and violence in the past.

"During a typical police raid, the patrons of the Stonewall fought back and rioting continued for three days," Yeskel wrote. "Soon after this event there was a proliferation of groups and organizations working for gay liberation."

A 25th anniversary celebration for Stonewall was held this past summer in New York City.

The Stonewall Center will still provide the same services to the UMass community. These services include a resource library, the GLB Speakers Bureau and a safe space for members of the GLBT community.

UMass subject of higher water bill

By Emily Gold
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The University of Massachusetts will pay a higher rate for water usage than any other area in Amherst if a proposed plan is implemented by the town.

The town and UMass disagree about the fairness of charging a larger rate to the campus.

The increased block rate system for assessing water sewage costs would charge higher per–unit rates to the largest users. UMass is the only area that falls into the highest block rate, said Barry Del Castilo, Amherst town manager.

The system, which is already used in the Eastern part of Massachusetts and at all other UMass campuses, is designed for industrial and commercial centers in urban areas with water problems, said Bill Rose, associate vice chancellor for administration and finance.

"We're neither industrial nor commercial," Rose said. "The town chose to implement that methodology anyway, which penalizes and disproportionately charges the University."

Costs to UMass will increase by about $4,000 in fiscal year 1996 if the new system is implemented, Rose said. Assuming that usage remains at the same level, the total average rate for water and sewer usage is projected at $2 million in 1996.

According to Rose, the block rate system is not financially sound since UMass, unlike individual homes and businesses, pays for all water distribution on campus.

Since the town simply distributes large quantities of water to the edge of campus, costs to Amherst are lower than for individual homes and businesses, Rose said. Costs are also minimized since UMass pays one large bill, as opposed to areas that use much less water and receive separate bills.

"We see no rationale for the University to be primarily singled out to pay a greater per–unit cost than anyone else," Rose said.

According to Rose, UMass opposes the "sudden, unsupported differential treatment," not higher costs.

"If there are increased costs, we fully expect to participate in increased rates," he said.

Del Castilo said the block rate system is necessary since larger users should pay higher rates.

"I'm told that the University feels singled out, but the University is unique among our water users," he said.

According to Del Castilo, some water and sewer costs to the town are caused primarily by UMass.

Low water usage in the summer and high usage in September at UMass generates extra costs since water facilities must be larger than water usage in the summer, Del Castilo said.

The large size of the UMass campus is also a unique cost, Del Castilo said.

Del Castilo declined to specify the additional costs, saying he will respond directly to UMass administrators. Specific figures that show additional costs will be known at that time, he said.

"There was great participation from the community and I didn't hear a single complaint," Nelson said.

To entertain the young children in attendance, special events were planned. Children played with chicks and rabbits, ran three–legged races, played an egg–tossing game and participated in a pie–eating contest, LaVallee said.

A huge pie–throwing fight broke out before the premier showmanship event. Signs of the pie fight were everywhere, Nelson said.

No casualties were reported, except for Matt Rose, a senior pre–veterinary major who said that his "pride was damaged."

I do not like them, Sam–I–Am

Nathan Crick

There were times, a couple years ago, when I'd be sitting in my dormitory room on a Friday night with the stacked remnants of a game of Tetris on my computer screen. Outside my Orchard Hill window the streetlights would reflect off the car windshields, and occasionally I'd see small groups of students marching up the hill, laughing and shouting in a flurry of hands. Outside my door, I might have hear the thump of stuttered footsteps as they approached the bathroom, and all around would be echoes of music being shoved out the windows into the air. I'd switch the CD, sit back in my chair, and stare at the wall.

The thought of house parties made me cringe. The aspect of sitting around a room playing 3–man was dull. In fact, almost anything seemed an assault on my version of enjoyment, and so in my room I'd sit, and imagine driving far away. To where I wasn't sure. It just seemed better than where I was.

I remember how I had made up a thousand pictures in my head of the places that I could have been going. That at these parties were a hundred huge, loud, annoying guys who only wanted to belch. That at the clubs were trendy fools who I had tried to get away from in high school. At the shows were shirtless skinheads who'd simply kick my ass. All the world around me was waiting to suck me in, I thought. My room was the only place that was safe from it. Here, I was okay, and nobody would touch me, and nobody would change me, and I would be my own person.

So like Dr. Manette in the A Tale of Two Cities, I'd sit in my cell and make shoes all day, mumbling to myself about the evils of the outside and thinking that all of reality was stored up inside my head.

I had thought I had drained all these feelings out of me by now, and that the nights spent in Sicilian train stations or in Prague punk clubs had rid me of the fear of the outside. I even go to house parties now, after all. But I realized that these fears do not ever leave us. They float around in our blood stream, and collect in a new part of our mind, telling lies to the rest of our hapless worries.

Applying to graduate school, I suddenly had a fear of becoming another stamped–out Jello mold that I felt our system of education tended to eject. So I figured I'd work for a while, stay in Amherst, but this place, too, seemed to loom around me with years of memories holding me down like a thousand Lilliputians. Everything, from jobs to school to family to all of society felt like it was closing in around me, with the teeth of conformity biting into my sides. It made me want to run off to the west coast, or hop on a plane across the ocean, all with the goal of gathering enough motion to prevent the mold from growing on my body and the groping hands from slowing me down.

It was just more of the same. It was another version of the Green Eggs and Ham syndrome all over again, believing that too many helpings would inevitably turn me into another annoying salesman like Sam–I–Am.

What I have found, though, is that the world is not much to be afraid of. It may kill you, it may shun you, it may shout at you and it may fire you, but what it cannot do without your own permission is to change you. The power of the self is so often underestimated in this society, mainly because those within the positions of authority have no understanding of it. The information we receive is based upon their own ignorance and their own insecurity, with the intention of making the public more frightened than they are. They would have us believe that movies will make us murderers, and music will drive us to sin, and that a misplaced word will lay waste to a generation.

And some of us believe it, but that doesn't really concern me. I do not care much about those who sprint to the nearest parade so as not to be out of fashion, because their opinions sway to the nearest voice, and may just as easily sway to my own if I'm good enough. It is no achievement to change the mind of a pawn.

What does concern me, however, is when those who have the strength to start competing in the game become scared that in the process they will be turned into a pawn like the everybody else. That in the desire to be a part of life, and a contributor to society, they will be warped and recruited by the rest of the lemmings, and will end up just helping them design faster ways to haul the population off a bigger cliff. It is the same fear of before, of being somehow a helpless victim of environment, but this time it is more subtle. This time it crawls into the back of the mind and whispers from underneath the cowls of pride.

"You are different than them," it mumbles. "You are more than that. Get yourself away, and keep running so they don't catch up to you. Run far, far away."

So then they might listen, and climb up on a pedestal to admire themselves, all the while building up the walls around them for insulation against the world outside. Then they will become just another useless commodity, wasting all their talents away within their plaster cast, until they die and are sold on the market as another beautiful sculpture of a tragic life.

We cannot be afraid of society draining the life from us, because in doing so we have already begun the process. We have then let the fear take us over and run our lives just like the rest. Being a part of life does not mean having to take in all the ignorance and all the manipulation of society, but it does mean we must still, at its core, take it. We must take it all, and be greedy of experience, and absorb it all so that we can be players of the game rather than just pieces in the game. Any other way, and we act merely as parasites, feeding off our frustration and our anger.

So Sam–I–Am will keep chasing us, and he will carry with him his boxes and foxes and trains and planes, but we should not just shove him away in indignation. Because Sam, for all his faults, still has something valuable to give.

Hearing more besides your own voice

Tara Ruelle

I sharpened my listening skills quite well this past weekend. As of Friday night I had no voice to speak of (literally) so I basically wore my hand down from writing so much and began my weekend-long run as an A–number–one set of ears. I may have learned something from this predicament, but the jury's still out on that one.

Sure, there are great things (for other people anyway) about my not being able to speak. People could say just about anything they wanted to me, as my hand certainly can't scribble a clever response that fast. Hand gestures became my friend. My two birds could shrick as loud as they wanted to. I couldn't say my usual annoyed, "Shut up you idiots," and they couldn't understand my persistent hand signals. So they mocked me. My mother called twice and I was forced to endure, "Put the humidifier in your living room, drink tea with honey, stop laughing with Joanne, and go to Health Services tomorrow or else." I've never felt so helpless.

There were a few positive aspects to this affliction however. You never truly realize how much you yack at people until you can't muster the word "what." You choose your words pretty carefully when they're few and far between. Seemed like my roommate had a lot more to say over the weekend, and I started to think maybe she needs more of this unopinionated listener I had become. I could also better hear the genuine concern in my parents' voices rather than talking over them. I could feel just how much I hated those flying feathered rodents I call pets as they let out those ear piercing tweets to other feathered rodents outside my window. Okay, maybe that wasn't that positive, but I have to stretch it a bit here. I am a cranky, voiceless person with a computer at my disposal.

Above all else, though, I learned the hard way how difficult it is to communicate without words, or without a voice. It seems like such a frivolous tool until it's impaired. I rarely do speak in my classes, but I pride myself on the few witty returns I deliver each semester. I missed the daily dialogues with my roommate about current world problems, such as the premature cancellation of "My So–called Life," and what fast food we were eating for dinner that night. Hell, I even missed yelling at my T.V. about a stupid show, or singing along with my CD player, though I imagine my neighbors didn't. I didn't like that people couldn't hear me. I need to speak; I'm just not that good at shutting up.

This was a nice test for me to see how good a listener I could be. My head got such a workout from nodding so much. I was tuned into everything someone said, but my head was also racing with responses. There were a lot of things though that I'm glad I let rest in my thoughts. Would I have blurted them out if I could have? The answer to me is obviously yes. I, like I imagine a lot of people do at times, forgot to think before I blurt something out. I forget to even listen sometimes and just take that ball and run with it. Listening is an important part of a conversation, it's often underrated though. I just hope I can take some of these new and improved listening skills of mine and put them to good use. Maybe I'll really hear what someone's trying to say now without barking out a premature response.

As frustrated as I was all weekend, it was helpful for me to listen to other people and become a skillful observer. This may be decent practice for a lot of people. It seems we may learn more by listening rather than speaking to become informed. As simple and contrived as this may sound I don't see it practiced all that often. I'll be the first to admit that I usually don't hear half of what people say to me. I've learned my lesson in a way though. I'll try to reserve an opinion about someone until I've really heard what they've said. Okay, "Caring, Sharing, Loving Hour" is now over, and it's back to my cynical self.

At least I was nice for one weekend.

Profit distorts role of education

Thomas Masterson

To promote efficiency, we are told, we must turn over the administration of anything and everything to the discipline of the market. It is to private industry that the received wisdom tells us to look for solutions to the problems facing the educational system.

The reasons given for this belief are that public bureaucracy is wasteful and inefficient and that the discipline of the market competition brings about greater efficiency. But these arguments are not true. The one great advantage privately owned businesses have over public institutions is that they are not accountable to the public and this is exactly what we don't want in a public institution. The question of privatization merely masks the underlying conception of education as nothing more than preparation for the workforce.

Bureaucracy, we are told, is wasteful and inefficient. But private businesses are run in exactly the same manner as public institutions, employing the same management techniques and structures. Both face the same problems of motivating their employees for greater productivity. Both are administered through hierarchal bureaucracies. Private businesses have an advantage over the system in place now, it cannot be an organizational one.

Ah, but private businesses are disciplined by competition, and therefore must be more efficient. If there were no "disciplining" happening to UMass, we would not be talking about privatization on this campus. Specifically, UMass is in direct competition at two levels. It competes with other programs for that most scarce resource: public funds. It also competes with other institutions of higher education for another scarce resource: students. States, as well, compete with other states to lure businesses to set up shop by providing lower taxes, fewer regulations, etc. This competition is in part responsible for the scarcity of public funds for education (at all levels) which drives schools to be more efficient. So then, what are the differences between private businesses and public institutions?

It is certainly true that private businesses have one crucial, distinguishing and revealing operational advantage over public institutions. The managers of privately owned businesses must answer primarily to their owners, and to some lesser extent, their customers. Theoretically, the Board of Trustees of the UMass system are answerable to Gov. William Weld, and through him, to the people who elected him. This places more operational constraints on this public bureaucracy than on private bureaucracy. At UMass, we can make efficiency gains by replacing union and work study jobs, which the University is bound to provide, with minimum wage, no benefit jobs which private businesses are free to offer. One then could argue, assumptions in hand, that the existing arrangement is less than optimally efficient, but such an argument begs the question: efficient at what?

Efficient at reducing the use of public funds, perhaps, if one looks merely at the bottom line. But is the bottom line the ultimate measure of the efficiency of UMass or the educational system as a whole? In these times of fiscal constraints, this seems beyond question. But it should not be so. Surely there must be some room for the ability of the system to respond to the needs of its employees and its students. We must ask what the purpose of the UMass system is, who it is supposed to serve, and what needs it is meant to fulfill. If we are to think in terms of operational efficiency, we must refer to that which UMass is producing. Just what are we producing?

Too often in today's public discourse, education is represented as nothing more than a necessary prerequisite for entry into the labor market. Today, perhaps as a result of this prevailing view of education as investment in economic preparedness, spending on education is framed by the question of return on investment. Therefore programs are to be cut according to their economic relevance, according to President Michael K. Hooker's plan for UMass. This is certainly not new. We have seen, for many years now, cuts in primary and secondary school arts programs in all but the wealthiest communities, while math and the sciences remain untouched. We seek to create a generation with the ability to calculate, but not to create, articulate or advocate, for the one has economic relevance while the others, we are to believe, do not.

So privatization, even in its less overt form, such as turning the Student Union Building and the Campus Center over to the private enterprise, for whom the University will supply a steady stream of consumers, and depriving workers and students of jobs and voice, is a natural outgrowth of this trend. This trend is not irreversible. If we demand that the discourse surrounding the efficiency of all of our public institutions, especially education, include a broader conception of education and perhaps even a vision of society articulated by the people rather than the market, there is hope. But if education is merely to be preparation for wage labor, then there are indeed dark times ahead.

Thomas Masterson is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

GLBT studies a valuable addition

To the editor:

Afro-American Studies, and now there is even an effort to start a GLBT studies program. Is this necessary? Are any of these areas of study valid as an individual academic discipline? I expect I would be highly criticized by all of these communities if I spoke out against any of them. It seems self-evident to me that they are in fact valid concentrations of study. I am faced then with a dilemma, for in our attempts to instate a GLBT studies program we have been asked to justify GLBT studies as a valid academic discipline.

When I say we, I am referring to a group of highly motivated students who are in the process of campaigning for the creation of a GLBT Studies Certificate program. In this effort to enact the recommendations from a number of campus organizations, we have been consistently held back by the administration. In our meetings we have been told that the University wishes to be on the cutting edge of education on multicultural issues. Despite the fact that the Chancellor has repeatedly included gay, lesbian, and bisexual concerns in his definition of multiculturalism, he has yet to make any meaningful strides in the academic arena to include these studies as a valid discipline.

This is not meant to suggest that the administration is ignorant of these matters. The Chancellor's Task Force on GLBT Matters was formed in part to inform the members of the administration of the diverse needs of the gay, lesbian, and bisexual community on campus. A study of previous demands made by the GLBT community on campus and its allies quickly demonstrates that there has been improvement on many of these needs and concerns.

In the academic arena this record of improvement falls apart. The administration has failed to yield to the persistent demand for courses concentrating on GLBT issues. I understand their monetary concerns. This University is in a financial crisis and has been for several years. The administration has chosen to endorse multiculturalism as the cutting edge of academics. It seems appropriate that the University should allow some growth in this area if it truly intends to be on that 'cutting edge.'

The administration's representative on this matter has committed to answering the persistent call of the student advocates of the GLBT Studies Certificate program by this coming Monday. I am hopeful that the University will recognize its validity as an academic discipline, but I am not confident that they will do so. This letter is a testament to my belief that GLBT studies is a valid academic discipline. There is purpose behind the study of these issues in modern life and in the study of the past. I know I am not the only student with firm beliefs in GLBT studies as an academic discipline and I hope both students and faculty can join in fighting for its recognition.

Drafted enemies breeds a quandary

To the editor:

Well, do you remember when Cincinnati played against UMass at Springfield? I was there and unfortunately Nick Van Excel was there too. He scored 30 points and crushed UMass so I hated him. Do you remember Eddie Jones from Temple? He was a good player but UMass beat them anyway. So what's the point? Well, they are playing for my favorite team, the LA Lakers. I can't believe it but they were both drafted or acquired by same deal. Should I hate the Lakers and stick with the Orlando Magic or continue to like the Lakers even though they are playing for them?

Toad the Wet Sprocket gearing up for MHC gig

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

They've been known as that band with the goofy name, or those guys who sing that "Walk on the Ocean" song — the one that never quite became a hit from a group who's never exactly hit it big. Yet chances are you've heard Toad the Wet Sprocket somewhere, whether it's their latest single on the radio or a Toad–oldie on your best friend's brother's girlfriend's mix tape. And for those who want to hear more, Toad will be in South Hadley tomorrow night, headlining at Mount Holyoke College.

If they haven't exactly flooded the charts, the band, made up of leader Glen Phillips (vocals, guitars, keyboards), Dean Dinning (bass, keyboards, backing vocals), Randy Guss (drums) and Todd Nichols (guitars, vocals) is exceedingly well–known. Their popular mailing list boasts over 50,000 members, and the band has released four albums since the Santa Barbara–based group self–recorded the straightforward folk–rock Bread and Circus in 1989 for $650.

It's a track from Bread and Circus — "Always Changing Probably" — that neatly defines Toad's evolving spirit and sound. All four albums are substantially different, and it's only Glen Phillips' swooning voice that binds them together. Their hook, if anything, is to keep pushing themselves — lyrically, musically, professionally — to make things more interesting for both the performer and the listener.

The quartet met in the early '80s while in high school in Santa Barbara. They then formed Toad the Wet Sprocket; the name culled from an obscure "Monty Python" skit. After Bread and Circus became a local favorite, Toad moved on to Columbia Records, where they released the eponymous– sounding Pale in 1990, insisting on total creative control.

"We liked the fact that we could develop on our own," says Nichols in their press biography. "There wasn't a lot of hype or expectations."

Though Pale and the re–released Bread and Circus didn't make waves on the charts, the buzz surrounding the band on the college and local club circuit was growing.

In 1991, the group released the alternately poppy and darkly produced Fear, and their meandering rise to stardom led to two unexpected top 40 hits with "All I Want" and "Walk on the Ocean." And they were off, playing over 275 shows in North America and Europe in less than 18 months. Fear went platinum, and Toad went back into the studio, eager to experiment with their sound.

"There's more fun on [Dulcinea]," comments Dinning. "I've always liked this side of the band — the "Stupid" and "Nanci" type songs — and even "Fall Down," which is just straight–ahead rock and roll. In the past, when people would listen to Pale, they'd say, 'What are these guys, suicidal or something?' I think this record is a more honest presentation of who we are."

The title of their most recent release, Dulcinea, comes from the tale of Don Quixote, who sees "Dulcinea" as an ideal vision of beauty and wholesomeness when in reality, she is none of these things.

"The thought I hold to is that Dulcinea represents an ideal of perfection that does not exist," offers Dinning. "But we keep trying to reach that ideal and that's when the music happens."

"Instead of loving things for what they are, you love them for what you wish they were," explains Phillips. "That can drive you to do great deeds, or at least what you perceive as great deeds."

Toad the Wet Sprocket will play Chapin Hall at Mount Holyoke College tomorrow evening at 8 p.m. General Admission tickets are $17.50/Adv.

Herbfest '95 to feature class projects

Herbs, spices, medicinal plants highlighted in annual festival

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Many people are not aware of the vast number of medicinal plants and herbs that sustain our culture and at the same time offer natural alternatives to "modern day" medicine.

Herbfest '95 is an excellent chance to see how herbs, spices and medicinal plants can be used, and are used in everyday life. Over 50 students from the Plant and Science Course 280 will participate in this year's festival, which will be held from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. on May 2 in the Student Union Ballroom.

According to Kara Dinda, a student in the class, Herbfest '95 is a collection of class projects each student must do for the class.

"The Plant and Soil Science 280 class has to do class projects on herbs, spices or medicinal plants," said Dinda. "They can use them in shampoos, as foods or cosmetics."

The projects involve lengthy research on the plants plus a history of them, their chemical properties and how they are used in the project, according to Dinda.

"The fest is open and free to the public. Part of it is to help people learn about herbs, spices and medicinal plants and also how they are used in commercial items and the beneficial properties they have," said Dinda.

Herbfest has been happening at the University of Massachusetts for the past four years, according to Professor Lyle Craker, instructor for the course. Events will include an herbal garden, herbal foods and teas, and information about herbal medicines and how they can be used.

Some of the projects the students will have on display include demonstrations on using aromatic plant material in crafts such as candles, soap and jewelry. One student has a collection of lavender plants to display and others will demonstrate their culinary skills by using herbs in a variety of dishes, according to Craker.

"Unless you express interest in Western Society and are keen on plants, many things are overlooked when it comes to herbs, spices and medicinal plants," said Dinda. "A lot of herbal remedies that have been dismissed or overlooked in favor of modern medicine. People dismiss them as old wives tales, but their not — they really do work."

Herbfest '95 is free and open to the public. It will be held in the Student Union Ballroom from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. on Tuesday, May 2.

Valley filmmakers shine at festival

FIVE–COLLEGE FILM FESTIVAL
Stirn Auditorium
April 28

Faithful independent film fans filled Stirn Auditorium at Amherst College Friday night both to view and give accolades to award–winning student–made movies.

The Second Annual Five–College Film Festival, sponsored by the Five–College Council, displayed over four hours worth of the most artistic and original independent films in the Valley.

A panel of five judges (one representing each area college) performed the arduous task of screening 47 submissions this year, and selecting 16 to be showed. Awards and honorable mentions were given to the best films in four categories — Narrative, Documentary, Animation and Experimental.

Styles ranged from Erika Czerwinski's quirky and humorous Best of Narrative The Big Spill — a five–minute piece that epitomized the trials and tribulations of late–nights in the library — to the serious, award–winning documentary Treating Me by Janna Goodwin, which deals with women living with HIV and AIDS. Both filmmakers were from Hampshire College.

Eva Obregon–Blasco, also from Hampshire College, won Best of Experimental for her 14–minute work, Con Hambre Bajo El Sol/Hunger Under the Sun.

Best of Animation went to Benjamin Goldman for 730 Grove Street, an imaginative, 19–minute film recorded on 16mm that combined the use of claymation with foam latex and aluminum life–sized human figures.

"I began by recording conversations with my grandparents over the summer, which generated into the film," Goldman said of the origin of his animation.

The 70–minute narrative by Philip H. O'Brien, entitled Asylum, impressed both the audience and judges as it won for Best of Festival.

Set in North Reading, Mass., Asylum is the story of a car repair shop–owner and tow truck–driver who is slowly driven insane by his occupation. According to O'Brien, the film was intended not to simply be set around the car repair shop, but "around the fear of what's going to happen."

Hampshire College student Gabriel Coakley garnered an honorable mention in the documentary category with Portrait of George Hardy.

Workin' Up a Sweat

By Stuart Damon, M.S.P.T., Physical Therapist

Spring time - you start to think about getting outdoors again, maybe you want to get in shape for the summer. The winter months have taken their toll on you physically, and running, biking, or aerobics sound like the perfect way to get yourself on track. An injury would not only slow you down, it may even cause a prolonged or even permanent absence from your chosen sport. Here are a few simple ideas for preventing injuries.

Running:

Run in tights or sweats when the temperature is below about 50 degrees. By keeping your legs warm, you will help to prevent Iliotibial (IT) Band Syndrome, a painful and limiting ailment caused by the tightening of the iliotibial band, a strip of sturdy connective tissue which runs from the hip to the knee on the outside of your leg.

Cross train. Running in excess of 35-40 miles per week puts you at risk for stress fractures and/or "shin splints."

Choose appropriate footwear. If you are in doubt, consult an expert at a running shoe shop. He or she should be able to determine if you are flat-footed or have a rigid, high-arched foot; the correct shoe can make a world of difference.

Cycling:

Ride in tights or sweats when the temperature is below about 60 degrees. See the comments above on IT Band Syndrome -the only difference is that you must consider the wind chill factor with cycling, hence wearing tights at higher temperatures.

Check seat height. Your knee should be bent about 20-30 degrees at the bottom of the pedal stroke. A good way to check is this: sit on your bike with one heel on the pedal at the bottom of its stroke. Check the position of your knee - it should be just about straight. If in doubt as to positioning, check with a pro at a bike shop.

Stay off the big chain ring until you have at least 100 miles under your belt. This will help to prevent knee problems.

Stairmaster: (see photos on right→)

Set the workout level according to this rule of thumb: you should be able to complete your entire workout standing upright on the steps, using your arms only for balance. If you alter your posture when leaning on the machine -low back and neck pain often result.

Your hands should rest gently on the rails, fingers facing away from you. By turning your hands around, you can indeed support more weight on your arms but you will also increase the strain on your wrist, possibly contributing to problems with Carpal Tunnel Syndrome.

Hips and knees should be aligned so try to step with your kneecap over your second toe. This will help prevent your kneecap from rubbing against your thigh bone.

General Comments:

Don't try to push through pain. While a certain amount of effort is required to "get in shape", exercising in pain is not beneficial. It is your body's way of asking you to stop.

Stretch adequately before and after working out. There are a number of very good guides available in most bookstores at moderate cost. See below for a couple helpful stretches to prevent injury.

STRETCH FIRST
HIP FLEXION (HAMSTRING)
1. Lie on back holding one leg with hands as shown.
2. Straighten the knee as far as you comfortably can.
3. Hold 25-30 seconds.
4. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out
HIP EXTERNAL ROTATION / FLEXION
1. Stand propping one leg on solid object as shown.
2. lean your trunk forward so that you feel a stretch along the outside of your hips and buttocks.
3. Hold 25-30 seconds
4. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out.
HIP EXTERNAL ROTATION / FLEXION
1. Lie on back holding one knee and ankle as shown.
2. Hold knee stable as you pull ankle toward your chest so that you feel a stretch along the outside of your hip and leg.
3. Hold 25-30 seconds
4. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out.
HIP ADDUCTION
1 Stand with one side facing wall
2. Cross the outside leg behind the inside leg and toward the wall.
3. Twist trunk toward the wall, using hands for support as shown.
4. Bend forward knee slightly until you feel a stretch on the outside of the hip (see arrow).
5. Hold 25-30 seconds
6. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out
DORSIFLEXION
1. Assume position shown with one foot behind the other forward.
2. Point toes directly forward, and hold heel down
3. Lean forward onto your forward leg with the knee of the back leg straight so that you feel a stretch along the back of calf
4. Hold 25-30 seconds.
5. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out.
KNEE FLEXION
1. Stand holding one ankle as shown
2. Bend the knee upward so that you feel a stretch in the front of your thigh.
4. Hold 25-30 seconds
5. 3-4 repetitions per side, before and after working out.

Peak Performance
for High Stress Season

by Sally Damon, M.S.P.H., Health Educator

Remember last year? Four exams in three days? Your project was two days late. Besides trying to study, you had to pack, find a summer job, and prepare yourself to move back home. You said you'd never let this happen again. Well, here are some tips for handling the end of the semester with grace, style and a minimum of stress!

✓Plan ahead. Make a schedule now of when you'll read, study your notes, finish that project. Keep an eye on the big picture and stick to your schedule.

✓Exercise to recharge your body and mind. Even just a 20 minute walk, run, or swim can do wonders for your thinking power and concentration.

✓Hang up your beer mug. Heavy drinking impairs memory for up to 72 hours after your binge. Pot also impairs short term memory, reading comprehension and concentration.

✓Talk to your professors now. Find out what to concentrate on for the final so you can plan accordingly and study the right stuff.

✓Eat regular meals, especially breakfast. Mom was definitely right on this one.

✓Be good to yourself. Take study breaks every two hours to relax, stretch, snack or just veg out. The brain needs a rest too!

✓Get some sleep. Avoid the all-nighter trap. You are better off with five hours to power study and 5-6 hours of sleep. Staying up all night helps you procrastinate and waste a lot of time, energy and coffee just trying to stay awake.

✓Espresso distresso. Rapid increases in caffeine intake or use of Vivarin or No-doze pills often bring on the shakes, jitters, anxiety and insomnia. Definitely not a prime way to ace that exam.

✓Plan a reward. Give yourself something to look forward to after all your hard work. Good luck!!

THE SKINNY ON FAT

By Arleen Thomson, B.S., R.D., Nutritionist

As a culture, we are becoming more and more aware of the dangers of a high fat diet on our health. Some are taking this message too seriously and not receiving enough fat in their diet. The danger of very little or no fat in our diet is not being communicated.

Fat is essential for many reasons. It helps to support and cushion vital organs, thus protecting them from injury. The layer of fat under one's skin provides insulation against extreme temperatures. Especially in the cold, fat helps maintain normal body temperature. The heart muscle uses energy from fat deposits. Also, fat is necessary for providing oils in hair and skin that prevent dryness and give your complexion a healthy glow.

The construction of hormone-like regulatory substances called prostaglandins are provided by fat. Prostaglandins are essential constituents of cell membranes throughout the body and help to regulate the body's use of cholesterol. Without some fat, a woman's sex-hormone balance and menstrual cycle may be disrupted.

Fat is also needed in the diet in order to transport certain fat soluble vitamins in your body. Without some fat in your diet, you would not absorb vitamin A, D, E and K.

The American Heart Association recommends that 30% of a person's total calorie intake should come from fat. Most nutritionists would recommend a range of 20-30% of your total calories should be from fat. It is up to your individual choice.

Here's a chart that helps explain how many grams of fat are necessary at various caloric levels. Most moderately active women maintain their weight at 1800 calories, while moderately active men maintain their's at approximately 2200. Athletes require more calories.

Grams of Total Fat Percentage of Total Calories:

Total Calories	20%	30%
1,200	27	40
1,300	29	43
1,400	31	47
1,500	33	50
1,600	36	53
1,700	38	57
1,800	40	60
1,900	42	63
2,000	44	67
2,100	47	70
2,200	49	73
2,300	51	77

The Summer Basic Health Fee

This fee is important because the health care you are entitled to at UHS through your student mandatory fees expires on May 31, 1995. The Summer Plan goes into effect on June 1, 1995, and will cover you until August 31, 1995. The plan costs $196.30.

The Summer Basic Health Fee covers most routine care that is provided for you at UHS, including lab work and radiology. It does not cover services you receive at other medical sites. Request the brochure, "Summer 1995 Health Coverage", for a full listing of services that are provided at UHS.

Enrollment in the Summer Basic Health Plan is through the Member Services Department in the front lobby of UHS. You should enroll as soon as possible through June 1, 1995 if you want uninterrupted coverage. If you have the Supplemental Health Benefits Health Plan (SHBP), you still need the Summer Basic Health Plan. Although the Supplemental Health Benefits Plan covers authorized emergencies and hospitalization services, it does not cover routine care at UHS. Only the Summer Basic Health Plan will cover routine office visits during the months when you are not a full time student.

Student Family Plan

Once you have enrolled with the Summer Basic Health Fee (assuming you also have Supplemental), you can enroll your apouse and/or children under the age of nineteen in the Student Family Plan for the cost of $447.50. This fee covers routine care at UHS and provides for Supplemental Health Benefits. The period your family will be covered is from June 1, 1995 to August 31, 1995.

Supplemental Health Benefits Plan A summary brochure of the Health Benefits Plan is available at UHS for a description of benefits.

The Supplemental Health Benefits Plan does not cover routine services (covered under Basic) rendered at UHS except copayments. See Basic description.

Pre-certification is required for all inpatient admissions and outpatient surgery procedures that are performed outside of the University of Massachusetts local area. The telephone number to attain pre-certification approval is with First Health Review at 1-800-752-5709.

Questions concerning claims and benefits can be addressed to First Health at 1-800-542-3634 or the Claims Office at (413)-549-2671 ext. 231.

Fall Semester Health Care

If you are taking 5 or more credits in the fall, you will be automatically billed with your tuition for the Basic Health Fee and the Supplemental Health Benefits Plan. Coverage will begin on September 1, 1995. However, if you are taking less than 5 credits or you are a program fee student, you will not be billed through the Bursar's Office. You must come to UHS to enroll if you want to continue your coverage after August 31, 1995.

If you have any questions about health plan enrollment or eligibility, call the Member Services Department at 549-2671, ext. 192.

❖Dining Commons aka D.C.:
The Berkshire and Worcester D.C.s will be open to study from 8:00 pm - 11:00 pm. There will even be FREE java and goodies to keep up your brain power.

❖Newman Center:
Another option to study in a quiet comfortable room open until midnight during finals. There is also a snackbar and grill downstairs.

GOOD LUCK ON FINALS

The Minutemen began their comeback by scoring one in the sixth, then tying it at 9-9 with two runs in the top of the seventh. Durt then shut down West Virginia in the bottom of the inning to send the game into extra frames.

UMass got two more runs in the eighth, but the Mountaineers tied it in the bottom of the inning. After a scoreless ninth, the Minutemen exploded with seven runs in the top of the tenth. Knight drove home the game winner on a fielder's choice, while Pelis and sophomore third baseman Brad Gorrie both collected two run doubles.

Jason Bennett, 5-0, who entered in the eighth and pitched a scoreless ninth and tenth for UMass, got credit for the win, while West Virginia's Ashley Shope (3-2) picked up the loss.

UMass and West Virginia matched up again Sunday afternoon, but results were not available as of press time.

■ women's lacrosse

goal seemed to spell a common theme of letting opponents control the pace early for UMass this season. Even with the return of sophomore defender Michelle Warrington to the lineup, the team came out hesitant.

"I am little disappointed, because we came out intimidated," senior captain Diane MacNeil said. "Again, I feel when we come out against these teams we are evenly matched up without being fired up, and do not get going until we are down."

"The team came out timid, and I could tell in warmups that they were feeling pressured," coach Francesca McClellan said. "They were not ready to play, so BC got the healthy lead, and then we played the game."

Two late goals by freshmen attacker Kristin Kramer and defender Amy Leder in the first frame got UMass back in the flow, but they were still down 7-3. The start of the second half brought different results, as the Minutewomen's leading scorer Dignazio and Kramer reeled off three straight scores, cutting the deficit to 8–5 with 17:42 left in the period.

After exchanging goals, the comeback bid continued for UMass with scores by MacNeil and Dignazio, bringing the score to the slim margin of 9–8 with 5:05 left in the game. But a late score by Alex Doyle of the Eagles with a little over two minutes remaining closed it out, leaving Diganazio's fourth goal of the game with four ticks on the clock a moot point at best. The way UMass came back is a sign of the team's ability to bounce back, but the loss characterizes their season, coming up just shy once again, 10–9.

Sunday's loss to Harvard was equally discouraging for the Minutewomen, as it did not reflect the progress made over their tumultuous season. Although it was statistically an inconsistent year, the team has worked hard on executing their game plan and improving their passing and communication skills. These improvements were the keys to their wins over Vermont, Holy Cross and St. Joe's. The loss to Harvard of 20–6 was a disappointing end to a season filled with potential.

The game began with a 2–0 lead for UMass in the first few minutes. However, that was the only opportunity that the Crimson allowed, taking the lead and keeping it after eight minutes of play.

Massachusetts freshman Joanna Dignazio and sophomore Stephanie Walsh each netted two goals apiece. They were followed with single goals by freshman Kristin Kramer and sophomore Robin Axelrod.

Freshman Kate Brew saw 40:38 minutes of play, doing her best to fend off the overwhelming Crimson offense who danced circles around the UMass defense. Brew had eight saves while sophomore Trish DiBenedetto, who replaced Brew in the second half, had seven saves.

The Massachusetts weakness was in their passing. Harvard had better communication and passing skills and capitalized on the Minutewomen's inability to connect.

"I think that we could've played harder for our last game," Dignazio said. "It seemed like half of our team was trying hard but the other half wanted to get the season over with, and that's not acceptable."

Sophomore Sarah Goddard agreed with teammate Dignazio. "This game was not indicative of how we can play as a team."

For such a young squad, this season could be looked upon as a sign of good things to come, with critical game experiences under their belt. Freshman Amy Leder summed up her team's feelings on the season the best. "This was our first time to play together but next year will definitely be our year."

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's season ended on a sour note with losses to Boston College and Harvard.

Runs aren't scarce as Red Sox lose

BOSTON (AP) — Ron Karkovice hit his fifth career grand slam, tying a team record and leading the Chicago White Sox to their first win of the season, 17-11 yesterday over the Boston Red Sox. Jose Canseco and Mo Vaughn each hit their first home run for Boston. Mike Devereaux had a two-run shot for Chicago, which won despite making six errors.

Karkovice connected in the eighth inning. He joined Robin Ventura and Harold Baines as the only White Sox players with five career slams in the team's 95-year history.

Tim Raines and Devereaux each had three of Chicago's 17 hits. The White Sox lost their first four games and were outscored 39-11. Boston had 14 hits.

White Sox starter James Baldwin, making his major league debut, and Boston starter Frank Rodriguez each struggled.

Baldwin, 23, gave up four runs and seven hits in three 2-3 innings, and reliever Jose DeLeon (1-0) wound up with the win.

Ventura walked to lead off the fourth, Devereaux singled and Lance Johnson hit an RBI single. Reliever Keith Shepherd walked Karkovice and Craig Grebeck, to score a second run.

One out later, singles by Tim Raines and Frank Thomas produced three more runs. Mike Hartley gave up Chris Sabo's RBI single, making it 9-4.

Raines drove in two more runs with a single in the fifth. Canseco homered into the screen above the Green Monster, making it 11-6 in the fifth.

The Red Sox scored two in the seventh when Mike Macfarlane's RBI single followed a throwing error by Ventura. It was the sixth error by Ventura, a three-time Gold Glove winner. The White Sox have made 18 errors this year.

■ Syracuse

"We have a big game against Brown on Wednesday," Cannella said. "If we win that one, we have a shot to get into the tournament, as long as we play well against Army on Saturday and beat them."

"We have to forget about this and move on to Brown," said sophomore attacker Brendan Glass. "Wednesday is the biggest game of the year right now. Guys can't hang their heads. We just have to let this one go, work hard Monday and Tuesday, and we'll be alright for Wednesday."

Senior attackman Mike Valente agreed.

"It's a big game for us Wednesday," Valente said after the game. "We have no choice but to step up. If we win that game we still get into the playoffs. We just have to step up Wednesday and take care of ourselves over the weekend. Hopefully, if we win those two games, we're in the playoffs."

Glass shuddered at the prospect of missing the tournament for the second straight season.

"If we don't beat Brown, we're staying home again," he said. "It would be very disappointing from all the hard work we've put in this year, but I think we're going to beat Brown."

The Bears captured the New England title last year en route to the NCAA Final Four.

Notebook: Despite the loss, Massachusetts (6-4) moved up to No. 10 in the United States Lacrosse Association's weekly top 25 poll. The rank is the Minutemen's highest since they were ranked No. 9 prior to the loss to Duke on April 5.

Brown will enter the game ranked ninth for the second straight week. After starting the season slowly, the Bears have been playing well latetly. Game time will be 3 p.m. on Wednesday.

the varsity crew has finished its first regular season as a recognized varsity sport with an undefeated record.

Crossing the line with a strong time of 6:49.70, the Minutewomen finished an impressive 17 seconds ahead of the closest boat. Rounding out the field, Ithaca placed second with a time of 7:06.78 followed by Williams (7:12.74) and Mt. Holyoke (7:13.80).

Massachusetts junior varsity crew followed the varsity's lead, winning its race with a strong 12 second win over the field. As for the novice crew, they did not pull off a win this time around, but UMass coach Jim Dietz was pleased with its performance.

"Although the novices didn't get a win, they led for much of the race and I think they're starting to realize what racing is all about," Dietz said. With a strong novice group, UMass can be optimistic that its winning ways could continue long after its first year.

At this stage in the season, Dietz's crew is shifting its focus to post-season competition. On May 7, the crew travels to Worcester to compete in the New England Rowing Championships where it is expected to do quite well as both the varsity and junior varsity crews enter the regatta with No. 1 seeds.

"We have a really fast boat. I didn't think we would be this fast this quick. The maturity of the women as athletes has really surprised me," said Dietz, who anticipates competing in New Englands. He said the Minutewomen should have a good shot at winning New England, but crews UMass do not know much about, such as Connecticut College, could surprise the field.

A strong finish in the New England Championships would give the crew a high seed in the Champion International Regatta, the Minutewomen's biggest national competition of the year. This is UMass' first year in varsity competition, but it is by no means an inexperienced crew. In addition to an undefeated regular season, the crew won both the Visitors and California Cups in the San Diego Crew Classics in San Diego, California in the beginning of April. This win qualified the UMass crew for next year's prestigious Whittier Cup held in April 1996.

Only time will tell which crews will be strong enough to give UMass a run for its money. Seeds for the Champion Regatta are not issued until all the regional competitions are held. At this point, Dietz can only speculate as to who the top competitors will be.

"The University of Virginia seems to be the fastest crew over all, but Georgetown and Ohio State are strong as well. All in all, I think we have a shot in both varsity and junior varsity," Dietz said.

Celtics upset Magic 99–92

After getting blown out on Friday, Boston regroups to win

By Fred Goodall
Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. — Anybody who didn't give Boston a chance against Orlando was dead wrong.

The Celtics rebounded from the worst defeat in the franchise's storied 49-year history with a stunning 99-92 victory yesterday that not only evened the first-round playoff series 1-1 but wrested the homecourt advantage from the heavily favored Magic.

Games three and four of the best-of-five matchup will be played at Boston Garden on Wednesday and Friday meaning at least two more games are left at the historic arena, which is being closed after the season.

Orlando had the best record in the Eastern Conference during the regular season, but lost its last seven road games.

Dominique Wilkins, Dee Brown and Sherman Douglas paced the turnaround less than 48 hours after the Magic destroyed the Celtics 124-77 on Friday night.

The 47-point loss was worst ever for Boston, the only team in the playoffs with a sub-.500 record.

The loss was only the third at home this season for the Magic, who were 29-0 at Orlando Arena against Eastern Conference opponents before yesterday.

But that didn't mean anything to the Celtics, who have a proud tradition which includes a record 16 NBA championships.

Wilkins scored 24 points on 10-for-17 shooting, Brown added 21 and Douglas finished with 20 points and 15 assists.

The Celtics held the Magic to one field goal in the last five minutes, Dennis Scott's 3-pointer with five seconds to go.

Anfernee Hardaway led Orlando with 26 points. Shaquille O'Neal had 22, but the Magic never got the league scoring champion into the flow of the offense.

Boston's Hack-a-Shaq strategy backfired in Game one when the All-Star center made 11 of 14 free throws, but was more effective yesterday although O'Neal did make eight of 14.

5-4 and two RBI day.

Saturday's action

Heading into last weekend's highly important Princeton Tournament boasting the top four teams in the Northeast Region, the University of Massachusetts softball team had to feel confident. They had already beaten two of the teams they were to face, Hofstra and Connecticut, and they were right behind Princeton in the Northeast standings.

But in the first three games of the tourney, the Minutewomen came up short. On Saturday, in the first game against Hofstra, UMass lost 7–1, and then against UConn, the Minutewomen fell 1–0 in extra innings. The Minutewomen then played Princeton on Sunday losing 10–5.

In the first game, the Flying Dutchwomen scored one run in the first and two in the third before breaking out for four runs in the fourth. The Minutewomen got their only run of the game in the top of the sixth when senior Heather Dorsey walked with the bases loaded scoring Martens. Sophomore hurler Dani Ortega suffered the loss for UMass dropping her record to 11–9 on the year. Ortega gave up 13 hits on the day and was not helped by three Minutewomen errors in the field behind her.

In the second game, with the game scoreless after seven full innings, international rules for a tiebreaker were used. Under these rules, the last batter in the previous inning is placed on second base. With the Husky runner on second, Gutridge committed an error allowing the runner to advance to third base. The next batter then singled to drive in the winning run.

Daut's outstanding performance was wasted as she took the loss. She gave up just four hits in the contest.

was still hampered by a pulled left hamstring that prevented him from getting proper footing for his powerful shot.

"I'm having trouble planting," Murphy said. "I was a little nervous, a little tentative. I thought I got some good shots off, but they weren't letting me get set. They were face-guarding me pretty well."

"We really couldn't break that two-goal barrier," Cannella said. "They have tremendous athletes in their program. It seemed that every time the ball was on the ground, Syracuse came up with it. I thought that was the difference in the game."

LoPresti proved he's a real tough customer, playing all 60 minutes despite limited practice throughout the week due to injury. He made 15 saves and likely would have had a few more if at full strength.

Both LoPresti and Rosier were benefactors of strong defense, though it was the SU rearguard that put on the tightest clamps in the final 7:42, after Valente's third goal cut it to 9–7. Seniors Ric Beardsley, Chad Smith and Hans Schmid aggressively thwarted UMass' comeback hopes as SU closed the game with four unanswered goals.

Sometimes I feel things are getting better for me.

Somedays I think they're worse.

Some mornings I look in the mirror and I think I look pretty good.

Other mornings I wonder which disease will finally kill me.

Some days, when I'm walking down the street I feel so light and perfect.

Other days I only want to do small, nearly invisible chores around my house, and never go outside again.

Other days I want to break out of the darkness and take accordion lessons.

Life is good.

Jinx lives on as Syracuse beats Minutemen

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Jay Robbins works against Syracuse's Roy Colsey in Saturday's 13–7 loss for UMass.

Sometime before the snow dissolved from Richard F. Garber field, and while the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was still practicing in Boyden Gymnasium, its schedule was released. Saturday's date with No. 2 Syracuse shone brightly before the ink was dry.

Twenty tries, two in 1994, with the last in Amherst two years ago, the No. 11 Minutemen still have just four wins in series history against the mighty Orangemen as the visitors won 13–7. Their return to "the pit," a term used by SU goaltender Alex Rosier (12 saves), marked the entrance exam to the sport's highest realm of achievement for coach Greg Cannella's new UMass regime.

Entering the anticipated clash of the Northeast titans, SU outscored opponents 49–22 in the first quarter. It was UMass, however, that sped to a 3–1 lead, courtesy of two Brendan Glass goals (Nos. 31 and 32), and a spirited Mike Valente strike, his first of three.

The Orangemen halted the downpour of Sunkists (a tradition from the Garber Field hill) with a pair goals to tie it 3–3 after one, but the Minutemen were ahead on all the cards after the first 15 minutes.

UMass has scored many pairs and trios of quick goals this season, and when SU's Casey Powell was flagged for an illegal stick between periods, the subsequent three–minute, non–releasable penalty tied the Orangemen's hands behind their backs and gave UMass a free shot at a knockout.

But Syracuse hopped right off the canvas and barely allowed UMass a shot, while Rob Kavovit scored a man–down goal at 2:20 of the second, which gave SU a 4–3 lead and proved to be the decisive tally.

"Coach just wanted us to keep our poise no matter what happened," Rosier said. "We kept our heads in it and finished strong."

Though Syracuse tacked on two more before halftime, giving it five straight scores, UMass cut the margin to two once in each of the last two quarters. But it didn't take Syracuse long to restore its advantage executing offensively without flaw despite enthusiastic crowd support.

"Toward the fourth quarter the crowd seemed to be that 12th player out there, and that kind of took over for them a little bit. I thought they were going to make a run but we held up," Rosier said.

Rosier appeared to have mistaken many of UMass' shots for oranges thrown by fans, for he made sweet, successive saves early in the third on blistering attacks before Buddy Hoffman scored UMass' first goal in over 23 minutes at 2:08 of the third, making it 6–4.

Back came Syracuse without a hint of frustration, doubling its lead to 8–4 while UMass couldn't convert key chances.

At 6:15 of the period, Rosier slowed Glass' shot but the ball still rolled toward the net but went just wide.

Eric Bailey hit Jeremy Murphy with a great feed at 9:34 and Murphy has Rosier out of the net, but Murphy's shot was off the mark. The senior midfielder, honored before the game along with classmates Vin Dello–Iacono, Tom Healy, Jared Lanning, Tom LoPresti and Valente,

Cuse' demonstrates why it's nation's top program

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team has made a commitment to becoming one of the top programs in the nation. Saturday the Minutemen got a good look at what they need to do to get there.

Saturday was another installment of "The Game," the bi–annual home matchup against perennial power Syracuse, who entered this year's contest ranked second nationally with a record of 9–2.

The game for Massachusetts was an opportunity to knock off the Orangemen for the first time since 1981. The hill on the far side of Richard F. Garber Field was filled with fans hoping to see the Minutemen bump Syracuse from its lofty perch. The environment would seem to be a hostile one for a visiting team ...

But it was just another game for Syracuse, which demonstrated time and again that it remains the best in the business. The Orangemen face this kind of adversity every time they play on the road.

"Every time we play, the opposing team is pumped up to play us," said midfielder Roy Colsey. "They play very well in the first quarter, but we can usually survive that, and cruise through the rest of the game."

Even simply winning isn't enough for the Orange. For the past 12 years, SU has made it to the NCAA Final Four amassing five championships along the way.

"We're out here to win," Colsey said. "If you put a high school team out there, we'll still play hard. We play to win, that's why we put our jerseys on."

For Massachusetts to win it needed everything to be perfect. With nagging injuries keeping attackman Jeremy Murphy and Tom LoPresti from at 100 percent, the home team was already in a hole.

For Syracuse, if one player is having a subpar game, the Orangemen's depth is such that other players can step up and take over. Against Massachusetts, Colsey, who is a two– time first team All–American, was almost invisible for most of the game. Syracuse didn't miss a beat though, as sophomore Rob Kavovit and freshman Casey Powell led the offense without Colsey.

Great teams know how to win. Every time UMass would move within striking distance, the Orangemen would respond to keep Massachusetts at bay.

"We'd close it to and they'd go back up by three," said Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella. "We couldn't break that two goal barrier."

The loss makes Massachusetts' two remaining games must–wins. The Minutemen take on Brown in Providence for the New England Championship on Wednesday. Traditionally the victor of that game receives an NCAA tournament bid. Both UMass and Brown are undefeated in the region entering the game. If the Minutemen can defeat the Bears, they must still get by Army to improve their chance of a bid.

Baseball locks up Atlantic 10 title

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Every team's goal at the beginning of the season is to improve from the one before. The University of Massachusetts baseball team, last season's Atlantic 10 regular season champions, ensured on Saturday that it would at least equal that feat.

Coach Mike Stone's squad, now 27–9 overall, 17–3 A–10, took a pair from league rival West Virginia in Morgantown to clinch a tie for first place in the conference. Even in the unlikely event of a tie, Massachusetts is still assured the number one seed in the post season tournament via their 2–1 season record against second place George Washington, the only team that could still tie them.

The Minuteman offense was the key in both games, as UMass and the Mountaineers (16–30, 9–11) battled it out in a pair of slugfests, 10–7 and 18–11.

In game one of the double header, Massachusetts took advantage of the wildness of West Virginia starter Mike Riley, who walked six batters in the first inning. Center fielder Nate Murphy got the only hit for the Minutemen in the frame, an RBI single, as UMass posted six first inning runs.

Minuteman starter Jay Murphy could not hold the lead, however, as the Mountaineers clawed their way back into the game, finally pulling even with the Minutemen at 7–7 in the bottom of the fourth. However, UMass went up for good in the top of the sixth when senior catcher Andy Pelis drove home the game winner with an RBI double.

Jay Murphy (6–2) was able to keep West Virginia off the board for the final two frames, and picked up the win with his seventh consecutive complete game effort. Massachusetts designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo collected three hits in the opener, while West Virginia's Chad Spencer (2–6) suffered the loss in relief.

In the second game, right fielder Bill Knight shattered another school record, smacking his 13th home-run of the season. Knight, already the school's career leader, broke the single season mark for homers, formerly held by Steve Allen and Drew Comeau, who both hit 12 dingers in 1988.

Despite Knight's home run and Ubaldo's spectacular performance at the plate (4–5, 1 HR, 5 RBI), the Minutemen still trailed 9–6 after five innings.

UMass sophomore hurler Chad Paronto, who had been brilliant all season, was roughed up early, and gave way to Adrian Suftic in the third. He was subsequently relieved by David Dart the next inning, as Stone attempted to quiet the Mountaineer bats.

Softball title game rained out

The championship game featured the UMass and UConn softball teams. Sound intriguing?

With the cross–state rivalry brewing in other sports, including softball, the Princeton Invitational championship game yesterday between the Minutewomen and the Huskies was foiled, as a cancellation was called due to rain.

The title game was just one that the Minutewomen played which was chock full of competition this past weekend. The tournament utilized round robin play to determine the seeds of the four teams for the bracket.

Despite going 0–3 in the round robin, and becoming the fourth and last seed in the four team tournament, Kelly Daut and the Minutewomen blanked Hofstra, 8–0 in the semifinal round, to advance to the championship.

With the victory, Daut chalked up her 21st win of the season, and fifth shutout, while allowing only three hits and striking out two in the mercy rule–resulting five innings of action. Chris Martens belted two homeruns, and had three across the board. The sophomore leftfielder scored three runs and drove in a few RBIs, as well. Kelly Buckley also hit a dinger for the Minutewomen. Freshman Kim Gutridge, after having her 25–game hitting streak snapped versus Princeton in the final game of the Round robin, bounced back, getting three hits in as many at– bats. In the Princeton game, the score was knotted at five in the fixth inning before the Tigers scored four runs. Daut recorded the loss, allowing 10 runs (two earned) on 12 hits.

On a positive note for the Minutewomen, the record book was re–written. Freshman Tracy Osier stole her 18th base of the season, setting a Massachusetts single–season record for thefts. Osier broke the record of 17 set by Cherie DellAnno in 1991. Sam Cardenas led the Minutewoman effort with a

FBI chases clues in Oklahoma bombing; death toll still rising

By Sally Streff Buzbee
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — The FBI released yet another sketch of the elusive John Doe 2 on Monday as agents chased clues in Arizona, Oklahoma and a Kansas lake near where the Oklahoma City bomb may have been mixed.

Outside the shaky ruins of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building, officials acknowledged the inevitable: It is time to give up the search for signs of life and switch to heavy machinery to remove bodies.

"I think they need to do whatever is necessary to ensure the safety of the rescue workers," said Jim Texter, whose wife, Victoria, was still missing. "Nobody wants to be responsible for more hurt."

The death toll reached 139, including 15 children. About 40 people were missing.

FBI agents also sought as "witnesses" two men who in recent months stayed at a cheap Arizona motel near one used by bombing suspect Timothy McVeigh. The two men may also have spent the night of the bombing in a motel 180 miles from Oklahoma City.

Outside Junction City, Kan., where the Ryder truck that carried the bomb was rented, agents searched the woods and sent divers into Geary State Fishing Lake looking for evidence that materials for the bomb were mixed nearby and that tools and equipment used in the mixing were thrown into the water.

The search was prompted by witness reports of a Ryder truck at the site after April 17, the day McVeigh allegedly rented his Ryder truck, said a senior federal official in Washington, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Candidate to visit UMass for campus forum next week

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

A candidate to fill what a high–ranking University of Massachusetts administrator called "a critical position" is tentatively planned to be present next week for an open– campus forum from the University community.

Pierre Allaire, current associate vice president for development at Clemson University in Clemson, S.C., applied for Vice Chancellor for University Advancement. He will be at Memorial Hall on May 11 from 9 to 10:30 a.m., according to Associate Chancellor Jim Leheny.

A 16–member search committee convened by Chancellor David K. Scott has been working closely with Barnes & Roche, a private recruiting firm based in Rosemont, Pa., Leheny said. Approximately 40 candidates are being considered.

Leheny said one responsibility for the candidate who fills the position is assembling "the largest fundraising program in the institution's history," also known as a capital campaign. Allaire, who has experience with capital campaigns, is the first of several candidates to be brought to campus.

The capital campaign seeks to raise $125 million in the next five years, according to Scott. Ronald D. Story, current interim vice chancellor for university advancement, has announced he will step down to join the history faculty in time for the fall semester.

The search committee will come to "a general consensus" when deciding upon several candidates who can do the job, Leheny said. Within the next six weeks they will recommend the list of candidates to the chancellor, who will then appoint his selection, ideally by July 1.

New Jewish affairs head promotes open dialogue

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

Although he is still without a desk or phone, the new Coordinator for Jewish Affairs came to the University of Massachusetts for his first day of work yesterday.

Larry Goldbaum was recently hired to fill the new position at the University. The position was created over a long time, according to Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, beginning with discussions with former Chancellor Richard O'Brien and continuing with current Chancellor David K. Scott.

Principle Goals

According to Goldbaum, the principle goal of his position "is to try to build better relations between Jews and other groups on campus."

Another goal, said Goldbaum, is "to find ways to help Jews and others learn to speak to each other more effectively about their often different interests and perspectives, and to look for ways to address some of the differences.

"My philosophy as to how to go about it is to promote open dialogue. To look for opportunities especially for groups with different points of view and different interests to talk to each other."

Goldbaum said that in order to help people speak together more effectively, people need to know other people's viewpoints, even though sometimes it is something that may be difficult to hear, or even offensive. He added that this might include controversial speakers, controversial articles or letters in the newspaper.

"I see controversy and conflict as opportunities to learn about each other," Goldbaum said.

Past experiences

Goldbaum has had experience in a similar type of job at UMass in 1987–1988.

He was one of several civility educators that were set up after the 1986 World Series when the Red Sox loss to the Mets caused racial problems in Southwest residential area.

He said the group of educators, working under housing services, was created to address racial issues, anti–Semitism, homophobia, and sexism.

Goldbaum said he worked on many programs during that year, and said some of his most effective ones included a speak–out on interracial and interreligious relationships, the conflict in the Middle

CPR day to stress instruction

The University of Massachusetts' Fire and First Aid Unit will be conducting its second annual UMassive CPR Day in the Campus Center basement on Sunday.

The event is designed to instruct as many people as possible in the technique of Cardio–Pulmonary Resuscitation (CPR) according to Tim Dorren, Director of the Fire and First Aid Unit.

More than 300 people were trained in CPR at last year's event and approximately 400 are expected this year, according to the Fire and First Aid Unit.

CPR is a life saving technique that trained people can use on a victim whose heart has stopped, and is also a requirement for some types of summer jobs, such as lifeguard, child care and coach, said Dorren.

According to the unit, people can register for the program at the Fire and First Aid Unit table on the Campus Center Concourse or by calling 545–1885.

The training will be held from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. and takes approximately four hours to complete. Enrollment in the program will cost five dollars, according to the unit.

The event is co–sponsored by the Environmental Health and Safety department, the American Red Cross, Auxiliary Services and the Lerdal company who will be supplying 60 training mannequins for the event, said Richard Mears, faculty advisor, Environmental Health and Safety.

Letter adds mystery, legacy to family history

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Approximately 50 years ago, United States and British troops liberated Dachau, the first Nazi concentration camp. Days later, U.S. Army Major James E. Hurley, a Holyoke native, wrote a letter to his mother and sister detailing the horrors of what he saw after arriving at the liberated camp.

Family members said this letter has added a sense of mystery and legacy to the Hurley family history.

Hurley was the uncle of Joanne McKay, senior clerk in the University of Massachusetts student employment office.

Her brother, James P. Hurley (named for their uncle) estimates the letter was written in the proximity of May 10, 1945. The younger Hurley is an archivist and historian and described himself as the "family genealogist."

Hurley described his uncle as a hero. He has been researching his life because he said "[The letter] is one of the great finds of the family history."

Intriguing family history

On the army major's deathbed, said his nephew, he mentioned something to his daughter that added more intrigue to the family history.

The major hinted at working on a mission with the French Underground to free a French foreign minister before the allies liberated Dachau.

This mission was secret and no details have been found yet, said the younger Hurley. He said what he knows so far is only what he has read into the situation.

The younger Hurley said he does not remember what the major told him about Dachau. He said his uncle never spoke about the mission, leading him to believe it was top–secret. Adding to this suspicion, Major Hurley's resume shows a conspicuous gap during April, May and June.

Hurley's daughter, now living in Hong Kong, has kept quiet about what she may know about her father. McKay said she seems to not realize the importance of sharing the details the Army major's life.

The letter was misplaced, said McKay, and was found last year when her family was cleaning out her aunt's apartment. The younger Hurley said finding the letter "is an interesting thing from our point of Course focuses on harassment

Peer educators to be trained to co–facilitate workshops

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

A three–credit course will be offered next semester to train future peer educators in issues around sexual harassment and how to co–facilitate workshops on campus.

Michael Einhorn, intern coordinator for the office of human relations, proposed the pilot peer education program on sexual harassment in the spring of 1994. This program lead to the idea of the course in the spring of 1994.

Course has evolved

The course initially was developed as a one credit course followed by a three credit seminar, said Grant Ingle, director of the office of human relations. He said it has been suggested that the one credit course is not necessary because the three credit seminar is effective and adequate to fulfill the needs of the University.

He said the University has "moral and legal obligations to do something" about sexual harassment because it "is a serious quality of life issue for female students."

Ingle said surveys have indicated that two–thirds of UMass women report having experienced "sexual harassment from their peers," but only half of them identify that behavior as sexual harassment.

Multi–level involvement

Einhorn said PESH is looking for involvement on three levels. On the base level, PESH is looking for general awareness of the program, so "students know we exist and are here to help them learn about sexual harassment and the policies involved."

Many peer educators will graduate this semester and new educators will have to take their places. The second half of the semester is designed focus on co–facilitating workshops, which will train the peer educators for next year.

Einhorn will also graduate this May, and will need a replacement for the position he created. He said the new intern should "not be afraid to work for their internship credits."

The course will be divided into two parts. The first half will be for one hour, twice a week, conducted like the workshops with "team building exercises," said Einhorn.

The second half of the course will fulfill the third level of the PESH goal by finding new peer educators. Students will present between five and seven workshops. After these workshops, PESH will be able to select qualified peer educators for next year.

Workshops

So far this semester, PESH has done 18 workshops and "educated over 500 students" said Einhorn. Included in that figure is the entire resident assistant staff, residence halls and fraternities.

The workshops aim, said Einhorn, to clearly define sexual harassment and offer ways to prevent or deal with it.

Einhorn said the peer educators define the difference between flirting, behavior which is "mutual, consensual and wanted," and harassment, behavior which is "unwanted, [shows a] lack respect and non–consensual." Peer educators will also talk about avoidance and intervention.

Einhorn said he would like to eventually see the program address all forms of harassment, such as racial, anti–Semitic and homophobic harassment.

Forum aims to educate GLBT about each other

By Wendy Darling

In an effort to promote dialogue between gays, lesbians and bisexuals, University of Massachusetts Health Education is sponsoring an "interactive conversation" on May 3.

"Double Jeopardy" is designed to be a "light, fun, community–building" event, said Paul Entis, Health Education outreach coordinator.

Even though gays, lesbians and bisexuals often operate in the same circles, Entis said, there are still many things that they do not know about each other.

"Double Jeopardy" will give these men and women the chance to ask each other questions that they have been too shy or embarrassed to ask, Entis said.

Anonymous questions will be taken by facilitators Entis and Debra Edelman, both from Health Education. The facilitators will then open the questions to the group.

If a gay or bisexual man has a question about lesbian sexual practices, for example, he can pose a question anonymously and listen as a lesbian peer answers it, Entis said.

Participants can ask questions on any topic, from sex to dating to politics to sexism.

"People can ask about whatever they've been wondering about," said Entis.

This is the first time Health Education has sponsored such a forum, said Entis, who hopes "Double Jeopardy" will be a success. He has been planning the forum since he began his position at Health Education early this year.

"Double Jeopardy" is sponsored by Health Education and scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. in the main lounge of Mary Lyon Residence Hall.

All seniors invited to reception

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

Contrary to rumors that only a select collection of graduating seniors were invited to he and his wife's reception, Chancellor David K. Scott has opened his Hillside residence to every senior receiving a degree later this month.

Of the 3,835 graduating seniors, some were apparently not invited, according to several students who telephoned the Collegian to complain they were neglected. The Reception for Seniors is scheduled for Thursday, May 18.

"That's worrying," Scott said. "Invitations should have gone out. We'll have to track down the slip-up. Absolutely all graduating seniors are invited."

According to Mary Spellicy, associate director of University relations, whose responsibility is to coordinate special events, the number of graduating seniors often fluctuates and students realize they may be held back.

Students in Humanities and Fine Arts, Engineering, University Without Walls, Public Health & Health Science, and Stockbridge are invited between 4 p.m. and 5:30 p.m., Spellicy said. Students from Food and Natural Resources, Education, Management and Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) are invited between 5:30 p.m. and 7 p.m.

Students from Social and Behavioral Science, Natural Science and Math, Nursing and Continuing Education are invited between 7 p.m. and 8:30 p.m., she said.

Students are asked to respond to Peg Wilson, Hillside housemaster, by May 9 at 545-4336. Special services and accommodations can be arranged by calling University Relations at 545-4200.

"It's not a formal occasion," Spellicy said. "But students should be a little more dressy than casual wear."

East, including how to differentiate between legitimate criticism of the policies of Israel and anti-Semitic criticism of Israel, and how Jews are portrayed in American films.

Goldbaum said he moved on because the position was more suited for graduate students, and that it amounted to a part time job.

He then worked as a Residence Director and later the director of student activities at Hampshire College. He also worked "informally" as an advisor to Jewish students for several years and did it formally for one year.

He has also been a staff writer for the Jewish Weekly News in Springfield for four years in the late '80s, and lectured in economics from 1984 to 1986 at Westfield State College and Holyoke Community College.

Goldbaum studied economics at the University of Chicago under Milton Friedman, whom he described as a "very conservative free market economist." Then he came to the "more radical economics department" at UMass for his graduate work.

Take two

Goldbaum said that having the job this time is different from the first in two respects.

"It's different for me personally, because this is now a full time profession which gives me more time to delve into these issues, which I didn't have before," he said. "There was no real status in the institution before. Now I can speak with the authority of vice-chancellor of student affairs. My direct supervisor is Jo–Anne Vanin, and then Marcie Williams. It's a much more interesting opportunity to do more meaningful and more in depth work."

On a more professional level, Goldbaum said that one of the key parts was to reach out to diverse constituencies, and getting to know as many people as possible from different communities, including students, staff and faculty.

Survivor seeks prevention rather than blame

By Amy Parodysz
Collegian Staff

Holocaust survivor and author of Seed of Sarah: Memoirs of a Survivor Judith Magyar Isaacson told her audience at the University of Massachusetts Thursday night to realize how lucky they are to be in Amherst, a place she sees as close to utopia.

In stark contrast to Amherst, Isaacson read a chapter from her book in which she described thousands of naked bald women being separated into three groups — straight ahead for slave labor, to the left for instant death, and to the right for mass rape. An S.S. officer parted the sea of women with his cane.

Isaacson and her aunt were directed to the right. Although the officer had a gun, the two young women deliberately walked toward the labor group to join Isaacson's mother.

"How easy it is to face death," read Isaacson, who told the audience she could almost feel the bullet that did not come.

The women ran from the officer and into another crowd of naked prisoners. When the episode was over, Isaacson's mother said, "I'm so happy, so happy, I've never been so happy in my whole life." All they wanted was to be together whether they lived or died, said Isaacson.

"They (the officers) probably didn't want to risk a commotion," said Isaacson, explaining why the officers didn't shoot.

Over 50 years after that incident, on Yom Hashoah — Holocaust Memorial Day — Isaacson was talking to a small audience at UMass. Amazingly, she was asking them to forgive.

Only 250 of the 5000 people from Isaacson's hometown of Kaposvar, Hungary survived the Holocaust. She lost all of her family, except her mother who is now in her 90s.

Isaacson said that in her first speech in 1976, the one that inspired her to write her book, a man asked her how she can smile so much.

A University employee at the speech on Wednesday also remarked on the author's "spirited joyfulness because of her ability to forgive."

Isaacson also told a story about how in 1977 she forgave the man who drove her and her family from Kaposvar to Auschwitz.

As part of the research for her memoirs, Isaacson went back to Hungary. She brought her daughter Ilona, named after her best friend who died in the gas chambers. They were taking the train to Lake Belaton where Isaacson's family took summers vacations when she was a girl. The only other passenger on the train listened to the Americans, and finally realized that Isaacson had been to Auschwitz.

He said he had a secret to share. "It was me who drove you," he said.

Isaacson asked him, "Did you know what was in those cattle cars?"

He said he did.

"Then why did you do it?" she asked.

"It was my route," he replied.

Isaacson asked a question she had thought about for decades: "Couldn't you have refused?"

The man thought for a moment, then said, "I figured someone else would surely take my place and my family would have starved for nothing."

Then he said, "I did wrong — will you forgive me?"

He had not yet told his family of the role he played in Auschwitz, and he wanted Isaacson's forgiveness before he told them.

"In the end, I forgave the old man ... but he haunts me still," said Isaacson.

She feels that there is a distinction between those who were coerced take part in the Holocaust, like the man who drove the train, and those who "acted" or did the coercing.

"I have learned to distinguish between the culprits and the enemies," she said.

"My generation isn't responsible," continued Isaacson, who was a teenager while at Auschwitz and will turn 70 this year. She said that there is no one left to blame now that most of those who were responsible are now dead.

Isaacson said she finds the will to forgive in the Old Testament book of Micah which says "to love justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God."

She is more concerned about the young Neo–Nazis and more interested in "prevention" than in finding view."

In 1923 the major graduated from Dartmouth as a linguist. He was fluent in both German and Russian.

His first marriage ended in divorce during the war. Soon after the war he married an Austrian actress, lived in Germany and pursued an acting career.

Major Hurley died about six years ago. McKay said that although he never spoke of the Holocaust to her, he was "highly affected" by what he saw.

Hurley wrote: "Dear Mother and Elizabeth,

"Since my last letter I've come across Germany and for the past couple of weeks I've been at Dachau–Allach.

"Perhaps you've heard or read about these places — notorious concentration places — (camps) but whatever you've read or seen would pale before the reality of the horrors that I've seen."

Hurley explained that he arrived at Dachau days after the Allies liberated the camp and how it had functioned during the war. He said the camp was "pitiful, horrible evidence" of Nazi brutality.

"The man power was furnished by slave labor which was so underfed that a majority of the ones still living among the 30,000 or more just human skeletons, even more tragic than the corpses.

"The corpses of those either starved or beaten [to] death numbered several thousand, all piled either in a room adjacent to the crematorium or outside the building," wrote James E. Hurley.

Major Hurley wrote about the many people murdered just before liberation, but could not be cremated because the crematorium had a daily capacity of 150 people per day. He described this as "a ghastly, almost unbelievable sight."

Hurley went into great detail relating how the death chamber functioned. He wrote that the people were lead into the room, stripped and ... the water turned on. The water made contact with a powder on the floor which liberated the lethal gas. The bodies were then cremated. No one knows yet the number killed in this fashion but it ran without doubt into thousands each month, plus the starvation cases."

Another murderous technique Hurley described was the medical experimentation. He wrote of thousands of men infected with malaria so "a quite famous specialist (Dr. Leonardo Conti)" could experiment with possible cures.

Hurley also wrote that "German medical students were permitted to perform needless operations and if the patient died — who cared."

Dachau was the first concentration camp to do medical experimentation. In addition to testing malaria drugs, testing was done on the effects of sudden increases and decreases of atmospheric pressure, the effects of freezing on warm-blooded creatures and the effects of drinking seawater without food.

McKay said that at the time when this was written, a man would normally protect his mother, but in this case her uncle was "so affected he had to write it out."

She said a portion of the letter that struck her was when Hurley wrote, "Believe me, nothing you will hear is overdone and one thing that impressed me was the carcasses of giant well nourished dogs" used to harass the prisoners.

The Army major ended his letter with a reflection of the personal impact the scene had on him.

"It justifies all the views I've ever had, too, and I wish the lesson could be driven home to everyone who ever has entertained ideas similar to Hitler's of racial superiority."

WOMEN making WAVES

Midwifery creating a new craze

In a University of Michigan study of women who received maternity care at the university hospital, 40 percent chose a certified nurse–midwife rather than an obstetrician– gynecologist to deliver their babies. The women who chose to have midwives deliver their babies cited reasons such as wanting to be cared for by a woman (more likely with midwives) and a need for more control over their own health and birth experience.

"Women may be attracted to nurse–midwives because of their reputations for supportive, comforting, holistic care," said Deborah J. Oakley, Ph.D., a professor of nursing and coauthor of the study.

Babies and alcohol don't mix

It is common knowledge that drinking during pregnancy can affect fetuses, but new research says drinking can keep a woman from getting pregnant in the first place.

Women who have as few as one drink each day run the risk of increasing their risk of endometriosis by 50 percent, and have a 30 percent higher risk of impaired ovulation.

Endometriosis, which is the growth of scar tissue outside the uterus, and impaired ovulation are both leading causes of infertility in women.

According to a recent report by the Harvard School of Public Health, heavier drinkers suffer even more.

"We suspect alcohol skews the levels of hormones, such as estrogen, which are linked to fertility," explained Dr. Frances Grodstein, who led the study.

Safe levels of alcohol have not yet been determined.

Northampton police sued

A Northampton woman's family is suing Northampton police over discarding the woman's suicide diary.

Last September, Anne Barrett, a 43–year–old writer, overdosed on the antidepressant drug Sinequar. Northampton police confiscated the only copy of an autobiographical manuscript soon to be marketed to publishing houses in New York. Its title: The Suicide Diaries.

The manuscript was more than 1 1/4 inches of typewritten pages. Barrett's version of a suicide note was brought to the medical examiner's office in Springfield for investigation. The Barrett family had been assured "Suicide Diaries" would be returned to them intact. Despite the promises made by the police and medical examiner, the copy was never returned to Anne Barrett's two sons or her siblings.

The only complete copy of what has been described as an unrelenting story of a woman who survived a previous suicide attempt, then slowly rebuilds her life, was tossed in the garbage by a technician for the medical examiner.

"Part of wanting the book and the final version," said Susan Barrett, Anne Barrett's sister, "is we've all hoped there might be something there that could help us make to make peace with this."

Although Susan Barrett and her late sister's agent have an earlier version of "Suicide Diaries," she and her family are suing the Northampton police for their reckless disregard for the anguish of the Barrett family and destroying the final copy. The final revisions of Anne Barrett's diary may have given the family the much needed insight to Anne Barrett's final moments.

Drinking the years away

If there is one thing everyone leaves college with, besides a diploma, it has to be a collection of a few drinking stories. When I look back at my four years at UMass, now oddly coming to a close, I find it somewhat scary to note the sticky and all out ridiculous situations alcohol has introduced me to. For some of my friends, I'd be safe in saying that their livers are graduating rather than themselves. College is a funny place; it's like a safe zone for lungs and livers, we seem to think they are invincible. Leaving college is like going into detox without the AA meetings.

E.C. Thomas

Any senior who isn't leaving behind a name for themselves at a local bar doesn't deserve to say they've graduated from UMass. Nothing in the world can remind you of your existence like having a bar where everyone knows your name. One of my friend's answering machine bluntly states: "We're not here — we're at the Cafe" — and more often than not it speaks the truth. Actually any time someone visits me, I always point out the bar, since it deserves the tourist's humble acknowledgement for the institution it has become.

What I find most humorous about the Cafe is the quarter- mile pathway between it and Brandywine. One would think this quarter mile is but a safe hop, skip and jump from one home to the other — however the stretch seems to have been dusted over with stars from the Twilight Zone, for it has been the scene of many drunken tales told late at night over the kitchen table. I know at least five people who decided the walk was too far and curled up for a nap in a ditch on the roadside.

One phoned me (after his roommate saw him stumbling home and picked him up) babbling something about losing his wallet.

"Where did you lose it?" I asked, stupidly thinking I'd get a coherent answer.

"In the field," he responded matter-of-factly.

"What field?" I asked.

"The field where the ditch was," he answered, distressed that I didn't know the field.

"What ditch — what are you talking about?" I laughed.

"The ditch where I left my wallet," He said impatiently. Then his roommate got on the phone and explained that he was covered with dirt and grass and had apparently taken a quick nap near some cows.

Another friend seemed to find the same comfy ditch to take his power nap. Only when he finally got up he saw a car parked with its keys in the ignition and decided it would be a good idea to drive it home. He was caught at Brandywine and charged with grand theft auto. "I was going to return it the next day. I just wanted to get home," he later explained with exasperation.

Of course run-ins with the law have always been a prime source for comedic material. After a few Heinekens my friend was pulled over for swerving his car. When the cop asked him why he was swerving he replied, "I was picking my nose." The cop let him go.

We do wacky things when we've had a few drinks. One of my friends mistook a TV in the living room as the toilet. Luckily "Melrose Place" wasn't on that night. A large group of my friends do shots out of a plastic lizard they've lovingly named "Larry." As an onlooker put it, "they'll wake up in the morning with strange thoughts like: Did I suck face with a lizard last night?" One of my housemates did a strip tease to Blondie in the middle of our living room. Watching one's housemate hump the floor under the lights of a disco ball sends one into an alternative and twisted reality.

The best story by far comes form a friend whose liver would suffer from thirst in my world. During his dorm days, he began drinking at around noon — not an unusual event for him. After a few hours, and wasted off his butt, he walked back to Southwest.

In front of his building was a police horse — only without a policeman. This was convenient situation for my friend, whose admiration for Roy Rogers had obviously reached a pivotal height of combustion. He jumped on the horse and began whooping and hollering yee-haws. The officer, whose horse my friend had confiscated for a little joy, came running out of the building screaming at him. All my friend did was grin. The cop let him go with a warning since the horse didn't seem to mind.

I don't know which is the scarier thought: a) entering the corporate world without the lunatic urges one has in college b) entering with them or c) having to tell your kids about it later.

History behind campus tensions

To the editor:

Recent tensions on campus among various groups, especially between the Blacks and the Jews, have destroyed the peaceful atmosphere of Academe which is so important to students whose main concerns are with studying and learning. Perhaps a look at some history might help.

Judaism and the Jewish identity, I am told, are based on the ancient Jewish laws and traditions which were finally, during the first few centuries after Jesus, put together in a collection called the "Talmud." Part of these writings, called "The Old Testament" or "The Jewish Testament" are well–known to the world at large. The story of Eve, the archetypal woman, blames her for the fall from paradise of the human race. This story, with its religious overtones, has been widely used, by Jews and some non–Jews, to blame women for all of the tragedies and sufferings of the human race. Thus, in the minds of many, traditional Judaism is completely offensive to all women.

In addition, the Southern Confederates, on several occasions, publicly invoked these ancient Jewish writings to morally justify their racist slavery and their heinous treatment of Blacks. The Mormon Church, which practiced racism against both the American Indians and the African Americans for almost a century, also used the "Jewish Testament" to justify its behavior. Neither American Indians nor African Americans were allowed to become members of the Mormon church. I was told to my face by a Mormon guide, in the 1950s in Utah: "There is a reason why the black man is black and the red man is red; it's all in the Bible." Well, it is not in the Christian testament. These ancient Jewish writings were also publicly invoked by the former President Botha of South Africa — whose government, at the time, was the most oppressive and racist government on Earth — to justify his treatment of Black Africans. In another direction, the Arabs are also treated badly in these Jewish writings. They are labeled as lower type beings than the Jews.

The above events are all part of historical record and can be checked out by anyone. Consequently, one can only conclude that traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race.

Support for GSS election candidates

To the editor:

As graduate students in physics and astronomy we would like to express our support for Prasad Venugopal in the upcoming Graduate Student Senate elections. We know Prasad as a colleague and as a very committed organizer for the graduate student concerns in our department. He has continuously worked for graduate student input in important departmental decisions and served as a GEO steward of our department from the time of the strike to the summer of 1993. During the academic year 1993/94 as one of the representatives from our department to the GSS and during his 1994/95 presidency, he has remained an active force in the department and a respected colleague among us. We know Prasad as an eloquent speaker and someone who deeply cares about the issues he addresses. He is a committed fighter for graduate student's rights and quality of life at UMass.

As members of this community we urge our fellow graduate students to vote for Prasad Venugopal and his team in the upcoming elections.

To the editor:

We are writing on behalf of the Economics Graduate Student Organization (EGSO) to indicate EGSO's impassioned support for the long overdue challenge to the current GSS leadership. Specifically, EGSO would like to formally endorse the slate represented by Shan Manikkalingam (President), Hari Subramanian (Vice President), Rachel Broudy (Executive Officer) and Deepika Marya (Treasurer). EGSO's endorsement is not only based on the personal confidence we have in the slate's abilities to lead (both Rachel Broudy and Shan Manikkalingam are graduate students in the economics department), but also on a strong sense that it's high time there was a change in the GSS agenda and strategy. Hard times lie ahead for the entire campus community, and we must work together.

It's going to take a lot of hard work and vision to spark the type of large scale collective response that the future of UMass is already calling for, and Shan, Hari, Rachel and Deepika are clearly up to the task. In sum, we need a strong, focused leadership that can pull together all graduate students while offering the best in political organizing and community activism.

Liberal culture

Throughout the semester and most of my academic career, I have written on the dangers, imbecilities and hypocritical ideologies which the radicals, claiming to represent people who have been colored by Anglo– American liberal ideologies, have articulated in multiple ways. To be sure, my intent has not been to discourage critical thinking, but rather to instigate critical thinking where there is a stagnant zest pool of liberal reformation.

I am not concerned with conservative arguments — for the most part they are self–defeating, ignorant and myopic in scope and have little to bare in reality. What has mostly concerned me is often masked and complex ideologies embodied in liberal arguments, more especially the arguments of the self–made radicals and critics of society. These arguments in effect legitimize the status quo, as well as a regressive ideological heap of elitist manure handlers.

With this in mind I want to touch on a few issues which exemplify these attitudes. To illustrate the structure of this essay I want to turn to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, a rag which although has the ability to voice critical thought, seeks to define what is normal by excluding diversity and difference. While I don't have the space, nor the linguistic freedom to express my dislike of the proto– scientists who run this rag, I do want to note its most important and detrimental contradiction, the Opinion/Editorial Page. This page encourages the submission of public opinions to the editor, yet uses the shield of the Collegian to reserve "the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length."

Clearly, the writers, not necessarily the members of the Collegian, are constrained to the little space available, mostly due to the economic resources of this institution. The issue is a much more dangerous one, namely the ability to "edit submissions for grammar, clarity," etc. Does editing take into account the writer? Whose grammar? Whose idea of clarity? For the most part editors do not consult the people they serve when they publish their altered pieces.

But more importantly is the possibility of other ways to write, such as Black English and Spanglish. These are not acceptable, according to the Anglo–American standards which we must all embrace because that is the only correct way, grammatically speaking. So much for freedom of expression! As for clarity, they follow the liberal definitions of clarity, not the author's intent. In the process they destroy peoples' diversity of opinions by negating the possibility that spoken language can be expressed in a written form. For these elites, for the most part journalist dreamers, there is only one way in which we can express our identity, the Anglo–American way.

Another example of this ideological heap of mental trash is Erin Barnes' article "The politics of language"(Collegian, March 30). In this waste of space, she assumes the role of the righteous protector of the linguistic rights of African–Americans, as if African– Americans could not

Second, the liberation of a few wealthy aristocrats does not excuse slavery, the multiple discriminations which liberal Anglo–Americans continue to exercise upon different peoples, nor the second–class citizenship of Puerto Ricans and other residents of the 2,000 something possessions of the United States around the world.

Charles R. Venator Santiago

assistance in the offices of the Collegian, namely Caleb Cochran. In his efforts at "Defending the culture of America" (Collegian, Friday, April 21), our Anglo–American intellectual defines culture, at least in light of the Oxford American Dictionary, as a "home" with "heroes" and with certain traditions, all exemplified in a quantitative petri–dish.

Needless to say, this land has never been the home of anyone but of the native nations who were conquered. To be sure, if homes were the categorical imperative for defining culture, I am sure that we would have very diverse and conflicting interpretations. Second, the liberation of a few wealthy aristocrats does not excuse slavery, the multiple discriminations which liberal Anglo–Americans continue to exercise upon different peoples, nor the second–class citizenship of Puerto Ricans and other residents of the 2,000 something possessions of the United States around the world. As for the heroes which Mr. Cochran cites, all I could say is that one person does not make a culture of many people. But then again, he is a victim of his own liberalism.

Finally, I want to note a confusion which afflicts many liberals in Anglo–America, and that is the fear of diversity and agreement. Invoking the need to tolerate disagreement, as a vehicle for progress, Evan Young continues to define the American social space as a conflict between political correctness — that is, between all the traditionally marginalized members of this society and those good old liberal Americans. In its stagnant and ironic attack upon diversity, as presented to us in his article "Respect due to opposing views," the author attacks the possibility of community, and more importantly, of agreeing to recognize and respect our differences as individuals born into communities and with particular identities.

All I can say to his ignorant fear of agreements is that we can come to an agreement as to what is acceptable and what is not acceptable to our communal living. In other words, I do despise Nazis and apartheid, and there is no argument which any person can develop to justify the oppression of one individual over another for political, religious or economic purposes. Then again, like most liberals content, the strategy is not to do anything and continue to defend the status quo while marginalizing those who don't fit the standard Anglo–American liberal definition of the ideal man and woman.

In sum I would like to contend that Anglo–American liberals, in the guise of being just and fair continue to perpetuate the same ideologies which have historically been used to legitimate genocide, slavery, the alienation of people and simply the oppression of difference and diversity. These arguments are more dangerous than outright oppression, for in an effort to offer us an alternative, they continue to perpetuate the chains which keep us at the bottom of the well.

Hindu RSO explores inner faith

Newly formed student group uses religion as teaching tool

By Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Correspondent

In hopes of creating an atmosphere to share with fellow members of their Hindu faith and to educate others at the University about the religion, students have recently formed the Hindu Students Organization (HSO) to address these concerns.

"The idea of the club is to find out who we are as human– beings," said Smir Ticku, President of HSO. It's a forum, according to the group, which until now was not provided by other organizations on campus for Hindus.

People come to college to learn about their identity ... that's what this does," said Meenakshi Marwaha, Vice– President of the organization.

HSO as different from other related groups

Although the University already has two seemingly–related Registered Student Organizations, the Indian Student Association (ISA) and the South Asian Club, the HSO founders feel that a group which exclusively concentrates on Hinduism is needed.

"India is a very diverse land," said Ticku. In efforts to represent all Indian students, ISA serves as more of a "social club," Marwaha added.

"When it's time for religion and praying, we go to the Hindu Student Organization," said Ticku. Because of their more secular nature, "it is not fair of us to expect the ISA" to focus on Hinduism.

Current members had considered the formation of HSO in the fall of 1994, but many worried that such a move to create a purely Hindu organization "might lead to more fragmentation of the Indian community on campus," said Ticku.

"This was not meant to divide," Ticku said. HSO "is not a separatist organization ... we are not here to define ourselves in a narrow manner."

We are a simple group trying to perform our religious ceremonies in a very simple manner," said Ticku. "We are all family."

In addition, HSO wishes to represent the world's third largest religion within the campus community in such a way which allows all those who are interested, regardless of their faith, to explore and educate themselves about Hinduism.

"Everyone is welcome," said Ticku. In their inaugural event, 25–30 students attended "The Birth of Lord Rama," many of which were there out of their own interest, he said.

This curiosity sits just fine with HSO members, who stress that they are not here solely to recruit converts, "We don't want to put our beliefs on somebody else," said Seema Gangatirkar, the group's secretary.

However, for students who are Hindu or who are seeking to explore its spiritual aspects, the organization enables those "to perform religious ceremonies in the company of other supportive members, all together as one big family," according to the HSO Constitution.

A break from politics as a central focus

The increased awareness which manifests itself through HSO not only encourages appreciation for Hinduism, but also helps to dispel or explain what HSO views as popular misconceptions toward aspects of their religion such as attitudes towards consuming meat and beliefs in reincarnation.

HSO emphasizes that it is not concerned with political interests, and wants to steer clear of the turmoil within India, the latter which stems from religious tension and fundamentalism between the country's many religious sects.

"We'd hate for this to turn into a political platform," said Ticku, for politics is "the last thing going through our minds ... we don't want to get into the nitty–gritty of back home."

Ticku asked, "In my experience, human beings are human beings. How different can it be?"

HSO holds weekly meetings on Fridays in the Campus Center. For further information, the organization may be reached at 549–6778.

The situation of identity for Latinos in this country is a very complicated subject that affects us more than we often realize. For example, when someone asks a Latino, born in this country, where he/she is from, they usually name the country where their parents came from. I have learned to realize that the whole issue is not as simple as it may appear.

The answers I have gotten regarding the reasons as to why this happens have been enlightening and the one that seems to make the most sense is that why should Latinos accept this country as theirs when the country rejects them. (It's almost like going to a party without having been invited, right? Well, not quite.) Children don't make the choice to be born here and by virtue of birth Latinos happen to be United States citizens, happen to be part of the American society and happen to have all the same rights as any other citizen.

My point is this: If we look at the historical events that have led this country to be what it is today, we can see that with the exception of the Native Americans and the Africans who were brought here as slaves, everyone else has come here as immigrants.

Now, this means that the only difference that should exist between a Latino baby being born here and an Irish or Jewish baby is the time and place where their ancestors entered the country. It may sound simplistic, and I know that there are other issues that make those two babies different. There is the major issue of skin color and the institutionalized racism that will affect the Latino baby and not the others, making the process of building identity even harder. But the fact of the matter is that until Latinos start claiming this country as theirs and start taking responsibility for the kind of future this country will provide for the next generations, we won't advance far in the political, economic or social ladders.

I am by no means saying that Latinos born here should take up the term "American" and ignore their roots. I am merely suggesting that there's nothing wrong with claiming ownership of something that is rightfully yours while still emphasizing the culture and country of origin. Have you ever wondered why other groups can say that they are Italian–American or German–American and Latinos deny that important geographic fact of being born here? (I often think of the implications this has on the children and on the way people think of themselves.)

When I think of my youngest sister, who was born here, I fear for the issues she will have to confront. She'll speak Spanish, eat rice and beans and know the reasons why her family had to come here, yet she will never be able to claim Nicaragua as her country. She will never have the experiences that other Nicaraguan children have, she'll suffer the same cultural shock when she visits for the first time as any other "American" and she will most definitely be considered a gringa by the Nicaraguans. Do you see my point? I am certain that she'll be a proud Latina, but at some point she will have to accept this country as hers.

When I say accept this country as yours I mean for people to demand the right to have access to the powers of economics and politics. I mean demanding the rights to educate our people, the right to learn our own history, the right to compete. We will not be able to advance far if we buy the story that Latinos are different, that Latinos are second–class citizens — and thus are not part of this country. Latinos can't afford to buy that lie any longer. Those that sell the lie are afraid of losing their power and therefore try to oppress the conscious ness of our people and to they impose laws such as Proposition 187 and "English only."

Just a piece of trivia, do you know how the term "Hispanic" came to be used as the official label? It was a political move during the early 1970s, when the Chicanos in the West coast and the Puerto Ricans in the East coast were actually questioning the systems and were raising consciousness in the communities. The term was developed to deny each group their own identity. So you see, we can't buy into the lie any longer. We must question everything from the label we're forced to use to the reasons why we feel excluded out of something that belongs to us.

It's a matter of raising social consciousness as to the consequences that this identity issue has on the prosperity of our community. I'll leave you with a simple question: who do you think benefits the most out of creating an environment of confusion and uncertainty as to one's own identity?

Commencement speaker offers views

Moise Tirado shares accounts of knowledge and experience

By Juan José Chacón Quirós
Collegian Staff

Collegian: What do you consider yourself?

Moise Tirado: I consider myself Haitian because that's where I was born, that's where I was raised, that's where my identity lies. Although, in this country I also consider myself African American, I see myself as part of the community: I fight the same fights, I struggle the same struggles, I'm dealt with the same way they're dealt with. If I don't open my mouth, people don't know where I'm from, for them I'm just a black guy walking around ...

In your opinion, what is the biggest struggle for African Americans on this campus?

There are a series of problems but one of the main problems is people that are dropping out because they don't have the funds to continue their education. That is a serious problem, because they are good students who can do the work and work very hard, yet end up having to drop out of school because they lack the funds.

How do you see Black–Jewish relations in this campus?

I don't think there's a problem between Black students and Jewish students. I think some people in the Jewish community and a few people in the Black community for popularity's sake want to create divisions. And that's irresponsible!

What about the tensions over Farrakhan and Tony Martin?

The Jewish community have a right to protest the same way we have a right to bring whomever we want to bring on campus. I don't necessarily agree with everything Farrakhan or Martin say. If the Jewish students don't agree and they want to protest, it's their right. The only problem that I have is when Black students on this campus are being told that you cannot bring such and such speaker. I think we all have to bring the speakers that we feel talk about the issues that concern us the most.

We are here to learn, to decide on our own what we believe in and what we don't believe in, and we ought to be put in contact with all the views. If David Duke came here, that should be fine. To find out if someone is wrong you must be able to first sit down and listen to them, that's what learning is all about.

What is your definition of multiculturalism?

I think it's a term people are struggling with and in struggling with it we have the tendency to centralize it in the European context, looking at other cultures. This society is Eurocentric. The approach should be changed. There's the tendency to sit up and look in the European perspective at these other cultures at an unequal standing. My family has Cuban, Canadian, Puerto Rican, Haitian and American ancestry, but we consider everyone at an equal footage; that has always been my concept of multiculturalism.

If you were granted the choice to fulfill a dream, which one would that be?

That would be to help change the course of the way Haiti has been going, to help change the politics of Haiti, to put it in a different road, in a different path. I think a lot of people have sacrificed their lives to do that. That's my dream, that's why I work for everyday, to be in the position that if I am called upon, not in the political sense, but if I am called to help create a new vision for the country, I may be able to do so. And even if I am not called, my dream is to be able to help create a new vision.

What has been the turning point in your life?

The turning point in my life was three years ago. There was the military coup in Haiti, the death of my cousin by the military, there were family things that forced me to almost drop out of school. It was one of the hardest times I have faced in my life. Had not been for the African American professors and the ALANA students on campus who gave me the courage to continue on, and also some White students that pushed me on to do my thing: if I didn't have this people, I wouldn't have made it, I would be out of school. I would like to send my respect and appreciation to all my friends and the ALANA community.

Changing political tides swerve rightly

"The ends of diversity are not served by people who look Black and think White," Derrick Bell once said. Indeed, student politics today often reflect influential trends in the broader society. And now we have our very own South Asian Clarence Thomas, our own "Black conservative."

Shyamala Ivatury

The "Black conservatives" at the national level, such as Clarence Thomas, Shelby Steele, Glen Loury, Thomas Sowell and Gary Franks have been noted for happily benefiting from progressive changes enacted by radical action and progressive politics underwritten by civil disobedience, and then turning against these politics and policies for personal advantage, mouthing the backlash language of White suburbia.

The struggles lead by Malcolm X, Martin Luther King, Rosa Parks, Angela Davis and other civil rights leaders changed race relations in the United States, allowing increased access to educational, housing, employment and other opportunities for the ALANA community.

Some beneficiaries of these changes have, in recent years, sought to feather their own nests by condemning the politics and policies of the civil rights movement. These "Uncle Toms" have sought their own personal advancement through the use of affirmative action and have later condemned it at the behest of their White backers.

Shan Manikkalingam, candidate for Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President, is running on just such a platform. His campaign is being run by the small White clique that traditionally controlled both GSS and the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO).

In the past two years, the latter organization has found itself increasingly at odds with the majority of graduate students. Seizing on the "White backlash rhetoric" against welfare, immigration, and affirmative action, this clique now seeks to piggyback on the national reaction to progressive change. The new trick is to adopt, as their spokesperson and proxy, an opportunistic immigrant from Sri Lanka.

Ironically, like so many of the Black neoconservatives, Shan is himself a direct beneficiary of the politics and policies that he condemns.

Last summer the GSS leadership confronted GEO on its mistreatment of a foreign student, and in the process ensured that GEO paid staff positions were opened up to a new level of diversity for foreign and ALANA students.

This infuriated that small incestuous clique in GEO, that, predictably, were utterly opposed to diversifying the staff. I well remember the struggles that summer in the GEO personnel committee as we forced GEO to diversify against the will of the clique.

Particularly difficult was the case of Shan himself, as he was dismissed by most of the committee members from this clique, the very people who are now championing him, as a "lazy, good–for–nothing womanizer." I was shocked at this slanderous attitude. The clique could produce no substantial arguments against diversification, only innuendo. As a result we were able to ensure that Shan and other foreign and ALANA students were hired.

The horror of the small GEO "dinosaur" group was predictably palpable and, reflecting well–known strategies of backlash, they began by questioning the qualifications of the new diverse staff. All year they seethed in the presence of the diverse staff.

Enter Shan, the puppet candidate. Shan's current campaign is being supported, and indeed run, by this small clique in GEO. Like the Black neoconservatives, Shan Manikkalingam has adopted the rhetoric of those in a position to benefit him and turned, on their behalf, against the brand of politics which allowed him access to their ranks in the first place.

Black conservatives and others have sought personal gain on the national level by mouthing the rhetoric and playing proxy for the White conservative powers–that–be. Shan has echoed their rhetoric of condemning "separatist" politics (i.e., support for equal access), "divisive and abrasive politics" (i.e., condemning individual racism), "race–baiting" (i.e., condemning institutional racism) and "grandstanding" (i.e., civil disobedience and protests).

In effect, he has accused the BSU, GSS, SGA leaders, Third World Caucus, LBGA, the Valley Woman's Voice and all those that fight these struggles on campus for their participation in protests, take–overs and criticisms of the administration.

His campaign rhetoric is virually indistinguishable from the recently–released report on UMass from the right–wing Massachusetts Association of Scholars (MAS).

It is clear that Shan is basing his campaign entirely on the fact that he isn't one of those people who protest racism, sexism, homophobia and fight for change on campus. It is sad to watch a fellow South Asian become the embodiment of "Black conservatism" on campus, but the reality is no other than this.

Shyamala Ivatury is a UMass graduate student.

Evaluating the festival of disaster

Lisa Chiu

Imagine that you are in your home on an August day. It's early in the morning — you could be eating breakfast, reading the paper, or still be asleep. Suddenly you hear an ear–shattering burst, you see blinding light and you feel extreme burning heat.

If you were lucky, you might have survived to see 200,000 of your fellow citizens die. If you were lucky, you would be left to suffer gaping wounds for the rest of your life. You might have, like one woman, not been able to remember what happened to you until 35 years after the event, or you might have, like one man, a white blood cell count of 2,000 compared to the 4,000 – 8,000 like that of a healthy human.

It was on August 6, 1945, at 8:15 a.m. when WWII bomber The Enola Gay dropped the first ever Atomic bomb on Hiroshima. 50 years ago this August, the United States wiped out over 200,000 civilians.

What the government will tell you is that it was a necessity. They say that the decision to drop the bomb would have prevented even more deaths. What they won't say is that, in reality, the atom bombings were not needed. Just months before Hiroshima, the United States had already decimated Japanese shipping, rail transport and industrial production in a series of brutal air attacks, and in these firebombings on Tokyo, the United States was able to kill more people in one night than all that died in Hiroshima.

It is known that Japan had sent and continued to send messages of surrender as early as May 1945 to which the United States did not respond. Just three days after Hiroshima, the ensuing on Nagasaki and Hiroshima, the coming on Nagasaki and the U.S. invasion on Japanese islands was needed.

The events in the 1945 bombings are horrendous, but the events that have occurred this past year in Washington D.C. are even more grotesquely sickening.

This past year, a faction comprised of the Legion of Veterans and a group of 80 members of Congress censored and ultimately pulled an exhibit by the Smithsonian Institute's National Air and Space Museum. This faction pressured the director of the Institution, William Harwit, to change an exhibit commemorating the 50th anniversary of the bombings on Hiroshima and Nagasaki a total of five times.

To them the exhibit was biased and antimilitary. Originally planned to be on display was the bomber, The Enola Gay, 600 pages of text showing historical debate over the bombings, a section showing Hiroshima as the beginning of the nuclear arms race, and a burned lunchbox with a shredded school uniform. The faction erased away all of these, turning the exhibit that had begun as a model of self– examination into a display of a part of the bomber's fuselage, basically, a hunk of metal.

Still not content, they told Harwit that a statement should be included saying that had the bombings not occurred, 250,000 people would have died in the ongoing conflict. Harwit came up with a more realistic number of 61,000 deaths, calculated by Stanford professor B. Bernstein. Harwit refused on the last demand to change the numbers, causing the force from outside the museum to end the exhibit.

In essence, what these veterans and Congress members have done is to wipe out all accounts of the suffering and deaths of the people of Hiroshima. By continuing to cover up and create lies, this faction intentionally and successfully made the victims in the bombings completely worthless. In pulling the exhibit they endorsed the United States to forget the horrendous events that we as a nation committed to the people of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The U.S. Postal Service recently created a set of ten commemorative stamps for the anniversary of the war's end. One stamp bears the image of the Hiroshima mushroom cloud, with a caption that reads "Atomic bombs hasten war's end, August 1945." The stamp has since been changed to a portrait of Harry Truman, after concerns were voiced.

Hiroshi Harada, Director of the Hiroshima Peace Museum, said, "I cannot understand why they would make a stamp to commemorate a horrible instance of human suffering."

I don't know what you all will be doing this August 6. I don't know where you all will be at 8:15 in the morning, when 50 years ago, 200,000 lay dead and mutilated, but I can almost guarantee you that the faction that ended the exhibit and the designers of the original Hiroshima stamp will be fast asleep, dreaming of the glory days, when they showed those "Japs" just what the U.S. was made of.

A few words of wisdom

Silence.
And in this darkness,
I am eternal.
In between,
Red and black.
Tradition and modern society.
Living in my peoples' post–apocalyptic nightmare.
A reality unbelievable
yet all too real.
How hard has it been ...
will it be?
Lonely?
Yes, when walking the obstacle–laden path of mixed bloods.
Don't know where I've been,
and still cry for my people.
Tears of blood stain the skies.
Silence.
And in this darkness,
I am eternal.

Like some forgotten river, a waterfall of words
Cascades over my mind;
Drowning my thoughts and pushing me down.
Ignorance runs rampant as intelligence
Fights to swim upstream to spawn.

I know too many hypocrites,
and that can never be a good thing.
People who use prejudice selectively,
Smile in your face and then dehumanize you and
Your people the minute you're gone.
These words of oppression swim
Through my mind.
I wish I could stop the pain, stop the hate.
It washes over me and I am swept away
In the currents.
Temporarily becoming like those I despise,
Using their tactics of slander and ignorance,
I am saved by my feelings and again I stand fast.

Like some forgotten river, a waterfall of words
Cascades over my mind;
Drowning my thoughts and pushing me down.

Sonic Youth shine at AC concert

SONIC YOUTH
DINOSAUR JR.
Amherst College
April 28

This past Friday night at Amherst College's Le Frak gym, alternative rock legends Sonic Youth and Dinosaur Jr. displayed the two very different approaches that a band can take toward live shows once they achieve superstar status.

Characteristically, Sonic Youth's set was the more experimental of the two; the band used it as a forum to try out new material. Dinosaur Jr., on the other hand, turned out a predictably dull set of "greatest hits."

No doubt owing to J Mascis and company's home-town– hero status, Sonic Youth took the stage first, opening with a handful of songs from their most recent album, Experimental Jet Set, Trash and No Star. The self-confidence that can only come from being on the cutting edge of music for 15 years was more than apparent as the band glided effortlessly through "Self–Obsessed and Sexee" and "Bull in the Heather."

After a brief but distortion–drenched rendition of "Starfield Road," the band settled in for a stretch of unreleased material, debuting a half dozen brand new songs in all.

"Jim Carroll asked us to write a song for him for his movie [The Basketball Diaries], but the

Superb performances highlight controversial film

PRIEST
Directed by Antonia Bird with Linus Roache, Tom Wilkenson
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

The buzz circulating about Priest has certainly piqued the interest of both liberal and conservative audiences, particularly the gay community and members of the Catholic church. The problem with this movie, however, is the near impossibility of discerning where the controversy ends and a true, thought–provoking plot begins. It appears that the director herself is incapable of this as well.

While it is hard to tell where Antonia Bird's sincerities lie in her directorial debut, Priest has some wonderful acting and an original (and timely) storyline. The provocatively "sinful" movie which challenges Roman Catholic traditions has been causing a stir all over the country, but go see this movie before you believe all of the hype.

The first scandalous issue the film deals with is Catholic priests breaking their vow of celibacy. A new young priest, Father Greg Pilkington, is sent to a poor Irish parish in Liverpool to replace an older priest who went insane (he rams a giant crucifix through the pane glass widows of the bishop's house).

Father Greg learns the day he moves in that the pastor, Father Matthew Thomas, is having an affair with the live-in housekeeper (Cathy Tyson). Father Matthew is a jovial man who gets drunk and does karoake in a local tavern. He never sermons to his parishioners what they do not want to hear and he is well-loved, if not respected. Father Greg is extremely disapproving, but we soon learn that he is not one to judge.

One steamy night Father Greg removes his white collar, hangs up his black suit, and reaches for his black leather jacket. He knowingly watches himself in the mirror as his appearance and personality transforms. He sneaks out to a local gay bar, knocks back a few drinks, and meets a man. He and this mysterious fellow wind up in bed, and an erotic love affair begins.

Father Greg's clandestine affair hardly seems to bother his conscience, and he remains sure of his faith and religious calling throughout. His secret life begins to interfere with his priesthood when his lover comes to receive communion from him, and he turns him away.

The problem that Father Greg grapples with much more than breaking his vow of celibacy is the third controversial issue of the film. While hearing confession, a young schoolgirl confides in him that her father is sexually abusing her. The anguish the father is causing the girl is tangible, and manifested in seizures she has during class. Father Greg's hands are tied, and he has to suffer through hearing the father rationalize why he commits incest.

The graphically portrayed incest subplot is disturbing, but the most developed in the film. While the personal issues of the priests are never fully dealt with, this plot actually offers a resolution as the events culminate in an emotional finale. Credible performances are given by the father (Robert Pugh) and the daughter (Christine Tremarco) and the filming is key, especially in a climatic scene where Father Greg prays to God, begging him to help the girl.

The portrayal of the church is the issue that has protestors of the film in a rage. Father Greg is distraught much more over whether or not to break his vow of confidentiality to save the girl than the vow of celibacy that he is already breaking.

To quote one parishioner attacking Father Greg: "you are making a laughing stock of my faith!" Well, it would appear that this movie is too, with its sarcasm–laden sermons and rebellious theme. Coupled with Bird's faithful devotion to controversy and inability to deal with the complex issues raised, it is tough to draw the line between offensive and enlightening. Bird's direction detracts from the plot in that she focuses primarily on raising controversial questions rather than answering them.

One thing certain is that the positive aspects of Priest outweigh the negative. Superb performances by virtual no– names push this movie over the top. The emotions are real in this film, and the acting gutsy. The poignant ending does more than make the audience shed a few tears.

When you leave the movie theater, people will still be talking about Priest. This Connick will get funky with new band

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Harry Connick Jr. will entertain the masses tonight at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall at 8 p.m. with a new brand of funkiness. When he first broke on the music scene he was dubbed the new Frank Sinatra. He could play the piano and croon along with the best of them and everyone went wild.

"I think it's a great compliment to be compared to Sinatra," said Connick. "We have a lot of things in common. But I've been playing this type of music long before I even knew who he was."

Music has always been a part of Connicks's life. As a child his parents, both lawyers, also co–owned a record store and encouraged their son's interest in music.

According to Connick, his early influences include Alvin Gardner and Louis Armstrong. If he wasn't doing jazz music then he would be playing the New Orleans' based funk that he has dabbled in on his most recent album, She. When asked if his new form of music has been accepted by his fans Connick responded, "I guess so. I mean, judging from shows and record sales they seem to like it a lot."

One could say the New Orleans' native's career began as early as age three, when he first touched a keyboard. By age six he was able to play at his father's swearing-in ceremony as city district attorney. At age 10 he made his recording debut with a local New Orleans band.

Connick moved to New York City at 18 to study music at Hunter College and later the Manhattan School of Music. There, he recorded his self–titled debut with Columbia records. His second album, 20 was recorded with a jazz trio and launched him into the public eye. Connick became known for his snappy swing style that won old and young alike.

With his new album She, however, Connick veers away from the conventional and entertaining into the land the land of funk. "The type of music I play now I'd call party music. It's a mixture of funk and rock 'n' roll," said Connick. "Kind of like the music you hear at Mardi Gras."

Although he was unable to attend the festivities in New Orleans this year, he is greatly inspired by the atmosphere and flavor of the event. This is made apparent in the album's first release "(I Could Only) Whisper Your Name." This song was featured in the movie The Mask with Jim Carrey, whom Connick lauds as a "brilliant comedian."

The Mask isn't the only movie soundtrack he has contributed to. In 1989 Connick was snapped up by Rob Reiner to record several songs for When Harry Met Sally... The success of the film led to Connick's first platinum album and the first time he recorded with a big band. Another hit — "Promise You'll Remember" for The Godfather Part III earned him both a Golden Globe and Oscar nomination in 1991.

The musician has also dabbled in acting which he thinks is "fun." He made his acting debut in Memphis Belle in 1990. In 1991 he returned to the big screen in Jodi Foster's Little Man Tate. There are still more film projects in the works.

"I'm in a movie called Copy Cat which is coming out this Fall with Holly Hunter and Sigourney Weaver. I play a murderer," said Connick. "It wasn't really that hard. My father is a district attorney in New Orleans and he knows about those types of people. So I just asked him some questions on how they would act. Yeah, it was fun."

Because of Connick's rigorous college tour, he hasn't had much time partake in many of the simpler pleasures of life.

"If I wasn't performing now I'd be sleeping," said Connick. "On the road it's really difficult to catch up on sleep. But to answer your question, if I wasn't performing I'd probably be teaching music," he amended. "Although it does take a lot of patience, and I don't have a lot of it — it's something I would have to work on."

Connick doesn't think his star status would impede his teaching ability and believes he would have a lot to offer his would be students just from his "personal experiences."

The performer has recently married former Victoria's Secret model and life–long love Jill Goodacre. Despite the chaotic and often demanding touring schedule, Connick still manages to spend a lot of time with her.

"This college tour is pretty rigorous, but we still manage to spend a lot of time together. And if I'm touring overseas she'll go with me," Connick said.

Despite all his hard work and success Connick is still the romantic that he portrayed in his earlier material. When asked what the one thing he was sure of in his life, Connick replied with little hesitation, "my wife."

Harry Connick Jr. will be playing at John M. Greene Hall at Smith College tonight. Contact the Northampton Box Office at 586–8686 for more information.

Digable Planets played at rousing set at Pearl Street this Sunday.

Planets impress with Pearl St. show

DIGABLE PLANETS
Pearl Street
April 30

Only recently have hip–hop bands been able to match their studio sound on stage, and the ones who are doing it well are bringing live bands on tour with them.

Digable Planets proved they were one of these bands when they played to an enthusiastic Pearl Street crowd Sunday night, bringing a full band that included a trumpet player a saxophone player, a bassist, a keyboard player, a drummer and a DJ.

Playing mostly from their new album Blowout Comb, the Brooklyn–based trio did a good job of taking control of the crowd. During a battle of funkiness, Ladybug and Bronx native DJ Jazzy Joyce led the left side of the crowd against the right side, cheered on by freestyling Butterfly and Doodlebug.

The band, led by drummer and musical director Steve Williams, was talented, and let the trio do their own thing on stage. Bass player Carl Carter delivered an engaging bass solo, and then brought out an acoustic upright bass during the trio's single "Rebirth of Slick (Cool Like Dat)," off their 1993 debut album Reachin' (a New Refutation of Time and Space).

Trumpet player Gerald Brezel and saxophone player Chris Herbert, who also played flute on several songs, helped recreate the group's jazzy sound on stage.

During a performance of "Nickel Bags," a song from Reachin', the rappers truly gelled with their backing band. Keyboard player John Adams, dubbed "the president of funk," and guitar player Abdul Djori were not the flashiest members of the band, but nonetheless helped provide a smooth, jazzy sound.

THE CURE
Directed by Peter Horton with Brad Renfro, Joseph Mazello
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Hollywood isn't playing fair on this one. A young, innocent, 11–year old boy acquires HIV through a blood transfusion. The neighborhood children taunt him and the adults want to quarantine him. And if you don't shed a tear at this one, you are an unfeeling clod.

"thirtysomething" heartthrob Peter Horton steps behind the camera and directs this movie with the same dripping sensitivity his yuppie character was notorious for. Perhaps it is Horton's touch that gives this film a made–for–TV melodrama feeling. Or maybe it is the plot, which conjures up all sorts of memories of Ryan White's tragic story.

Either way, it's 1995, and the American audience is more than ready for a truly realistic and graphic portrayal of AIDS. Joseph Mazzello (of Jurassic Park fame) delivers a sweet performance as AIDS–inflicted boy Dexter, but it doesn't quite pack that dramatic punch of pathos lugubrious audiences yearn for.

Brad Renfro's performance is much more genuine than Mazzello's. Renfro plays the next–door neighbor latchkey kid who initially resents Dexter, calls him "faggot" and then winds up becoming close friends with him. The two boys devote their summer to finding a cure to save Dexter.

Take the handful of swears out of The Cure and this could be an educational film for schoolchildren. You can bring along some tissues for the required teary eyes, but don't expect to go to this movie for a good cry. C

Hollywood people sent it back. They said it sucked," Thurston Moore announced proudly before launching into a song that showed how little taste these "Hollywood people" must have in music. Other impressive new songs included "Junkie's Promise" and an eerie, almost hypnotic, Lee Renaldo tune dedicated "to J."

For the most part, the new material was dark and cerebral, more like the band's earlier albums than the fast, punk– driven style that has characterized much of their work in the '90s. However, there was no shortage of sheer noise, either. In fact, amidst all the electronic roar and clatter, it was easy to overlook the fact that they played much of the set without a bass; Kim Gordon played third guitar on many of the new songs.

When Gordon did finally pick up the bass, it was for the band's last song of the night, "Candle" off of their legendary Daydream Nation LP. The band delivered this timeless classic with such flawless musicianship and over–the–top enthusiasm that it seemed like a reward for the audience's patience throughout the uncharted territory that made up the rest of the set. When the band finally left the stage, however, there were few complaints about the new material and plenty of wishes that they could have played longer.

Saying that Sonic Youth is a tough act to follow is like saying that J. Mascis is a little on the introverted side. Regardless, whether it was because of their unfortunate placement on the bill, an incompetent sound man, or the fact that Mascis was feeling "under the weather," Dinosaur Jr.'s performance proved to be excruciatingly dull at best.

After a while, their over–distorted, bass–heavy sound became a monotonous drone in which all vocals and even melody were drowned out. The band (and the audience) also suffered from Mascis' penitent for frequent, long–winded guitar solos, making him seem like the Eddie Van Halen of the Alternative Nation.

Their song selection was also highly predictable — how many times can they close out a show with "Freak Scene," anyway? Unfortunately, all indications are that Mascis and company seem to be turning into their namesake — the bloated dinosaurs of a once innovative genre.

Regular umpires to return to the field

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball owners, who still haven't settled with their players, agreed to a five-year deal with umpires Monday and ended their 120 day lockout.

The regular umpires will return to the field Wednesday. The agreement means the end of picket lines outside stadiums and removes the prospect of a showdown May 9, when replacement umpires would no longer be allowed to work in Toronto.

"Their scab strategy was exposed for what it was — a fraud," umpires union head Richie Phillips said. "These people were incapable of officiating at a major league level."

The regular umpires get raises this year ranging from 25 percent to 37.5 percent. Because the contract is front-loaded and pay will remain the same during the length of the agreement, management calculated the increase at 16 percent over the five years.

The deal was agreed to at 12:30 a.m. Monday and approved 9-0 by the umpires' board at about 6:30 a.m. Umpires union president Jerry Crawford said a majority of umpires already had said it would vote to ratify the deal.

Replacement umpires will wind up having worked the first eight days of the season and, barring rainouts, the first 86 games. The regular umpires will be paid 100 percent of their 1995 salaries. "Major league baseball is now finally safe at home," NL president Len Coleman said.

A planned demonstration by regular umpires in Baltimore on Monday was canceled. Players, who struck for 232 days before a federal judge ordered owners to follow the rules of their expired deal, were relieved the regular umpires are returning.

"Everything will be back to normal," Orioles catcher Chris Hoiles said.

Under the deal, rookie umpires, all with at least one year of major league service from their time as vacation fill-ins, will be guaranteed $100,000, up from $75,000 under the expired four-year deal.

Thirty-year veterans, guaranteed $206,000 under the old deal, can make up to $282,500 under the new contract. The only umpire at the top level is Harry Wendelstedt of the NL.

"Having labor peace with the umpires for the next five years is a welcome and necessary development," acting commissioner Bud Selig said.

Thousands order tickets for Olympics

By Marc Rice
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Thousands of people, some lining up before dawn, turned out Monday to be among the first to order tickets to the 1996 Summer Olympics.

"I figure it's a once-in-a-lifetime chance," said Gabe Owens, a student at Emory University who was among about 150 people standing in line at a suburban Atlanta grocery when booklets containing ticket order forms were released at 6 a.m.

"They told me a lot of people were going to be here, and I didn't want to miss out," he said.

Lines ranging from 25 people to 400 were reported at Atlanta area Kroger and Home Depot stores, where the first brochures were distributed. A total of about 36 million brochures were to be distributed at more than 15,000 outlets across the country, including Home Depots and groceries that sell Coca-Cola, on Monday.

However, for some would-be ticket buyers it may be a few days before they get a chance to order tickets. Spot checks across the country found that some stores listed as distribution points in Oregon, Indiana, Kentucky and North Carolina did not have the brochures available.

Mark Pygot, manager of a Food Lion in Raleigh, N.C., said he hoped to receive the booklets from a Coke bottler later this week. "We've been getting many calls for them. It's been generating a lot of excitement," he said.

Mark Preisinger, a spokesman for The Coca-Cola Co. in Atlanta, said there were a few areas that were not yet distributing the brochures but they were "few and far between."

"In general, May 1 is the date the brochures are available nationwide," he said. "There will be cases, like with any promotion, and this one is on a grand scale, where the retailer and the bottler are going to decide they're not available for a week."

In Louisville, Ky., for example, Coca-Cola is running a major promotion tied to Saturday's Kentucky Derby. Stores there won't put up the Olympic displays until that program is completed, Preisinger said.

fielder Marquis Grissom, they could have received a lot worse than Roberto Kelly, an established player one step away from stardom, and big prospect Tony Tarasco as well.

The 'Spos are still my favorite to finish in second place behind the Braves. They should have enough to hold off depleted Philly, the young Mets, and a pretty poor Marlin team.

• Speaking of pennant races, don't hand the Yankees the flag just yet. They'll get some tough competition from Toronto and the Orioles, and dealing with the lineups of Boston and Detroit on a regular basis will not be an easy task for pitchers.

Plus, for some reason, the baseball gods don't take kindly to teams that try to buy the pennant.

"Okay, Montreal, let's see...We'll give you $2 million and some guy that might be good ten years from now for the best closer in the game, OK?"

• If you can't keep track of all the players that changed teams this year, don't worry, you are not alone. Over 100 players changed their uniforms during the abbreviated two weeks before spring training camps opened, and we're all having our problems keeping track of who went where.

I still think Gary Gaetti and Greg Gagne make up the left side of the infield in Minnesota, not Kansas City.

• While the White Sox have suffered from key off season losses, the Indians are still led by the trio of Kenny Lofton, Albert Belle, and Carlos Baerga. With the best leadoff hitter in the game, one of the league's most feared power hitters, and a do-it-all infielder, don't scoff at the words "Cleveland" and "World Series" in the same sentence.

Brian Perillo is a Collegian staff member.

and things would work out."

While working together at a camp last summer, Kelly expressed great desire to play for Cannella, though he was yet to be hired.

"I like your style," Kelly told Cannella.

Kelly has been one of UMass' most consistent performers, erasing doubts of his conditioning and attitude to the game.

"Physically, I feel I'm back there [to the level I was at in 1993]. But where I was lacking two years ago was the mental aspect. I was a little out of control, I was a little selfish on the field, and I didn't really depend too much on my teammates," Kelly said. "Plus I've established a relationship with Jared Lanning, Vinny [Dello-Iacono], [Tom] LoPresti.

"Two years ago I would say, 'Oh, I'm better than these guys. I should be this, I should be that.' All that is just nothing. They're great players, together we're a great team. It's not just Dennis Kelly and the others, it's everyone."

Kelly hasn't abandoned his emotional peaks and valleys, which dotted last Saturday's gripping loss to Syracuse. When UMass pulled within two goals of the Orangemen, Kelly urged the large portion of the 4,176 in attendance sitting on the Richard F. Garber Field hill to make some noise. They eagerly responded, and Kelly kept waving.

Following the 13-7 loss, a tearful Kelly had to be consoled by assistant/midfield coach Jim Strub, perhaps because Kelly didn't think he did his best work on SU's MacArthur Award frontrunner Roy Colsey.

"I've always played emotionally," Kelly said. "I've always given 110 percent in everything I did. I think it's just sort of my style. If I don't feel that I'm into it, I feel I'm letting the team down. I love these close games, even if the coaches don't."

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

Dani Ortega, the second pitcher in the Massachusetts softball rotation, is currently sporting an 11–9 record heading into today's doubleheader against Boston College.

Second baseman Muchie Dagliere has proven to be the ideal No. 2 hitter for Massachusetts in only his first season as a Minuteman. The freshman is fifth on Massachusetts in hitting (.316), fourth in total hits (37), and holds the distinct honor of being the only Minuteman to hit the William D. Mullins Center practice rink on a fly, when he launched his first career home run.

weekend, as did Kelly Daut, who according to Sortino, was "as tough as nails."

The Eagles will be coming into the doubleheader with a respectable 28–19 overall record, 13–7 in the tough Big East conference, where they split a doubleheader with Connecticut earlier in the year.

Last year, the Minutewomen split their doubleheader against the Eagles with both teams garnering 3–0 shutout victories.

"From what I've heard, they are legitimate. They are a good team," Sortino said. "We'll have to come ready to play."

The Eagles have seven everyday players hitting over .300, with first baseman Kelly Cross leading the way batting .333 (42–for–126). Cross is also tied for third on the team in runs batted in with 19.

Sue Corwin is right behind Cross with a .324 average (47– for–145) and leads the team in RBIs (26) and doubles (11). Outfielder Julie Obear (.312) leads the team in hits (48) and triples (5).

The Eagles pitching staff boasts two starters with earned run averages under two. Liz Walker has a team–best ERA of 1.33 while Alexis Beckman has a 1.60 ERA. Walker has a 15–8 record (five shutouts) with 67 strikeouts and 18 walks in 189 and one–third innings pitched, while Beckman has a 13–11 record and four shutouts in 153 innings pitched. Beckman is also good at the plate batting .304 with 41 hits, eight doubles, two triples, two home runs and 19 RBIs.

Stacy Ambrose (1.75 ERA in five appearances), Melissa Maikos (2.25 ERA in seven appearances) and Crista Corpening could all see time in relief for BC.

righthander Scott Barnsby (3–2, 3.00 ERA) will throw for Massachusetts.

The Minutemen have only lost once on their home diamond this season, that defeat coming a week ago today against Maine, one of UVM's conference rivals.

Dugout Notes: Pelis had four RBIs on Sunday, upping his season total to 29, tied for second on the team with Nate Murphy. He is now batting .333 with six HRs ...

Your Horoscope

By Jeane Dixon

I hang out with different groups of friends at different times.

For years I've had this one group. But we don't know each other's last names.

We're really good friends... go to places, parties, sports,...

we sing, "Happy birthday to you, dear Connie...."

Connie who? Who cares!

I know another group, and they don't even know each other's first names. No kidding.

"Hey you, ... Hey, ... You! Yo babe, ... you, ... yeah you.

Hey

Hey you!

Now, that's real friendship.

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Good news and/or love from a friend you have been concerned about. See through a romantic partner's false promises. A child is about to enter your life. Do not worry. You can handle it!

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): Plans for business travel unfold smoothly. Enthusiasm continues to build over a new employment opportunity. A positive attitude will make a partnership become more harmonious.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): Extra reserves of energy will carry you through this busy day in grand style Guard against acting overbearing. A new political involvement could later the course of your life.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): A former love could re-enter your life A relative or friend may decide to relocate If invited to join this person, weigh your options carefully A nurturing approach is vital when dealing with children.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22): Fruitful discussions or low-key negotiations could lead to the signing of an important contract. Financial gains are realized by means of a loan or insurance settlement. An opportunity to travel may account for your high spirits.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22): Show appreciation for the backing you receive. Extra effort is necessary to keep a promise made by loved ones. Pay attention to step-by-step details. Sharing your concerns helps you make practical choices.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22): Cooperation remains the keynote in joint business or financial endeavors. You may be excited about certain travel plans or anticipated changes at work. Concentrate on pleasing new clients.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21): Put your inspired ideas into action rather than talking wishfully about what you would like to do. A hunch proves surprisingly accurate. Show your appreciation for a favor with a small, well-chosen gift.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21): A new occupation is a possibility. Others are focusing on adopting a healthier lifestyle or making household changes. Exercise self-discipline and you will be able to make full use of your creative gifts.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): A temporary crisis demands an original, innovative approach. Put your ideals into action Reading poetry or philosophy will provide valuable inspiration After today, your uncertainty about a proposed course of action will clear up.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): Handle routine tasks with dispatch An important new venture will require extra personal effort. Rest up. Overwork can lead to impaired efficiency Chatting with someone behind the scenes helps you make an important point.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20): Make tar-reaching decisions away from the spotlight, and alone Taking care of a dreary domestic chore will boost your stock with your mate or partner Avoid acting head-strong or impulsive where romance is concerned.

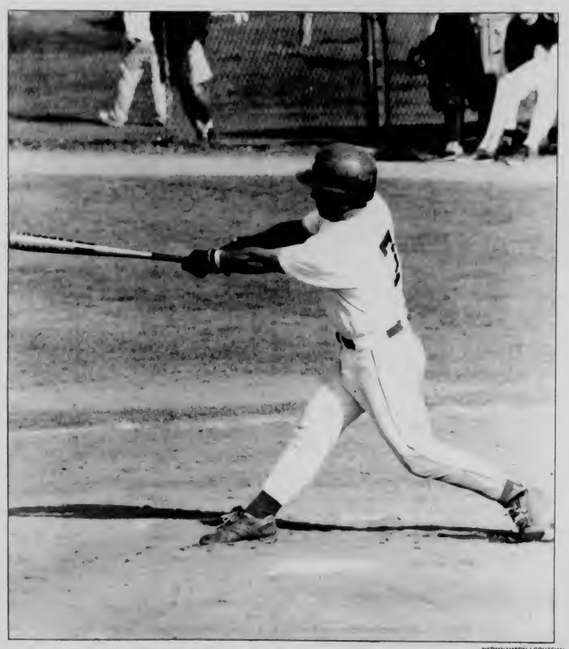
Baseball to face Vermont today in regional battle

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff



Muchie Dagliere, Massachusetts' freshman second baseman, is fifth on the team in batting (.316), and has smacked 37 hits, fourth on the team.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

No. 1 in the Atlantic 10 Conference, No. 1 in New England?

After a come-from-behind, 7-6 victory over West Virginia last Sunday, the University of Massachusetts baseball team clinched the top spot in the A-10 for the second straight season — the importance of which was not lost on Minuteman coach Mike Stone.

"It doesn't matter where you start the season — it only matters where you finish. That's what people judge you on," Stone said. "The guys were pretty excited, but we have a tough week ahead and can't lose sight of the post-season."

Massachusetts has the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 post- season tournament, which begins on May 12. The winner of the tourney qualifies for an NCAA play-in game and a shot at the NCAA Regionals.

West Virginia led 6-3 after eight innings before the Minuteman offense exploded for three runs in the top of the ninth. After right fielder Bill Knight walked, senior catcher Andy Pelis blasted a two-run homer, cutting the Mountaineer lead to 6-5. Shortstop Mark Pileski followed with a double and scored on a sacrifice fly by centerfielder Nate Murphy. Jeff Michaels' sac fly drove home left fielder Ryan Jette in the 10th and won the game for the Minutemen.

Sophomore righthander Jason Bennett (6-0) shut down West Virginia in his two innings of work to notch his sixth win of the season and second of the weekend. Michaels started the contest, allowing six hits in eight innings, but didn't figure in the pitching end of the decision.

UVM comes to town — again

The action resumes today at Earl Lorden Field (3 p.m.) in a clash of regional powers as Massachusetts (28-9) entertains Vermont (25-12). The Minutemen and the Catamounts are the top two teams in New England, and Stone said he believes the battle this afternoon is for bragging rights in the region.

The Catamounts aren't strangers to the confines of Lorden Field; Vermont played Big East Conference member Providence, which had been No. 1 in New England for most of the season, in Amherst last Wednesday and defeated the Friars 8-5. Freshman

'Real' baseball is back, Sox are too

Brian Perillo

It may have taken a little bit longer than usual, but baseball, real baseball, is finally back. Never mind the fact that no settlement was reached, that there's talk of an All- Star game boycott, or that until today, Major League games were officiated by replacement umpires. What matters right now is that our National Pastime, for the moment at least, has returned.

• Let's start by talking about the newest breed of Boston baseball fans, Canseoites. You all know them well. They're the ones that are trying to figure out whether they want tickets on the first or third base lines in Fenway during the playoffs. Time for a reality check.

The Sox have a decent team this year, and if they've proved nothing else over the first four games, their offense can produce runs. But all you diehards have to wonder how many more games the Old Towne team can win with names like Rheal Cormier or Vaughn Eshelman on the hill.

I'm not saying the Sox are going nowhere. Are they capable of contending for a wild card spot? Maybe. However, Sox fans who think this is the best team to take the field since the '27 Yankees must remember a few things.

1. Last year's Sox went 4-0, and 21-7 before coming down to Earth.

2. The Cubs started this season 4-0.

• Anyone who saw Dante Bichette's extra inning homer to beat the Mets on opening day had to love the way he turned to the dugout and pumped his fist as soon as the bat went crack.

• Here's a question posed to White Sox manager Gene Lamont. Why is Robin Ventura, who has obviously forgotten how to field the ball (six errors in five games) still playing at the hot spot while former All-Star third baseman Chris Sabo is DHing?

• UMass watch: Former Minuteman and current California shortstop Gary DiSarcina hit his tenth career homer off former Red Sox Danny Darwin in a 5-3 Angels win over Toronto Sunday.

Welcome to the show, Ron. Seattle rookie Ron Villone, a former two sport UMass athlete, has also been used several times this season in a relief role for the M's. On Sunday, he pitched mop-up duty, allowing one hit, as Detroit's Chris Gomez tattoed a Villone pitch for a long ninth inning home run.

Sorry, UMass alums Jeff Reardon and Mike Flanagan have retired. No word on what they're doing now.

• I don't care if he is batting .700, I still say Lee Tinsley can't hit a lick.

• People say that the Expos sold their team away and won't stand a chance in the National League East. However, if they had to trade All-Star center-

After a disappointing weekend which saw the Minutewomen lose three straight at the Princeton Tournament before getting a victory, the University of Massachusetts softball team will be looking to bounce back against a tough Boston College squad today in a doubleheader at Totman Field set for 3 p.m.

"I was very disappointed with the weekend," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "We played very, very poor defense."

The Minutewomen committed seven errors in the three losses, resulting in numerous unearned runs.

Another problem that UMass had at the tournament was hitting and scoring runs. Normally, this is not a problem for the Minutewomen as they are batting .295 as a team with two players (Kim Gutridge and Chris Martens) hitting over .400 and four players (Martens, Gutridge, Sam Cardenas and Kelly Buckley) with 30 or more runs batted in.

But in the first two games over the weekend the Minutewomen could only muster eight hits and one run combined.

"For our team to not-hit the ball is unusual," Sortino said. If the Minutewomen are to beat the Eagles, they will need to hit the ball.

Martens a key player

One player who should have no problem doing that is Martens, who has been on a tear as of late. Against Army last Thursday, she belted a home run to straight away centerfield. This past weekend at the Princeton Tournament, Martens smacked two dingers against Hofstra in the championship bracket. The left fielder is leading the team in batting (.407, 57-for-140), RBIs (37) and home runs (6).

Marten's six home runs puts her tied with Barb Marean for second place on the all-time single season list. She needs to hit three more to break the record set by Sherri Kuchinskas in 1993.

"Chris [Martens] was outstanding [this past weekend]," Sortino said. "She hit the ball so far it probably could have gone 250 feet."

Gutridge is another Minutewomen who is hitting extremely well. Although her 25 game hitting streak was snapped against Princeton, the freshman did increase her average to .401. The first baseman leads the team in hits (61) and doubles (15).

Kelly Buckley, Tracey Osier and Michele Shaw all drew praise from Sortino for their play over the

Kelly now shines from on top in new role

By Ted Kottler

They wanted him back, and he wanted to return. It's never been that simple for University of Massachusetts lacrosse star Dennis Kelly, yet he does everything he can to smooth his backtracked path into the program in which he finally belongs.

Kelly is in his fourth year at UMass, but only his third as a player. After earning All-New England recognition for his play on close defense in 1993, the former Farmingdale, N.Y. standout entered his junior campaign touted as an All- America candidate. But he quit the team before the season began, citing personal problems and differences with former coach Ted Garber.

What UMass lost was a top-flight close defender, but once the Minutemen hired former assistant Greg Cannella as head coach, they gained a long-stick midfielder par excellence.

"Last year he had his problems. This year he's changed 100 percent," said teammate Jared Lanning, who has known Kelly since his days at rival Oceanside High School.

It didn't seem likely that a player considered selfish by coaches and teammates could return after missing a whole season and succeed at a totally new position, but that's exactly what Kelly did.

"I'm confident with him guarding the top middies," Cannella said.

And don't get the idea it was easy. Kelly didn't like Cannella's decision, and his mounting difficulties off the field, including a broken cheekbone that required surgery and kept him out of fall workouts, made it even harder. But it's becoming clear that Kelly thrives on adversity, an exceptionally rare athletic trait.

"It was really tough to accept at first. I always felt you put your best three defenseman down low and the fourth guy up top," Kelly said. "But I realized I could be more creative up top. I'm more involoved in the offensive game, carrying the ball. And I'm actually enjoying myself, and I'm covering top players."

Kelly's versatility has not gone unnoticed.

"Dennis has the great ability to take away the ball," goaltender Tom LoPresti said. "He has great speed, and he also has an offensive dimension to him. He can bring the ball down and make a good look to an open guy, and he can even shoot."

One of Kelly's finest efforts came in UMass' most impressive win of the year, its 11-5 dismantling of then-No. 8 Hofstra. No matter who Kelly covered, he wound up with the ball. But when he squared off with his numerical foil (Kelly wears number 2), there were further similarities, as it was Kelly's former high school teammate, Rich Garguilo.

"It was funny [playing against him], he's such a competitor. We grew up together, and every day in high school practice we went against each other, so it felt like that again. He usually gets the best of me, but I think that was just my night."

Cannella was instrumental to Kelly's second career, helping him seek counseling at University Health Services for his strained relationship with his father. Kelly's parents are divorced and his father's re-marriage has prevented the situation from healing, Kelly believes.

"I really owe everything to him," Kelly said of Cannella. "He just believes in me as a person. Greg always told me to believe in myself,

UMass releases reports detailing academic future

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Incentives for research projects and grants, fewer classes, early retirement, academic collaboration and down-sizing are a few among the many suggestions detailed in two recently released reports from the University of Massachusetts. The report, totaling a combined 150 pages of recommendations, is looking towards the future of the University.

The chancellor and provost both released reports this week that draft an outline of the University's mission, objectives and a process by which it will deal will possible budgetary constraints.

Chancellor David K. Scott's report, "Strategic Thinking at the University of Massachusetts, 1995-2000," gives an overlying mission of excellence.

The mission for what Scott refers to as a "Transversity," requires that the community update the University's curriculum and technology, seek out resources and academically reallocate throughout the Amherst campus.

Scott's aspirations include admittance into the Association of American Universities (AAU), which includes some of the most well-acclaimed research institutions in the country.

Provost Patricia Crosson's report, "Renewing the Mission — The Strategic Plan for Academic Affairs," gives a more precise vision of the requirements the University will need to meet in order to follow through on Scott's objectives.

Crosson's report consists of three parts, the third of which is entitled "School and College Plans."

This portion is comprised of reports written by the deans from each college, which offer a detailed explanation of each department's needs that are not being met, and are possibly inhibiting advancement and success.

Crosson's report states that there are some apprehensions about the AAU because of the implications that money may be shifted from other departments to science and engineering. Both reports call for better conditions and a greater deal of available resources for students.

Neither Scott nor Crosson could be reached for comment.

According to Crosson's report, the University needs to become more flexible and groomed for the students' needs.

"The traditional model of four years of consecutive study leading to the baccalaureate degree bears little relationship to the experience, and often the desires of, students today.

"Yet, many of our course offerings, degree programs, student services and academic policies are constructed as if the old model still obtained," the report stated.

Crosson's report also says that with undergraduate education as the primary focus in the renewed mission, increasing research in all areas of study at the University would be an efficient way to "kill one bird with two stones."

Increased research projects would not only provide the University with faculty that is well versed and renowned in their fields and specialties, but would also make available more hands-on training and productive research work for undergraduates, according to "Renewing the Mission."

Students with undeclared majors are currently being advised at the College of Arts and Sciences Information Advising Center (CASIAC).

This brings in far more students than CASIAC was produced to service. Crosson proposes the creation of a more centralized center for advising that has the resources necessary for its function.

The report also states that it is imperative that departmental space and facility problems need to be addressed.

Police still looking for assailant in shooting

The University of Massachusetts police department has released the ages of the two victims in last Sunday's shooting in Southwest Residential Area, but are still withholding their identities.

The two victims, who received minor injuries in the incident, are currently identified as a 20 and a 25-year-old male non-students, police said.

Police are withholding the identities for "reasons of individual safety," said Court Officer Phil Cavanaugh.

The assailant in the incident has not been recovered. Police are conining their investigation.

Graduate Student Senate elections begin

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

Shan Manikkalingam, 30, of Colombo, Sri Lanka, is a fifth-year graduate student with a concentration in economics.

Manikkalingam's platform is "for unity, against divinesss — a new leadership slate [in the Graduate Student Senate]."

"Accountability, responsibility and participation," Manikkalingam said. "Participation in building coalitions with the labor unions graduates and the community at large. Accountability — when we take office we are accountable to the constituents and that due process is followed."

GSS Presidential Candidate
Shan Manikkalingam

"Responsibility — the last couple of years they have put our senate into deficit of more than $20,000, they had to take money from the trust fund ... we did not run on a ballot of no increased taxes," he said.

"We ran on a ballot of no tuition and curriculum fee increases."

Manikkalingam is a five year member of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) where he is the database coordinator and also a political organizer and coalition organizer.

Henri Subramanian, 32, of New Delhi, India, is a second semester labor studies graduate student.

GSS Vice-Presidential Candidate
Henri Subramanian

Subramanian is a write-in candidate running on Manik-kalingam's ballot.

"We stand for the large community of graduate student interest while being able to understand within the community we will be able to coalition with student groups and smaller group concerns while being able to respect and understand the difference," Subramanian said.

"For example, the fact that GSS and GEO overlap jurisdiction — I do not see that a conflict of interest in representing the students."

Subramanian is an active GEO member and volunteers on the by-law revision committee for the local 2322.

He has a lawyer's degree and enrolled in the bar in New Delhi where he practiced for three years.

Prasad Venugopal, 29, of Bangalore, India, is a fifth- year physics graduate student.

GSS Presidential Candidate
Prasad Venugopal

"Our team is a very experienced team committed to individuals, who have been vocal advocates for graduate student's rights on-campus and we have taken a public stance on numerous occasions," Venugopal said.

"We have always strongly advocated for graduate student rights and the importance to have graduate student input into the decision making at levels of the University," he said.

"Our team stands on its solid achievement experience and vision of graduate education at UMass."

Venugopal is the incumbent candidate for the presidential ticket.

He has been a member of GEO for past five years, was on the coordinating committee and the Social and Justice committee at GEO.

Wenping Jin, 28, of Tianjin, China, has a masters degree in labor studies from the University and is a first-year graduate student in the School of Public Health and Health Sciences.

GSS Vice Presidential Candidate
Wenping Jin

"My first issue is that Chinese makes up the largest graduate student community and I am the first Chinese student to run for any GSS office," Jin said.

"Second, women's health is my most concerned topic."

"There has been a lot of recommendations [from University Health Services] and the recommendations have not been properly implemented and I would like to push that. I would also like to expand services for childcare and increase the GSS allocations for childcare," she said.

Jin is an organizer for GEO.

She is also the manager for the graduate student lounge, on the women's health issues committee and coordinator for contraceptive education at UHS.

Queer Fest '95 to headline local GLBT pride activities

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Queer Fest '95 arrives at the University of Massachusetts tomorrow as the kick off to the 1995 pride march season.

Organizer Ward Henline describes Queer Fest as "an outdoor festival of pride and power" for gays, lesbians, bisexuals, transgender people and their heterosexual allies.

The festival is set to begin at 11 a.m. and run until late in the evening.

Queer Fest will feature an outdoor "midway" with several speakers, performers, vending booths and games, plus an evening ice cream social and a dance.

Queer Fest is sponsored by the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance and the Stonewall Center (formerly the Program for GLB Concerns).

For GLBT people, the purpose of the day is "to celebrate our sexualities and to show students and community members that we are proud of who we are," Henline said.

The date of the festival is only two days before the Northampton GLBT Pride March and coincides with the 10th anniversary celebration of the Stonewall Center.

The "midway" will be set up on the lawn between the W.E.B. Du Bois Library and the Student Union between 11 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Henline has high hopes for Queer Fest, although he realizes that not everyone at UMass is receptive to the idea of a GLBT festival taking place in middle of campus.

Possible protest in the works

According to Henline, the UMass Republican Club plans to protest the festival in a rally on the steps of the Student Union.

The protest is scheduled for noon on May 3, Henline said.

"Some people at UMass will look on in disgust and hatred, and that is alright," he said. "We are hoping that those people will also learn from their hatred and move closer to acceptance."

Signs advertising the anti-Queer fest rally have been appearing on campus.

They have included such slogans as "Adam and Eve, not Adam and Steve." The group is billing their rally as a "Straight Pride" rally.

Afternoons events and activities

The master of ceremonies will be Judith Sloan, a nationally-known writer, actor, comic and performance artist.

Sloan has written several plays for stage and radio, including The Whole K'Cufin World ... and a few more things.

The keynote address will be delivered by Claire Hemmings, a research associate at the Five College Women's Studies Research Center.

Her home base is the Centre for Women's Studies at the University of York, United Kingdom.

Other performers are as follows:

- Eric Wheeler, local singer and songwriter
- Susan Stimpson, Boston-based poet
- Chris Carrol, local political comedian
- Craig Hickman, Boston-based performance artist
- Linee Perroncel, local singer and songwriter
- Valley Women's Martial Arts

Local community vendors and GLBT organizations will operate booths offering arts, crafts, food, and information. Queer Fest participants may win small prizes — condoms, badges, school supplies, etc. — by playing "carnival-type games," Henline said.

An ice cream social will being at 8 p.m. and kick off a night of dancing and music.

The social is planned for the patio of the Campus Center and will be followed by a dance in the Student Union Ballroom.

Both events will be free and open to the public.

Recipients of awards announced

■ Recognition for University advocates

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Seven advocates of the University of Massachusetts working to create a "culture of advocacy" will be honored with University Advancement Awards this afternoon during a luncheon in the Campus Center.

Nominations for the $500 awards were received from around campus for "advocates for University advancement and the mission of the University," according to John Brigham, professor of political science and chair of the university relations and development council of faculty senate.

This is the first year the awards will be given, Brigham said. "We hope to give them in the future," he said. "Some people do a lot for the University, but it is not always recognized."

The recognition is terrific, according to Ron Story, vice chancellor for university advancement.

"I thought for a long time we should recognize and applaud people who build support for the University in the external community, especially the state," he said.

"We looked for people who had done things that had built support for UMass somewhere above and beyond the call of duty," Story said.

According to Lynn Robitaille, recipient of an award for her work with the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA), the University needs to offer some kind of initiative for members of the University to be advocates.

"It is important for the University to give people incentives to work hard so there is a really positive perception of the University throughout the state," Robitaille said.

The awardees were chosen by a committee including students and members of the university relations and development council.

"We look for people who go beyond their responsibilities, either by taking the University to another level or inventing ways of doing things," Brigham said.

"It's not teaching, it's not service, it is people who help the University present itself," he said.

Professor Marilee Hill, who directs the Video Instructional Program is another reward recipient who is working to improve the University, according to Brigham.

Hill is the director of distance learning at the University which enables students to "take University of Massachusetts courses without even coming to campus," she said.

"Faculty come into our television studios and we broadcast and videotape them teaching," Hill said.

The classes are then broadcast by satellite to students around the country.

It is great that the University is recognizing staff and faculty for what they have done, according to Hill.

"I feel honored. I love the recognition because I think I have an important job at the University," she said.

Other recipients who will be honored today are Marc Kenen of SCERA, Al Lizana and Mirran Raphaely of the Student Government Association.

Faculty given awards were Professor Craig Moore of the School of Management, and George Parks, the director of the Court rules against mandatory furloughs

By Purva Panday
Collegian Staff

The Supreme Judicial Court (SJC) recently made a ruling that will protect University of Massachusetts employees from being forced to take unpaid vacation days, called furloughs.

The SJC decision, made April 19, opposed a 1991 bill which gave the state the right to force unpaid furloughs upon state faculty and staff.

The SJC decision was unanimous.

Legislature passed the bill in March 1991 as part of a larger bill focussed on down scaling the FY91 deficit of $850 million, according to a recent Associated Press report.

"There were cash-flow problems that neared $2 billion at one point," said Robert Bliss, a representative for the Executive Office of Administration and Finance.

Bliss estimates that the ruling could cost the state anywhere from $4 million, according to union estimates, to as much as $10 million, calling the SJC ruling "pretty definitive."

Currently, the state is researching the history of past labor agreement in efforts to reach a solution "as soon as possible," Bliss said.

The bill required employees whose salaries surpassed $20,000 to take two to 15 furlough days between April and June of 1991, according to Bliss.

"The bill gave state employees a variety of options, depending in part on their income," Bliss said.

The furlough system allowed employees to choose furlough days as unpaid vacation days, to work without pay on specified furlough days and receive bonus paid vacations to be taken at a later time, or to continue working without pay and receive a payment at a later day, Bliss said.

Bank accounts get the summer off

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

If you are leaving Massachusetts over the summer and do not need your cash, then freeze your accounts.

BayBank is offering students the opportunity to temporarily freeze their assets over the summer.

Out-of-state students who bank with BayBank will not have to pay fees if they place their accounts on hold before they head home for the summer.

"This service is for students who do not think they need to have access to cash over the summer months," said Diane Greer, BayBank spokeswoman.

Not only are fees put on hold, but the bank holds interest on any savings account placed on hold, said Greer. There is no fee for placing accounts on hold.

Most BayBank savings and checking accounts including the Student Value Package are eligible for the program.

Students can simply reactivate the accounts by making a transaction either at a branch office, automatic teller machine or by simply writing a check.

"It ensures that when a student returns to school in the fall there is no interruption in service, and their account is intact," said Greer.

Students can place accounts on hold by filling out forms found at either branch offices or ATMs, or by calling BayBank's sales and service hotline.

BayBank is one of New England's largest banks behind such competitors as Shawmut, Fleet and Bank of Boston. BayBank has about $10.8 billion in assets.

BayBank has three branches in the Amherst and Northampton area as well as two ATMs on campus. Through out Massachusetts they have 205 branches and more than 350 ATMs.

Local shop sponsors free bicycle clinic on fixing flat tires

By Anthony Douglas
Collegian Correspondent

Students who have experienced the struggle of bike problems such as flats, are welcome to attend a clinic being held by a local bike shop.

Valley Bicycles on Main Street is having a free fix-a-flat clinic every second and fourth Saturday of each month from now until September, according to owner John Coull.

"The reason why we have been holding these clinics is to educate bikers at a more reasonable time than having them try to watch while we correct the situation during business hours," Coull said.

The clinic which is run by the owner and some employees is a hands-on, step-by-step instructional which is open to more than just flats. Considering that the UMass Bike Co-op is now out of commission, it fills the void for students in need, he said.

The store has been giving the free clinics for about four years in the spring and summer. The clinics are small — rarely getting up to a dozen people in a session.

Taking about an hour to get through, the clinics completely promise to be time well spent, Coull said.

"Feel free to come for a refresher, knowledge is power."

UM parking tickets questioned

Continual Quality Improvement Team seeks student response

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Staff

Those students who have had problems with parking tickets on the University of Massachusetts campus were given the chance to voice their opinions on the Student Union steps yesterday afternoon.

Members of the Continual Quality Improvement Team (CQI) are currently doing a process redesign of the parking appeal processes on the UMass campus. The CQI is an international program which businesses use to improve interdepartmental problems.

"We come up with a process that the department thinks needs improving and then we design a process to help out with the problem," said Marc Fafield, a CQI team and Public Safety department staff member.

"The parking office wants their appeal process to be more understandable," Fafield said.

The CQI had students that have received parking tickets fill out questionnaires in order to collect opinions on how to make the appeal process easier. In exchange for giving their opinions, the students received a card for "a free exit" in the Campus Center parking garage.

"We are part of a team to try to improve the system of appeals and hearings," said Barbara Konieczny, the office manager for parking services. "We hold the parking appeals for those students who are unable to make it to the hearings."

Pete Farrell, a first year legal studies major who voiced his opinion on the questionnaire, said he thought it was good that they were trying to make an effort, because their tickets are too "excessive."

"One night, I ran inside for two minutes and when I came out there was already a $15 ticket on the car. I wrote them a letter, but they rejected it. They are out there everyday giving tickets to everyone. It's ridiculous," said Farrell.

According to Lynn Braddock, the manager of parking services and the team sponsor the CQI, the information will be evaluated, so that we can improve the method of contesting a parking ticket that is received on campus.

"We want customer feedback on how the system should work for the people who are getting these parking tickets," said Braddock.

Prof locates origins of Boston accent

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

If you have ever met any Bostonians, you have no doubt asked them to say "fah," "cah" and "pahk."

The fact that people from and around Boston speak this way is well-known, but the reason is not so well-known.

A University of Massachusetts professor has taken on the mission of finding the reason.

This is the topic of a paper published by UMass Professor John McCarthy, head of the linguistics department. His paper explores the nuances of the Boston accent, and its origins, he said.

The paper states that the accent evolved as a result of Boston's close contact with England, due to trade. People outside of Boston and its suburbs do not have the accent because of their lack of contact with England, according to McCarthy.

The Hub tended to look up to London as a cultural center. By emulating their accent, Bostonians felt they were amongst the culturally elite.

Eventually these ties became lesser and were diluted. Many different groups of varying nationality immigrated to Boston as well. Many of these nationalities would occupy certain areas of Boston.

"Today Bostonians have dialects depending on what neighborhood they're from," said McCarthy. Both of these are reasons why the accent no longer resembles London's accent.

McCarthy says the accent is something which Bostonians take pride in.

"They feel it's the right way to talk," he said.

A native of Medford, he became interested in the Boston accent when he taught the University of Texas, and his students complained they had trouble understanding him.

His paper is published in the Canadian Journal of Linguistics, the Yearbook of Morphology, and the Berkeley Linguistics Society Proceedings.

McCarthy is a Harvard graduate with a Ph.D. in linguistics. He originally wanted to major in German, but said he found linguistics "more interesting."

Those currently taking his Linguistics 751 course have nothing but praise for him.

"[He's] clear, patient and generous with his time," says Laura Benua, a graduate student in linguistics.

He is currently working on a new study and has received a grant from the National Science Foundation to do work on Optimality Theory.

"The idea is to look at linguistic restraints," he said. "The principals saying what one can and can't pronounce."

The study will look at linguistic restraints as not being absolute laws, [but being] able to be violated in order to satisfy other linguistic contracts, said McCarthy.

The grant lasts 3 years. Those working with professor McCarthy are Alan Prince, a former professor here who's now a member of the Rutgers faculty, and several students.

Amherst town meeting debates funding

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The third session of this year's Amherst Town Meeting was held Monday night in the auditorium of the Regional Junior High School.

Nine articles passed, including appropriations for the Cherry Hill Golf Course and the Amherst landfill, both of which met with vocal opposition from Larry Kelly, a town meeting representative.

Kelly's proposal was to sell the landfill, and contract out Amherst's trash removal service.

"Just sell the darn thing," he said, adding he didn't care if the trash was brought to an "Indian reservation" or to "Vermont," as long as it was taken out of Amherst.

Kelly also voiced opposition to allocate funds to the municipally funded golf course, claiming that it consistently loses money.

The two sides of the vote were close enough to call for a standing vote. A standing vote is taken when a clear distinction cannot be made between "Ayes" and "Nays" after the traditional voiced vote.

Also passed were appropriations to human services organizations which serve the Amherst area including Necessities/Necesidades, the YWCA, and the Cambodian American Association.

Two articles dealing with roadwork passed, including one which would appropriate $150,000 in order to repair the worst section of Market Hill Road.

The town also voted to continue allocating funds to pay for fare-free PVTA service, to provide funding for benefits for retiring town employees, and to provide money for Amherst Community Television.

Most of the warrants passed Monday night were passed by unanimous votes, despite sometimes lengthy debate between committee members and town meeting members.

The longest debate was over whether or not to allocate $7500 to the Charter Commission. The Charter Commission is an elected body whose job is to consider writing a new charter for Amherst. The money would be used to offset legal, secretarial and administrative costs, according to Joan Joshi, vice-chairperson of the commission.

The motion to allocate the money passed.

The meeting ended promptly at 10 p.m. and future meetings will be held every Monday and Wednesday evening at 7:30 until all of the 42 warrants have been voted on.

Students create designs for pond

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

The campus pond will be getting a whole new look.

A consultant hired by the University of Massachusetts to come up with a design and plan to improve the pond and it's surrounding area, spoke at an informational meeting at the Campus Center on Monday.

Nancy Denig took the floor and gave the audience of about 35, many Amherst area residents, her presentation.

Her ideas for the pond area include a great increase in plantlife, including lining North Pleasant Street on either side with trees. Her proposal also includes a redesigned system of walkways which would result in a smoother flow of pedestrian traffic.

She said she also has plans to resculpt the lawns on either side of the pond. Possibly consolidating the lawns next to the Student Union into one large oval.

During the question and answer period, one point of heated debate was over a proposed island to be carved out of the land on the Southwest part of the pond. Members of the audience sighted that if such an island were to be created, the existing trees would die.

Others said the design looked too structured, destroying the rural look of the campus. Part of this concern was over what was construed as an over-abundance of "hard edges" — concrete platforms lining the north end of the pond.

According to Rose, when the pond is redone, students can look forward to the minor inconveniences involved in such a project. The pond will have to be dredged, resulting in large piles of mud and silt on the campus lawn.

Pedestrian traffic may have to be detoured because of the construction, Rose said.

The campus pond is only one of many target areas on campus which will be improved and beautified in the coming years.

The redesigning of the campus pond began with a group of graduate and undergraduate students in landscape architecture, said Sean Lally, a junior in landscape architecture.

According to Denig, six groups of students were involved in a studio design project where they created schemes. These are representations of the campus pond which include the students changes. These schematics were then photographed, and the photos were given to Denig.

Reaction from both the students and residents has been cautiously optimistic.

"Plans are going in the right direction," said Dorothy Gavin, an Amherst resident, "but I'm not completely satisfied with all the details."

Learning to understand hate

Being born and raised in a semi-integrated neighborhood in Brooklyn, N.Y., I was always taught to respect other races, religions and ideas. I guess I consider myself lucky that I had never had a ethnic slur hurled directly at me, until last week.

Last Monday a seemingly harmless elderly woman came into the business office of the Collegian, asking to place an advertisement in the paper. She handed me a copy of the letter she wanted in the paper, and my attention was brought to the last paragraph which stated that Judaism was offensive to human beings.

Fortunately, my first reaction was professional. As advertising manager of the Collegian, I do not believe that we should run an ad that specifically targets one person or group of people. I found it truly unbelievable that this grandmotherly woman was trying to advertise the notion that my religion was offensive.

Lisa Tannenbaum

For some reason, that morning I had decided to put on the silver Jewish star that I wear on a chain. It was tucked into my shirt, but I pulled it out before I approached this woman. I introduced myself as the advertising manager, informing her that we could not run this letter as an ad because it specifically targeted one group of people.

She asked if I was Jewish. When I told her I was, she informed me that she wished to speak with someone who was not Jewish. I explained that it was my job and she needed to speak with me on the issue. She told me that the article was not opinion, but fact. I said that was irrelevant, we would still not run this letter as an advertisement.

"Why are you always trying to run everything?"

"Excuse me?"

"You Jews, you're always trying to run things."

I felt like someone had just punched me in the stomach. My cheeks started to burn with anger and it took every ounce of control that I had to maintain my calm. I wanted to punch her in the face and scream, "Get out of this office." But I simply repeated the fact that the letter, whether opinion or fact, could not be run.

When she finally left the office, she said to me, "You know, I'm really just trying to make things better between the Blacks and the Jews." Well, that's ridiculous.

I know that many people are upset that this letter ran in the Collegian yesterday. My intention is to make it perfectly clear that this woman is merely seeking to blame one group of people for many of the problems in the world. If she were really trying to resolve a conflict, she would be looking for a solution, not trying to place blame. And she certainly would not be yelling ethnic slurs at me.

This was the first time that something like this had ever happened to me. When I stated this in the office it was greeted with surprise by one of my African American co-workers. She told us a story of something that had happened to her when she was a little girl that affects her to this day.

That made me feel much worse. Why is it that people need to put other people down to feel better about themselves? What could a little girl have possibly done to deserve being degraded? What have I ever done that makes people hate me or blame me for my religious beliefs?

I wasn't really sure if the letter should have run in the paper. However, I hope that the people who read it have enough sense to realize that this was not a factual statement as Helen Cullen declaimed it to be. She did not back it up with any facts, she did not quote any of these so called "writings." If you want to know what it really says in the Talmud, ask someone who knows.

Don't use heresy or conjecture to blame the Jews, or anyone else, for the terrible things that have occurred in this world. Don't let her fool you into believing that she has a full understanding of the issues she discussed. Please understand that this woman is not the kind-hearted person she claims to be. She took something I believe in, and she threw it in my face. She used it to categorize me and make me try to feel that I was inferior.

I am aware that this happens to some people on a daily basis. I just happen to look White and people can't tell that I'm Jewish, or this would have happened to me a long time ago.

Lisa Tannenbaum is the Collegian advertising manager.

The bursting of the PC bubble

The University of Massachusetts, self proclaimed multicultural mecca and capital of political correctness. It is an institute of higher learning where students are required to study, among other things, courses in cultural diversity and history. It is a place where multiculturalism and diversity are the popular buzz words spoken and written in dozens of speeches, letters, memos and articles every day. However, beneath the façade of liberalism a horrible truth may be concealed. For, hidden behind their speeches and buzz words, elements of the University's faculty and staff publicly express and endorse racist and anti-Semitic sentiments.

James P. Ganley

My story is one that you may well have heard, or will hear a great deal about these few days. It is a story that takes place on a typical afternoon on an ordinary day at the end of April. The staff of the Collegian went about their daily tasks, hurrying to write stories, design advertisements, process photographs and meet deadlines as they had done day after day since September. Little did they know that in a matter of a few short minutes they would be engulfed in a debate that would test the limits of their journalistic ethics and personal convictions, and would gain the attention of the administration, campus groups and the local community.

The particulars of the story are not all that important. Suffice to say that a certain letter was presented for publication, first as a paid advertisement, and when refused, as a letter to the editor. Debate both in formal committees and whispered conferences abounded over the course of the following days. In the end, as you well know, the decision was made that the letter would be printed and space provided in abundance for the inevitable responses.

By now, most of you have read the letter in question. By now, most of you, being educated, intelligent, rational men and women, have certainly recognized the letter in question for the preposterous collection of twisted facts and misguided interpretations that it is. By now, most of you are aware that these shocking, anti-Semitic views are held and publicly voiced by a retired professor at this very University. One need not be Jewish to find it appalling.

This is not some mass mailing by some Neo-Nazi movement, this letter and these views have their origin right here in our cozy "Happy Valley." While the content of this letter is ludicrous and the intent behind it sickening, the fact that it has roots in this area — in this University — is the most frightening part of the situation.

Now understand, in the three years I have spent on this campus, I have never been completely impressed by the veil of multiculturalism that the administration has draped around us. Nevertheless, it was at the very least a step in the right direction. I have recently changed that opinion. To think that on a campus that boasts a multicultural education there may be faculty that have been, or are, passing on racist, sexist, homophobic or anti-Semitic sentiments to the students they teach is appalling.

In the midst of a conversation about this letter a point was raised. Has this professor, the author of this letter, ever had a Jewish student in her class? In the inevitable event that she did, did the student's grades suffer for their cultural and religious affiliation? There really is no way to know, though in light of the apparent strength of the author's conviction, it seems more than likely.

Some of our scholars of law or journalism may argue that under the First Amendment our friend the professor is free to hold whatever opinions she chooses, and voice them as she chooses. But how can someone supposedly educated and responsible for the education of others carry out her task responsibly while harboring such feelings? In short, let her have her opinions, just don't let her teach them at this, or any other University.

This is the second time in recent months that an employee, or in this case, former employee, of this University has publicly expressed racial and ethnic bigotry. Remember Franklin dining hall? I do. As shocking as that was, it was tolerable in the dining hall workers have little appreciable affect on the students. However, for a professor to harbor such blatantly offensive opinions, is unacceptable at an institution of higher learning.

So Chancellor David K. Scott, you and all your public relations experts and propaganda writers need to clean the dirt off your glasses and see this campus for what it really is. For so long as faculty and staff of this University are permitted to harbor racial and ethnic prejudices, your dreams of a diverse, multicultural community on this campus will be burned in the fires of hatred, bigotry and unrest.

To the author of this letter I offer my pity. Your closed minded attitude and thinly veiled hatred are not worthy of your station and title. I also offer my thanks. For without this letter, it may have gone unknown that views such as yours existed within the ranks of professional educators at this school. Finally, I offer an observation. In writing this letter you have only fanned the flames of tension on this campus that you claim to have set out to extinguish. I hope that whatever god you worship understands and can forgive your hatred, for I don't and I can't.

COLLEGIAN ART BY MATT WILSON

Divisive culture

Shyamala Ivatury's article which appeared in the Multicultural Affairs section of the Collegian yesterday publicly accuses me of being a Third world "sell-out" and a "Clarence [Thomas]."

The timing of these accusations can not be dismissed. Such a slanderous assault on my character during an election campaign is a cheap shot at trying to garner votes at the 11th hour.

Shan Manikkalingam

In attempting to gain support for the incumbent slate Ivatury is playing the race card, a historical ploy of the right-wing to "divide and conquer" the people. Many people on this campus recognize that such divisive politics rely heavily on exclusionism, intimidation and disrespect.

In addition, this opinion article should never have appeared in the Multicultural Affairs page during an election. The editors of the Collegian have written a correction to acknowledge this fact. The fact that the identical article appears in the elections issue of the Voice on the same day substantiates our claim that Ivatury engages in negative campaigning based on personal slander.

I reiterate that neither I, nor my running mates ascribe to narrow identity politics, unlike the incumbent slate. We will take a firm, principled stand supporting all forms of discrimination affecting graduate students, undergraduate students, and service employees at UMass. I believe that challenges, including direct confrontations are necessary ingredients for a truly democratic and bottom-up decision making process.

From my participation in various meetings and actions on campus over the past five years, I have demonstrated an unwavering commitment to mentioned above. A willingness to work from a grass-roots perspective does not rule out the possible use of civil disobedience and concerted actions to challenge the status quo. Slanderous personal attacks can never substitute for well articulated and substantive political analysis.

I have observed how the incumbent's politics of exclusionism have adversely affected graduate students and the UMass community at large. Those of my fellow- graduate students who were present at the last GEO membership meeting will recognize how the current representative of the GSS and the editor of the Voice used a certain instance of discrimination on the campus to condemn all those present in the room as "racist."

The coercive climate created by such an attack allowed no room for any attempt to investigate details of the case; as a result there was no discussion as to the most effective action that GEO and other groups on campus might take to address a serious issue.

My campus activism has most recently been through the GEO. While I have been a volunteer activist over the last four years, I started working as an organizer with GEO since September 1994. In this employ, I have pushed for a broad coalition of service employee unions, undergraduate and graduate students in order to improve the quality of life at UMass.

My slate believes that various campus coalitions need to work together to address all forms of discrimination. We are educating the campus community and challenging the administration to end discrimination against international students, students with families, low-income students, women, workers and other students on this campus, who are affected by state budget cuts.

Our coalition work also draws attention to how the Hooker plan will fundamentally restructure the mission and purpose of the campus. We believe that the Hooker plan represents an important change for higher public education.

Our University president is attempting to turn our publicly funded, publicly directed university into a corporate subsidy, where private interests dictate which departments flourish, or even exist. It is imperative for all of us to join together to protect one of the last important public institutions. Together we can affect the future of public higher education — for the better!

Shan Manikkalingam is a UMass graduate student.

From the editors

The editorial column that appeared on yesterday's Multicultural Affairs page concerning the Graduate Student Senate elections should have been printed on the Editorial/Opinion page. In the future, all letters and columns discussing candidates in political campaigns will appear in the Ed/Op section of the Collegian.

Letters to the Editor

Discussing safety on campus

To the editor:

As you probably know from the news media, University of Massachusetts Amherst police are investigating an early morning argument that took place Sunday outside Washington residence hall.

The incident resulted in gunshots being fired and two men, who are not students here, receiving minor injuries. the police investigation is ongoing, and anyone with information is urged to contact the Department of Public Safety at 545-0893. All information will remain confidential.

It is distressing to all of us when the kinds of incidents that are becoming widespread in our cities and towns occur on our campus, which has been and remains relatively safe. We take the matter of personal safety very seriously. the campus administration is making every effort to pursue a "no tolerance" policy for this kind of behavior. We will impose the strictest sanctions on any student, staff or faculty member found responsible. In addition, we have a professionally trained police department whose officers patrol the campus continuously in cruisers, on horseback, on bicycles, and on foot. Public Safety offers an escort service to assist students going across campus at night and supervises residence hall security.

The UMass police also will gladly come to any residence hall or student group and talk about safety issues and precautions.

Students who would like to discuss their concerns about the shooting incident or other safety matters may call the Dean of Students at 545-2684, or walk into the Dean's Office at 227 Whitmore. Students living in the residence halls should also feel free to talk with staff there.

Beyond administrative measures and support, I would remind you that we can all be safety conscious in our own lives — we can choose not to escalate disagreements; we can address disagreements and other problems through a formal process such as mediation, the courts or the campus judiciary; we can use the escort service; and we can speak out early when we know of a situation that might lead to violence.

Although reports of this weekend's activities have focused our attention on violence, we must remember that our campus is still a place where people can gather for classes, programs and celebrations without violence or injuries.

Chancellor addresses anti–Semitic letter

To the editor:

There is some irony in the appearance of yesterday's Daily Collegian of both the letter from Professor Emerita Cullen (in which she concludes that "...traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity..." constitute in themselves the genesis of conflict with and offense to "the rest of the human race") and the front-page article announcing the appointment of the new Coordinator for Jewish Affairs, Larry Goldbaum.

The former constitutes an explicit illustration of the need to continue conversations of the sort that Professors Angelou and Wiesel modeled for us just a month ago so that we might, through learning about each other, become more fully and accurately informed and better able to reach valid and appropriate conclusions given a set of facts. Mr. Goldbaum indicates, in the front-page article, his eagerness to facilitate conversations of different perspectives. It is unfortunate, apparently, that he may have neither respite from nor a dearth of issues to address.

I am disappointed and regret reading the evidence that reminds us once again that there is much to accomplish in challenging stereotypes of any denomination. However, our disappointment must neither weary us in our efforts nor deter us from decrying what we may perceive to be verbal, physical, or psychological assaults on the vital and multifaceted equilibrium we strive to accomplish on this campus.

The endless struggle: Marcos and Durito

Editor's Note: This is a communiqué by the leader of the Zapatista National Liberation Army (EZLN), Subcomandante Marcos. The EZLN has been fighting the Mexican Government and demanding real democratic changes throughout the country since Jan. 1, 1994, inspired by Emiliano Zapata, hero of the Mexican Revolution.

Sirs — here is a communiqué for vespers. Over here April plays at disguising itself like March, and May begins to flap its wings on some stray flowers, red-colored, among so much green. I do not tire of hoping and unhoping among so many crickets. Meanwhile, I plan to begin the Tired Lung Society. I'm sure it will be quite successful in the D.F. (Mexico City). By the time this arrives, Holy Week will be once again, ordinary week. How much longer will the lie prevail? Vale. Health and a mouthful of that fresh air which they say is breathed in the mountains and which some dislocated people call "hope."

From the mountains of Southeast México, April, 1995.

Subcomandante Insurgente Marcos.

P.S. So he continues undoing offenses in the dawn, and offers to a far-away maiden a little bouquet of red carnations hidden in a story called ... Durito III (Neo-liberalism and the labor movement). The moon is a pale almond. Silver sheets re-shape trees and plants. Dedicated crickets nail white leaves to the tree trunks as irregular as the shadows of the night below. Gusts of grey wind agitate the trees and the uneasiness. Durito makes a bed in my beard. The sneeze he provokes makes the armed gentleman roll on the floor. Durito gathers himself deliberately. To his already impotent body armor, Durito adds half a shell of COLOLTE (which is a species of hazelnut native to the Lacandon jungle) on his head in addition to holding a medicine cap like a shield. Excalibur is sheathed and a lance (which is suspiciously similar to a paper clip) completes his attire. "Now what?" I say as I try to, somewhat pointlessly, help Durito with my finger. Durito rearranges his body, I mean, his armor.

He unsheathes Excalibur, clears his throat twice, and says in a deep-throated voice.

"It is dawn, my battered shield bearer! It is the hour to arrange our garments, and march and the day sharpens the spiny mane of Apollo as he peers at the world! It is the hour when nomadic knights ride in search of adventure which will increase their prestige before the absent eyes of the maiden, which prevent them from, even for an instant, close their eyes looking for oblivion or rest!"

I yawn and let my eyelids bring me oblivion and rest. This irritates Durito and he raises his voice "We must go out to wrong maidens, straighten widows out, give refuge to bandits and jail the destitute"

"Sounds to me like a government program" I say to him with my eyes closed.

Durito appears to have no intention of leaving without waking me fully "Wake up, scoundrel! You must remember to follow your Master where ever misfortune or adventure may take him!"

Finally I open my eyes and stare at him. Durito looks more like a broken-up Army tank than an errant knight. I wanted to clear up my doubt so I asked him "And who are you exactly?"

"Errant knight am I, and not like those whose names history forgot, but of those who in spite of all the envy, of the magicians who created Persia, Brahmans India, women sophists Ethiopia, will put his name in the temple of immortality so it may serve as an example in the coming centuries, where other errant knights may see what steps to follow, if they wish to reach the peak and high honor of arms" Durito answers, assuming his most, according to him, gallant pose.

"Sounds to me like ... like ..." I begin to say but Durito interrupts me.

"Silence, insensitive commoner! You pretend to slander me saying that the ingenious noble Don Quijote of La Mancha plagiarized my speeches. And certainly, since we are on this subject, I should say there are those says that you are wasting space in your epistles. Bibliographical notes, huh! If you continue you will end up like Galio citing six or seven authors in order to cover up his cynicism."

I felt profoundly wounded by the annexed comments and I decided to change the subject. "That on your head ... it looks like a cololti shell"

"It is a helmet, ignorant one" Durito says.

"Helmet? It looks like a shell with holes" I insist.

"Cololti. Helmet. Halo. That's the order, Sancho" Durito says as he arranges the helmet.

"Sancho" I stutter-say-ask-protest.

"Look leave this haggling and hurry so we can leave. My indefatigable sword has tolerated too many injustices and its blade is anxious to touch the necks of independent unions."

As Durito says this, he bends his sword like a regent from a capital city.

"I think you've read too many papers recently. Be careful, or they will suicide you" I say to him while I attempt to delay the moment in which I rise. Durito, for a moment abandons his XVI century language and explains, proudly, that he has secured a mount. He says it is as swift as lightning in August, silent as the wind in March, docile as the rain in September, and many more marvels which I don't remember, but there was one quality for month. I appear incredulous, so Durito announces solemnly that he will do me the honor of lending me his mount. I sit, thinking that in this way I can sleep a little.

Durito leaves and is so long in returning, that in effect, I fall asleep ...

A voice awakens me "A-h-h-h-hem-m-m!" It is Durito and he is mounted on the logical reason for his delay; a turtle! At a pace which Durito has called "elegant trot" and which, to me appears to be a very prudent and slow one, the turtle comes toward me. Mounted on his turtle (they call it "coc" in Tzeltal), Durito turns to look at me and asks, "So how do I look?"

I gaze at this errant knight who unknown reason has brought to the solitude of the Lacandon jungle, only to keep a respectful silence. His appearance is "peculiar."

Durito baptizes his turtle, excuse me, his horse with a name which seems hallucinatory: Pegasus. So that there is no doubt, Durito writes on the saddle cover of the turtle, with large and decisive letters "Pegasus. Copy Rights Reserved" and below "Please fasten your seat belts." I almost cannot resist the temptation of making a comparison with the economic recuperation program, when Durito turns his mount so I can see his other side.

Pegasus takes his time, even when Durito announces a "vertiginous turn of his horse," which is only a slow turn. The turtle does it so carefully one might think he fears dizziness. After a few minutes, one can read on Pegasus' left flank "Smokers Section" "Company unions not allowed," "Free advertising space. For information call Durito's Publishing Company." I believe, I cannot see much free space because the ad covers all the left and rear flank of Pegasus.

> "I almost cannot resist the temptation of making a comparison with the economic recuperation program..."

After praising the ultra-mini-micro entrepreneurial vision of Durito, the only way to survive the failures of neoliberalism and TELECE (phonetic Spanish for NAFTA), I ask him "So where does your future lead you?"

"Don't be a clown. That language only belongs to noblemen and lords and not to vagabonds and commoners who, were it not for my infinite compassion, would continue in their empty lives and never be able to dream about the secrets and marvels of errant knighthood" Durito answers while trying to hold Pegasus back, who for some strange reason, is impatient to leave.

"It seems to me that, for 2 a.m., I've had enough scolding," I say to Durito "Wherever you go, you'll go alone. I don't plan to go out tonight. Yesterday Camilo found tiger tracks, close by."

Apparently I found a vulnerable flank on our brave knight, because his voice shook when he asked, after swallowing saliva with great difficulty "So what do those tigers eat?"

"Everything. Guerrillas, soldiers, beetles ... and turtles!" I watch Pegasus reaction, but it must really believe it is a horse, because it did not seem to be alarmed. Actually, I thought I heard a soft whinny.

"Bah! You just want to frighten me, because you know this armed knight has defeated giants disguised as windmills, disguised as artillery helicopters, he has conquered the most monstrous-looking kingdoms, defeated the resistance of the most demure princesses, has ..."

I interrupt Durito. It's evident he can spend pages and pages talking and I'm the one who gets criticized by the editors, especially when the communiques arrive so late at night.

"Fine, fine. But tell me, where are you going?"

"To the Federal District (México City)," Durito says, bending his sword. The final destination surprised Pegasus, because he kind of jumped, which, for a turtle is like a discreet sigh.

"Mexico?" I asked, incredulous.

"Sure! Do you think that just because Comcopa (government negotiating body) denied you passage, that would deter me?"

I wanted to warn Durito about speaking badly about Comcopa because the legislators are so sensitive and then they get mad during the TRIBUNA, but Durito continued:

"You should know I am an errant knight, and more Mexican than the fallout of the neoliberal economy. I have a right, therefore to go to the "city of palaces." What do they want palaces for in the DF if they're not so many as Durito says, and I recall that once he told me he was a miner in the state of Hidalgo and an oil worker in Tabasco.

Durito leaves. He takes a few hours to disappear behind the bush which is a few meters from my plastic roof. I get up and notice that my right boot is loose. I turn on the flashlight and I learn that ... the lace is missing! No wonder Pegasus' reins looked familiar. Now I have to wait until Durito returns from Mexico. I look for a reed to tie my boot and remember that I forgot to recommend that Durito visit that restaurant with the tiles. I lie down and dawn comes ...

Above me the sky clears, and with reddish blue eyes, is surprised to find that Mexico is still there, where it was yesterday. I light the pipe, look at the last slashes of night leave the trees, and say to myself that the struggle is long and it is worth it ...

The "Iran Story" in the western media

Iran has aroused seething passions in Americans, not only because of the deeply insulting seizure of the Tehran embassy, which was occupied by Iranian students on Nov. 4, 1979, but also as a result of the incredibly detailed, highly focused attention of the media to the event.

It is one thing to know that a country's diplomats have been seized and that Americans are incapable of freeing them; it is quite another thing watching it take place night after night on prime-time television. But we have reached a point where there is some need to critically evaluate the meaning of "the Iran story," as it has been called. We need to understand its presence in the American consciousness rationally and dispassionately, especially since around 90 percent of what Americans have come to know about Iran is through radio, television and newspapers.

Syed Mohammed Ali Raza

There is no way of mitigating the hurt and outrage caused by holding the Americans hostages, nor the conflicts caused within the Islamic world, but the United States was smart not to use military force, except on one occasion, the famous failed Cobra Operation. In any event we must start to take stock of what Iran has been to the Americans in the general context of United States and Western relations with the Islamic world: how it has looked, how it was literally presented and re-presented to the Americans day after day.

Iran took up much of the mighty network news immediately after the embassy was seized. For several months ABC scheduled a daily late evening special, "America Held Hostage," and PBS's "MacNeil/Lehrer Report" ran an unprecedented number of shows on the crisis. For months Walter Cronkite would add to his "that's the way it is," a reminder of how many days the hostages had been in captivity: "two hundred and seventh day" and so on. State Department spokesman Hodding Carter achieved star status within about two weeks.

Interviews with Abolhassan Bani-Sadr, with Sadegh Ghotbzadeh and with parents of hostages, alternated regularly with Iranian demonstrators. Three-minute courses on the history of Islam, bulletins from the former Shah's hospital, solemn faced commentators and experts analyzing, reflecting, debating, haranguing and advancing theories, courses of action, speculations about the future interpretations of events, psychologies, Soviet moves and Muslim reactions. Still the 50 odd Americans remained incarcerated.

Throughout the period, it became evident that the Iranians were using the media to what they considered their advantage, a consideration certainly not lost on the networks. Frequently, the students in the embassy would schedule "events" to meet satellite deadlines and nightly news broadcasts in the United States. From time to time Iranian officials indicated that it was their plan to turn the American people against the policy of their government.

Later on, the policy had a peculiar, not altogether unwelcome effect, which was to stimulate the media to a more genuinely investigative attitude. But what should be discussed here is how Iran appeared to the Americans during the most intense period of the crisis.

Much of the most dramatic news of the past two decades, including not only Iran, but the Arab-Israeli conflict, oil, the Iran-Iraq war, the Kashmir issue between Pakistan and India, the Persian Gulf war, and Afghanistan, has been the news of "Islam." The media has even portrayed regional conflicts as religious disagreements, generally with the Muslim side being portrayed as vicious masses of aggressors.

Nowhere was this more evident than in the long Iranian crisis during which the American consumer of news was given a sustained diet of information about people, culture, a religion — really no more than poorly defined and badly misunderstood abstraction — always in the case of Iran, represented as militant, dangerous and anti-American.

What makes the Iranian crisis a good occasion for examining the media's performance is exactly what made it understandably agonizing for so many Americans: its duration and the fact that Iran came to symbolize American relations with the Muslim world.

Finding my Cape Verdean identity in Afrika

Lumumba Fernandes

I am Cape Verdean. This means to me that I am an Afrikan, the original people, who have been stripped of their tongue to dcal and communicate with our oppressor, the capitalist–imperialist–colonialist Portuguese. My forefathers and foremothers, in order to be understood, attempted to speak the oppressor's language, Portuguese.

Thus trying to voice our frustration, we mimic Portuguese while simultaneously fusing it with our original tongue — which we don't know anymore — through years that turned into decades that became centuries. Some Cape Verdeans wrongly call this language crioulo. Nevertheless, they are die-hard, brainwashed and internally oppressed Cape Verdeans. Many Cape Verdeans think sincerely and whole- heartedly that this is their "true" language. I think they are absolutely wrong.

Cape Verdeans should stop referring to themselves as crioulo. Why? Because the word crioulo dissassociated ourselves with our great, magnificent Afrikan heritage. This scheme was designed by the Portuguese colonialists to separate ourselves from our brothers and sisters while at the same time differentiating themselves from us. Is Cape Verde an independent Afrikan nation of Afrikans? If so, then why call ourselves crioulo? Stick to Cape Verdean as your nationality but Afrikan as your roots. We must first and foremost, and always and forever, remember that the first and true Cape Verdeans were pure enslaved Afrikans.

The original Cape Verdean women — the Afrikan women who rock the cradle of civilization — were viciously, savagely and brutally raped by the lustful Portuguese oppressors; real brutes. Thus our pure Afrikan identity and blood were forever polluted and smeared by, once again, the brutal, barbaric rape of the Afrikan women in the plantations, which completely demoralized and destroyed the backbone of our family and our community. This was one of, if not, the greatest sinful, criminal and atrocious act ever committed, in my opinion, in the annals of human existence.

It polluted their being psychologically, mentally and spiritually. It also created a state and condition of infinite terror, shame, disgrace, low-integrity, lack of self-esteem and self-worth. Humanity was annihilated from our beautiful queens by the lascivious, licentious, dissolute, bestial capitalist–imperialist–colonialist Portuguese oppressors.

Those Cape Verdeans with Portuguese blood should despise and hate every single drop of it to the fullest extent possible until no end. That's right, never forget! If they do accept it, given the acknowledge truth of the account above, they must be sick and insane to recognize it as legitimate, as a precious metal like gold. They should know that their Portuguese blood does not originate from true love. They should always and forever consider themselves as part of a greater whole — Afrikans.

However, I completely understand that some Cape Verdeans have branches in the tree of our ancestry that trace to other continents, but they cannot and should not neglect their true racial identity comes from their Afrikan roots. In order to truly understand the branches they must understand and know their roots. What is a tree, or a people, without its roots?

In the present day, the psychological departure from the system established by the colonialists after their physical departure is the greatest obstacle for most Cape Verdeans in destroying the colonialist mentality. Many Cape Verdeans have been victims of removing this unconscious badge of inferiority complex due to the middlemen position between Afrikans and Portuguese. This came from a false love relationship with the Portuguese while also creating a false superiority complex when it comes to our brothers and sisters of Afrika.

Those who refuse to honestly admit these facts are the true victims of colonialism, imperialism and racism. They always proudly mention the Portuguese blood that they have. They fell in love with the Portuguese. It got them nowhere, instead they received more oppression. It just intensified their overall total confusion and internalized oppression.

People like Amil Cabral, one of the greatest Afrikan military geniuses, a revolutionary and an intellectual, would be utterly and completely anguished and disappointed with this colonialist mentality, which perpetuates the system which he willingly overthrew.

Finally, to those Afrikans from the mother-land or diaspora: you look silly, foolish and ignorant when you say that Cape Verdeans are not true Afrikans! Remember, my great-great-great grandfather could have been yours or in the same clan as yours. Believe me, we are all one family, one people, one community, one nation, whose members have been kidnapped, raped, enslaved and separated. Thus, we as Afrikans or Afrikan heritage people must forge our common identity of struggle, oppression, humiliation, pain and suffering as a catalyst to make sure that in the future this tribalism doesn't make us susceptible to the kind of oppression we have experienced in the past.

We must promote Pan–Afrikanism as our political, economic and social philosophy, which would enable a productive and successful future as a family, community and people.

JAMIE WALTERS
Jamie Walters
Atlantic Records

The question has again come up: why are television stars allowed to make records? There should be some kind of injunction sparing the general public from the wailings of prime-time TV stars who think they can sing.

Jamie Walters debut album Jamie Walters is the latest member of this dubious bunch of "recording" artists. He catapulted into the public eye like conjunctivitis with the song "How Do You Talk to an Angel?" a ditty made popular by the short-lived Fox show "The Heights." The concept of the show was simple — a group of twenty- somethings, struggling to make it big in the music industry — a plot stolen directly from the movie The Commitments.

Currently, Walters can be seen playing the guy-from-the- other-side-of-the-tracks, Ray Pruitt, on "Beverly Hills 90210." Beyond cheating on Donna and pissing and moaning about his music career, Walter's character doesn't do a whole lot. He headlines at the Peach Pit and sings songs off his album.

Sadly, the songs suck. Walters delivers them all in this throaty growl that is supposed to sound sexy, but instead sounds like he needs a strong dose of Ex-Lax.

The song "Hold On" is popular on top-40 radio stations, but will be as short-lived as Jack Wagner's "All I Need" (Remember him? He played Frisco on "General Hospital" — he also thought he could sing.).

If you really feel you need this album, wait six months. It's a guarantee that it will be on the bargain racks with albums by Wagner, David Hasselhoff, Don Johnson, Bruce Willis and Brian Austin Green. F (Tracy Monahan)

ORBUS TERRARUM
The Orb
Island Records

Trax On Trax Off

Beep. Blip. Whirl. Drone.

Welcome to The Orb's latest album Orbus Terrarum — their latest jaunt through the world of ambient techno, and the sonic equivalent of listening to a computer cough and spurt along like a broken down truck.

Ambient techno has always been music for only a selected few, since actually calling it music has always been debatable. Usually what one gets when tuning into the genre is a vast soundscape that makes for a wonderful soundtrack to drug-hazed evenings on the couch — but little else.

The Orb has always been on the cutting edge of this genre (along with Aphex Twin), mixing humor, soundbites and samples into the heady swirl and dub beats that are now obligatory. Only with Orbus Terrarum the whole affair is starting to wear a little thin. With songs clocking in anywhere between seven and 17 minutes, The Orb really are trying to see how far they can push listener's patience.

Song titles are not important here, nor are actual songs for that matter. The album is really nothing more than an 80 minute collage of sound that is trying to be cutting edge, but comes off as a pretentious modern version of that horror- inducing stuff that Pink Floyd whipped up in the early '70s. BIG HIT
Nitzer Ebb
Geffen Records

Nitzer Ebb first enjoyed critical attention back in 1984. Now, four albums later, the duo from Essex, England have resurfaced to present an album bursting the sort of optimism you would get mixing Morrissey with a good dose of Nine Inch Nails in the chemistry lab.

This may in fact be due to their slightly balding appearance, and it is through this theme that the relative merits of the "big hit" can be deciphered. Nitzer Ebb is a fusion of spirited monologue and industrial strength techno noise.

The vocals often find form in a stream of consciousness which rolls smoothly over the slightly anarchic backing. While once dominantly computer driven, Nitzer Ebb have returned to their guitars for Big Hit. The result is way off target.

The opening track "Cherry Blossom," is a heated attack on the material motives behind U.S. led intervention in the Gulf War. Guitar chords are fed through a fuzz-box to form the background upon which Doug McCarthy, the lead vocalist, "sings." Unfortunately, McCarthy expresses himself with the eloquence of a particularly passive piece of plywood.

Returning to the balding theme, Big Hit is definitely sparse. The power and force of Nitzer Ebb live is totally lost in the recording and as a selection of original tunes, Big Hit does little to inspire new growth. Rather, it symbolizes a transfer of follicles from one part of the body to another. This recycling of material does not bode well. One gleam of new life appears in the forth track, "I Thought." A personal plea that sets the listener off on one of those Sunday morning, cup of coffee and burning cigarette meanderings. But this does little to save Big Hit from being mediocre. New film revives cynics' faith in true horror genre

By Michael Pessah

VILLAGE OF THE DAMNED
Directed by John Carpenter
With Christopher Reeve, Kirstie Alley
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

John Carpenter's Village of the Damned begins like every other cliche horror movie. The viewers' fear of the unexpected is heightened by the helicopter shots of a secluded village. The frame is filled with an eerie fog, and there is spooky whispering in the background. Soon we are introduced to the stereotypical residents of Midwhich. There's the town drunkard, the good doctor (Christopher Reeve), the hunky construction worker, and the nutty priest (a kitschy Mark Hamill) and everyone else — who all manage to look like they walked out of a Land's End catalogue.

Small town life continues as usual until one day everyone suddenly drops to the ground. People fall off their motorcycles, slump into their barbecues, float in their bathtubs ... even the livestock slides over. Of course, nobody can explain this phenomena, and a suspicious looking government scientist is brought in (Kirstie Alley). Eventually, everyone recovers, and life returns to normal. This is until all the women discover that they are pregnant.

Despite it's seemingly mundane beginning Village of the Damned has restored my faith in Hollywood ability to make horror movies. One can hardly blame me for doubting Hollywood, considering its recent record. Lately, "horror" movies have been either ineffective, bloated, overproduced ego-vehicles for big name directors (Dracula, Frankenstein, Wolf, Interview with a Vampire), or slashers that are so predictable that the script reads like an 83 page Mad Libs form. Neither are particularly scary, and both were pioneered by John Carpenter.

I interpret Village of the Damned as John Carpenter's reach for cinematic redemption. Perhaps it is his attempt to undo the damage he has rendered on the horror movie: a genre lacking in snob appeal but ultimately more challenging to execute than the trendy "philosopher with magnum" movies that have recently passed for art.

Carpenter started his career in Hollywood with remarkably frightening Halloween, a film so well made that critical community labeled him "the next Hitchcock." Carpenter, like fellow Hitchcock wannabe Brian De Palma, then went into self-destruct mode. Carpenter followed Halloween up by directing some scenes in Halloween II, and then (this time producing) Halloween III. By bastardizing his own work, he almost singlehandedly inspired the slasher movie craze of the '80s.

Carpenter's other significant film was The Thing, a film that essentially removed all of the scary parts from a 1952 film, and replaced them with amazingly disgusting special effects. Once again, Carpenter starts a trend — a big name director remaking a classic horror movie, emphasizing Fangoria-style special effects, instead of a genuinely creepy screenplay. It is also worth mentioning that though Carpenter certainly wasn't responsible for Hollywood's love affair with the ubiquitous Stephen King, he hardly resisted churning out several flaccid Stephen King adaptations.

I earnestly hope that Village of the Damned will be a watershed moment for horror movies, returning them to their earlier state of eeriness. Carpenter's idea of establishing a mythic, horror movie town only to disrupt all of it's conventions is a coup, especially considering that lately all horror movies have consisted of little but conventions.

Village of the Damned is inspired by the 1960's British thriller Children of the Damned, which was based on the John Wyndham's 1957 novel The Midwhich Cuckoos. The story builds steam when all the women of Midwhich decide to give birth to their babies, encouraged by money offered by the National Institute of Health. The children, not surprisingly, turn out to be somewhat peculiar. They possess an uncanny intelligence, are devoid of all 'human' emotion, and act as if they shared a single brain. When they goose- step down the street, with their Sunday school uniforms and bold platinum coifs they look as if Dennis the Menace and Patti Duke walked off their sitcoms, manic-panicked their hair, and joined the Hitler-Youth.

The doctor's daughter appears to be their leader, and is played by Lindsay Haun. Her performance is remarkable. She resists portraying the child as a simplistic boogey man (boogey person?) and exudes a rare confidence even when she is interacting with the imposing Christopher Reeve. Haun acts as if she is aware of her cuteness and doesn't like it one bit. She should have been brought in to tutor Macauley Culkin during the production of The Good Son.

Another strong aspect of Village of the Damned is Carpenter's comfort with the material. He is aware that the story is dated, but instead of trying to 'modernize' it with gross-out effects, he uses it's antiquated feel to his advantage. He crafts Midwhich as if it were one of those antiquated horror movie towns that never exist in real life. The mood is one of an older film, so when things start to get ugly the violence becomes truly shocking. Carpenter similarly borrows a trick from classic horror films by not questioning the ridiculously implausible events, instead of burying the viewer in even more ridiculous pseudo-science. He has realized that if he treats the subject with enough seriousness, and the actors follow through, then the audience is inclined to do likewise.

The inspiration for Village of the Damned seems to have come from the true horror movies of the '50s and '60s, films like Carnival of Souls and Night of the Living Dead. These films were successful because their horror relied on an intimate knowledge of what genuinely frightens people, not desensitizing carnage or cheap surprises. I only counted four moments in Village of the Damned where things jumped out from around corners, an auspicious achievement. Though it certainly isn't for the squeamish, the film is also strangely low on the slaughter meter. There were several times that Village of the Damned cut away from violence — proving once again that the imagination is always more horrifying than anything Industrial Light & Magic can produce.

Village of the Damned is efficient and scary, unlike any mainstream 'horror' movie released recently. I hope it makes money and would-be screenwriters watch it, so I will never have to review another Mangler or Candyman. As for Mr. Carpenter, a couple more films like this might get me to forget about Body Bags or the Rowdy Roddy Piper classic They Live. A-

FAC trying to attract more students

Next semester will feature $5 ticket prices for new series

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

In order to boost student participation and interest, the Fine Arts Center's Center Series — a new ticket policy for Five College students — has been created.

According to Shawn Farley, director of marketing and development for FAC, all tickets for Center Series performances will be $5. This ticket price is applicable for any seat in the Fine Arts Center concert hall and Bowker Auditorium.

Originally, students were able to purchase tickets to events like this semester's Guys and Dolls and A Closer Walk With Patsy Cline for half-price. But now, students will be able to see quality, professional performances at an incredible price.

"Coming up in September the ticket prices will be $5. This includes things like Broadway shows," said Farley. "This is a good chance for students who want to see these shows get really great seats before they are sold out. The new folder for next season isn't coming out until May 31 so students can get tickets ahead of time."

Next season will also mark the 20th anniversary of the Fine Arts Center. A special student's day will be incorporated in the festivities on Sept. 7 in collaboration with the Student Activities First Week Activities.

Some of the highlights of next season will be the Tony Award-winning shows Crazy for You (Sept. 22), Will Rogers Follies (Dec. 2) and the play She Loves Me (April 21, 1996).

For those interested in more modern sounds, The Guitar Summit (Oct. 17) which will feature contemporary guitar greats like Jorma Kaukonen (Jefferson Airplane) and Steve Morse (Dixi Dregs, the Steve Morse Band and Kansas.)

Dance enthusiasts can enjoy the Ballet National de Caracas (Oct. 22), Paul Taylor Dance Company (Feb. 22, 1996) and Saeko Ichinohe and Company (Nov. 9).

Events that will enable students to experience other cultures include the National Cuban Folkloric Dance Ensemble (Feb. 9, 1996), Mummenschanz (April 6) and Maija Of Chaggaland (Sept. 22, 1996), a New WORLD Theater production.

The Visual Arts division of the Fine Arts Center include the 25th Anniversary of the Annual Black Musicians Conference: "The Revolution Returns: The Next Generation in Jazz" (April 1-5, 1996) and several new exhibitions in all four of the campus galleries.

Students should really take advantage of this excellent opportunity to see first rate performances at an incredible price and explore the many facets of the Fine Arts Center. For more information on the upcoming season and the new ticket policy, students should call the Fine Arts Center at 545-2511.

albums of that year; though many of its reviews were tainted by a lingering suspicion. The cover depicted a snake-hipped Whitley, his lank hair and 1928 National steel guitar barely visible under some sun-baked shack.

Surely Whitley was just another skinny, white boy with a Howlin' Wolf obsession, more likely to meet the A&R man at the crossroads than the devil? However, none of this seemed to matter once the needle hit the black — he had the voice of Mick and the riffs of Keith. With his bottle-neck slide and pick used extensively on the Thelma and Louise score, the words "Ry" and "Cooder" were crossing many people's lips.

Which all goes to make Din Of Ecstasy such a disappointment. Whitley has made a leap from '20s blues to '70s, and early '80s, white noise, goodbye Mississippi Delta, hello CBGB's. The album has none of the sensitivity or subtly of Law and Whitley's evocative, gritty lyrics have been exchanged for narcotic-soaked beat poetry. Distinctly lacking are those old essentials "song" and "melody" and it comes over as some Television outtakes or Sonic Youth after Thurston's read a bad review.

His National steel and haunting falsetto, his sharpest foils are only dusted off for one track, "New Machine" — a grain of sugar in a tub of lemons. What Whitley does not realize is that the bands he is emulating (Sonic Youth, JAMC) realized that the Velvet's had melody too, in between the art-rock musing and black rollnecks. Whitley drowns every song in a squawking guitar, which sounds like he's putting a parrot through a blender as opposed to making music. Din Of Ecstasy? Din ... period! D (Gareth Curtis)

Brown is one of few top teams to use a platoon in goal, where UMass may either find sophomore Greg Cattrano or junior Dan Gianuzzi. Cattrano has played 12 games to Gianuzzi's eight, but Gianuzzi has more career experience and better numbers (.586 save percentage, 7.35 goals against average).

The Bears go for the kill before halftime, as they have outscored opponents 56-23 in the second quarter.

Extra man opportunities should factor into today's outcome. Brown is deadly (28 of 63, 44.4-percent), with a gallery of straight shooters such as Brian McNally (25 goals, 37.9-percent shooting) and Josh Selig (22 goals on only 41 shots, 53.7 percent shooting).

It also kills them well, holding foes to only a 20.7-percent (17 of 82) success rate.

Cannella said he believes UMass must shoot more, particularly in extra man situations. The Minutemen haven't scored a man-up goal since connecting on 2 of 3 chances in beating Notre Dame. They have gone 0-for-12 in their last two games.

"When you play championship games, you have to convert extra man opportunities," Cannella said. "We haven't shot the ball well. Our defense has been good, we've hustled, we've hit, but we've got to shoot better, especially when we have the extra man."

The New England Championship can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM, the flagship station for UMass men's lacrosse, beginning with the pre-game at 2:50 p.m. Game time is 3 p.m.

The smell of the Italian sausages from the vendor's parked outside the building, and the odor of beer on the breath of a colorful drunk seated next to you in obstructed view.

The sound of "Hey Ice Cream," and tuxedoed Rene Rancourt and Ran Harry playing of the Star Spangled Banner, but the most memorable sound would always be the roar of the crowd.

The small building's acoustics magnified the sound of the fans 'til the building felt like it might shake free of its Causeway Street foundation.

Hockey will still be played in Boston, in that building named for the bank, and memories will be made there, too. But the roar won't be as loud and the feeling just won't be the same. The team won't be the same either. For those 67 years, the teams were molded to play on the tiny ice surface, as the Bruins stand at 1,314 wins 622 losses and 312 ties in the Gah-den. Next year's squad may not be fleet enough to handle their new surroundings.

All in all, as I wait for the September wrecking ball, and the "progress" it will supposedly bring, you can have your luxury boxes, and your fancy scoreboards and your comfortable chairs, you'll still miss obstructed views and hard wooden seats that goes along with one perk the new building won't have, tradition. As I said before, all good things must come to an end. But to the team, to the sport, and to the fans, thanks for the memories.

distinction this past year.

"[Lucia] is big, strong and skilled," Massachusetts coach Joanie O'Brien said. "She can score around the baseline and she can come out and shoot from 15 feet."

As a junior at David Prouty, Madajova averaged 17.1 points and was named to the Worcester Telegram & Gazette All-Star team and the Southern Worcester County League All-Star team.

"Lucia will give us additional size on the front line next year," O'Brien said. "She has good offensive skills, and is a hard worker. She is also a very intelligent player. Lucia will definitely challenge the returning starters for playing time next season."

How much playing time Madajova will get is dependent upon how the other players play, in addition to game circumstances.

"I'd love to see her get 10–20 minutes but it depends on game situations," O'Brien said. "She loves to run so she's going to be in shape."

Madajova is the second recruit to be signed by the Minutewomen for next season. Yolanda Rayside, from New York City, was signed last week.

"[Lucia's] a good player. She's really going to be one of those spoon fed kids," O'Brien said. "She can shoot the ball and put the ball to the floor. She's a step ahead of most other freshman; she's going to help us out.

"She'll be a very positive addition to the team. She has a willingness to win and she'll come across as a good influence on the team."

her four goals this weekend."

Barbara Hickey, who broke her thumb in the last game, also played exceptionally well, according to Newcomb.

"Barbara is such a good influence for this team. She really turns on that speed when she needs to. Barbara had a ton of blocks and steals for us over the weekend, and has really developed into a good player this year," Newcomb said.

If there was one constant negative throughout the tournament, it was the team's shooting percentage. The Minutewomen mustered a total of only 27 goals on 82 attempts (a mere 30.4 problem), a problem he will be looking to amend for next year.

"We had some problems offensively," said Newcomb. "But overall we had a great season. The entire team really feels good about themselves. Plus we have everybody coming back for next year.

"We wanted to beat a ranked team this season and win a game in this tournament. We did both. It was nice to notice that people are standing up and starting to notice that this school has a women's water polo team."

who threw home trying to nail Houchin at the plate.

But as Minutewomen catcher Michele Shaw tried to catch the ball, she was plowed over by Houchin and the ball got away allowing her to score the game-tying run. It looked like the runner had interfered with Shaw but there was no call by the umpires, causing Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino to be livid.

"It had to be interference because she came to get the ball and the kid put up her shoulder and took her out in the head. What are you going to do? No guts, no glory," she said. "There was a bunch of bad calls. I was just glad it didn't hurt us."

The Minutewomen got their first run of the second game in the bottom of the fifth inning when Shaw led off the inning by beating out a grounder to short. Powell then sacrificed Shaw to second, and Jodi Sorenson, in turn, sacrificed her to third. Shaw scored on a Tracey Oiser blooper to center that dropped in for a hit.

Ortega, through seven innings, allowed one run on four hits while striking out one.

"Dani's a young pitcher and she kept her cool [in the seventh]. She held very well, she came through," Sortino said. "She has all the makings of doing very, very well here. I'm so pleased with her getting this win."

Kelly Daut picked up her 22nd win in the first game to tie Holly Aprile (1989–92) for the UMass single-season record. The senior hurler, in pitching her seventh shutout of the season, gave up just four hits and did not allow a runner past second base. She also struck out six batters to put her season total up to 154.

"I'm glad to see her in the record books," Sortino said.

The Minutewomen scored the only run they would need in the first game in the top of the first inning when Stephanie Mareina (1-for-2) scored on a Chris Martens (2-for-3) double. Freshman first baseman Kim Gutridge continued to hit the ball well, notching three hits in three at-bats.

"What's good about it [the sweep] is that they [the Minutewomen] are a very young team," Sortino said. "They held their poise. They could've pressed and gone ballistic in the seventh inning [of the second game]."

The Minutewomen improve to 34–17 on the year while BC drops to 28–21. Sortino was pleased with the sweep.

"This [BC] is a good team," she said. "This is a team that split twice with UConn. This is a team that is second in the Big East going into their tournament. There's no doubt that they can play."

UMass will now head into the Atlantic 10 tournament on a high note. The tournament will begin this Friday at Totman Field and UMass will be the No. 1 seed. In the first round they will play No. 4 seed Rhode Island at 4 p.m. while No. 2 seed Rutgers plays No. 3 seed St. Joseph's at 2 p.m.

"The kids are looking forward to the weekend. They feel good about it," Sortino said.

Soccer's my favorite sport to watch live, but when I watch baseball on t.v. I call all the strikes, balls, slides into bases and the close calls using my VCR to record and playback. I call them the way I see them. I keep careful records. So, my final scores and the rest of the world's final scores are usually different.

Most people will say Red Sox vs Oakland was 0 to 3, but I might say it was 6 to 4.

No one asks me for final scores the next day .....or even for my opinion about the games anymore.

By the end of the season, my World Series' contenders are different from the world's.

I don't mind. After I lost my girlfriend in '88 nothing bothers me.

Pileski, Minutemen roll over Catamounts

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

Nobody was perfect yesterday afternoon at Earl Lorden Field, but Mark Pileski's performance against the University of Vermont came pretty close.

Vermont	6
Massachusetts	19

The shortstop for the University of Massachusetts baseball team went 5-for-5 with a home run, two triples, two doubles and five runs batted in to lead the Minutemen offense in a 19–6 romp of the Catamounts. However, Pileski's flawless day came to an end in the ninth inning when a grounder found its way under his glove, opening the flood gates for Vermont's four-run final frame.

Even though the game was out of reach, Pileski wouldn't allow himself to forget the error.

"It was just a case of not concentrating," Pileski said. "We always say that good teams play their best all the time, and I didn't finish the game off well."

The Minutemen improved to 29–9 with the victory, while Vermont drops to 25–13. Massachusetts came into the contest ranked No. 2 in New England, one place ahead of the Catamounts. The win was Massachusetts coach Mike Stone's 208th of his career, moving him into second place in Minuteman history.

Massachusetts freshman righthander Scott Barnsby (3–2) picked up the win, allowing only one run on seven hits in six innings of work. He also struck out three Catamounts.

The game remained scoreless until the bottom of the third, when Massachusetts second baseman Muchie Dagliere laced a chalk-raising double down the rightfield line, plating first baseman Justin Kelly and giving the Minutemen a 1–0 lead.

Centerfielder Nate Murphy blasted the very next pitch from Vermont starter Todd Somerset (two and two-thirds innings, six hits, three earned runs, four strikeouts) 425 feet over the rightfield fence and off the Mullins Center practice rink for his fourth HR of the season.

Murphy became the second player ever to hit the building in a contest, and said he was talking about accomplishing the feat before the game with the Catamounts.

"[Designated hitter] Jeff Michaels hit the top of the building on the green in batting practice," Murphy said. "I told him I was envious of the guys on the team who could smash it that far. I guess I could, too."

But the story of the day for the Minutemen was Pileski and his bid for the cycle at the plate. The junior hit a double in the second inning, cranked consecutive triples in the third and the fifth, and capped off the day in the eighth with the homer and another double in his final time at the plate. He said the thought of hitting for the cycle was on his mind.

"Before the at-bat, I was thinking about pulling up lame when I rounded first," Pileski joked, "But I figured it would be showing Vermont up, so I didn't. I can live with a double."

The Minutemen put the game out of reach by pummelling Vermont pitching, en route to a 10–run, eighth inning, which included Pileski's and Michaels' back–to–back jacks, a Nate Murphy single with the bases loaded, and Bill Knight's 14th dinger of the season, a grand slam.

From the press box: Massachusetts sophomore pitcher Jason Bennett earned Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week honors for his performance (3–0, 1.58 ERA) last week ... Massachusetts is back in action today at Earl Lorden Field, entertaining Northeastern. Game time is 3 p.m. and sophomore David Dart will get the start.

A wild pitch by Boston College pitcher Liz Walker in the bottom of the seventh inning of game two allowed Heather Dorsey to score the winning run to complete the doubleheader sweep by the Minutewomen yesterday (1–0 and 2–1) at Totman Field.

UMass held a 1–0 lead going into the top of the seventh. BC third baseman/pitcher Alexis Beckman led off the inning with a single to left and then was lifted for pinch runner Kelly Houchin. After the next batter popped up to second baseman Amy Powell, BC's Kelly Cross smacked a base hit up the middle, putting runners on first and second.

Sophomore pitcher Dani Ortega (12–9) then walked the next batter, Diane Croff, to load the bases. Laura Thompson, an Amherst native, hit a grounder to shortstop Kelly Buckley,

Pole reminisces about Garden

BOSTON — All good things must come to an end. It's cliche, but it really fits the mood.

I look around and I see history. I see banners of championships past and the numbers of some of the greatest players ever to play professional sports. Ahh ...

Pardon my rudeness, let me introduce myself. I am a pole. Yes, a pole, one of many columns that has held up the historic Boston Garden for the past 67 years. We poles are rather legendary, being part of one of the few arenas in the nation that still has them, and are even more legendary to the many people that have been forced to sit behind us over the years.

Personally, I stand in section 44, and while a large number of my colleagues are fans of the Celtics, my heart lies with the Bruins, as does the hearts of many fans in this town.

At UMass, you boast of your classiest fans in America... well, none of those fans made it into this building on a regular basis.

Bruin fans do cheer against the other team, wearing t– shirts that say things like "Canadiens suck. Roy swallows," and other insulting remarks that have been drenched in small $4.25 cups of beer.

But you can't really blame them, because, hey, the players on the ice haven't exactly set angelic examples, either. More than a few goons have donned the Black and Gold, making their living with their fists. Stan Jonathan, Jay Miller and John Weinsick, just to name a few.

In fact, I remember a playoff game in the early '80s when Terry O'Reilly, upset with a call made by referee Andy VanHellemond, skated out of the penalty box and fed him a right hook. That little move cost O'Reilly a 10–game suspension.

The Bruins were so disgusted with his behavior that they ... made him the captain a few years later and eventually the coach. These weren't the patsy Los Angeles Kings, these were the legendary Big Bad Bruins who could put fear into anybody.

Not all of the 633 players to wear a Boston uniform were ruffians. Some of the most talented players displayed those talents in this building.

Ray Bourque and the charismatic Cam Neely are the guardians of the traditions. There were some brilliant goaltenders, like Terry Sawchuck and Mr. Zero Frank Brimsek, but the most exciting player ever to step foot in the Garden ice was a baby faced wonder named Robert Gordon Orr.

Bobby Orr was magical. His end–to–end rushes revolutionized his position and the sport of hockey itself.

It was Orr that provided the Garden and the entire sport of hockey its most memorable moment. In the 1970 Stanley Cup finals, Orr's game and championship winning goal, and his flight following it was the most memorable moment ever in the NHL. Ever.

UMass, Brown to battle for NE championship

COLLEGIAN FILE

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will travel to Providence, R.I., to take on New England foe Brown this afternoon (3 p.m.).

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Since there are only two teams eligible for the title, it's an inescapable conclusion that the New England Championship has more than imaginary significance.

It's a safe bet that only the winner between No. 10 Massachusetts (6–4) and No. 9 Brown (8–5) at 3 p.m. at Stevenson Field in Providence will hear its name called when the 12–team field is announced for the NCAA tournament.

The Minutemen must win today and also Saturday at Army to reach the post season. UMass coach Greg Cannella hopes momentum won't be lacking in the second leg of one of the toughest two–game stretches a team can face.

"It's not even worth talking about, it's just the way the schedule is," Cannella said. "If our guys aren't up for this game, they know they're going to get beat."

Brown's record is less than spectacular, but it posted quality wins over Loyola, Dartmouth and Cornell and hasn't lost by more than three goals.

"Brown is a smart team, very well coached (by Peter Lasagna), with a great defensive scheme and they know their limitations on offense," Cannella said. "They get it to the right people, and they have experience in big games."

Getting the ball to junior sniper David Evans is a priority for the Bears. He's scored 41 goals on 100 shots this year (41–percent). As a comparison, consider UMass' Brendan Glass' totals: 33 goals on 88 shots, a 37.5–percent clip.

UMass' close defense unit, led by Vinny Dello–Iacono, will devote as much attention to Evans as opposing defenses do to Glass.

"He's outstanding," Cannella said of Evans. "One of the best attackmen in America."

Though its attack is proficient, having outscored opponents 181–126 this year, Brown's strength lies on defense. In last season's 12–7 win over UMass, the Bears held the Minutemen to 30 shots and picked up 40 ground balls to UMass' 17. UMass' attack will be looking at the same imposing defense that includes All–American Greg Rozycki.

The Pioneer Valley has served Lasagna well, providing him with Longmeadow's Chris Martinelli, a superb midfielder who can score (eight goals, 11 assists, 19 points).

Minutewomen ranked No. 20 in nation

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

Last weekend, the University of Massachusetts women's water polo team accomplished some significant firsts in the Eastern Championship at Providence, R.I., their final tournament of the season.

The very first accomplishment was realized before the Minutewomen, who were led throughout by the play of sophomore Vicki Baymond, played a single game. For the first time in the history of the program, the team is nationally–ranked, checking in at No. 20 in the most recent poll.

As far as the tournament itself went, UMass finished 2–3, while playing four other ranked teams. The games included, in chronological order, a 10–1 loss to No. 9 Maryland, a 10– 7 loss to No. 12 Brown, a 7–6 win over No. 16 Princeton, an 8–5 win over Wesleyan (Conn.), and an 8–4 loss to No. 15 Bucknell.

The victory over the Tigers marked the first time in school history that UMass has beaten a nationally–ranked team. Overall, Massachusetts coach Bob Newcomb was very pleased with his squad.

"We represented ourselves very well this weekend," he said. "It was a positive experience for everyone on the team. The one disappointment was our first game against Maryland, but I don't want to dwell on that. We beat the teams we really needed to beat."

By doing so, the team held on to its sixth seed given to them before the start of the tourney. After the fiasco with the Terrapins, where they committed a whopping 34 turnovers, UMass buckled down and played some of their best polo of the year. The three–point loss to Brown was a five–point improvement over their last meeting, where the Minutewomen were trounced, 13–5.

Newcomb credits the wins over Princeton and Wesleyan, and the strong play against Bucknell, to both superior individual performances and great play, collectively.

"Vicky Baymond was such a force for us," said Newcomb. "She played outstanding at that two–meter position, scoring eleven goals over the weekend.

"Jessica Griffith had a great weekend, also. She was just all over the place for us in the goal. Mirca Martinez Cruz continued her strong play, too. Her swimming speed led to

Panelists discuss diversity efforts in US workforce

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Panelists from academic and corporate ranks offered their insight on the changing face of the American job market on Tuesday evening.

The forum, entitled "Moving Toward a Diverse Workplace," focused on four major points surrounding the development of the ideal work environment.

According to Undergraduate Business Club President Dan Castellano, these basic issues were clarifying the current state of affirmative action, resolving existing conflicts, heightening multicultural awareness and addressing minority recruitment practices.

Affirmative action on campus

Fine Arts Center director Frederick Tillis, who is also involved in the UMass Affirmative Action/Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) program, was the first panelist to speak.

Tillis noted the University of Massachusetts' annual federally required affirmative action plan goes beyond the necessary facts and figures to include evaluations from various deans and vice chancellors.

Critique of the present government backlash against affirmative action was also included in Tillis' presentation, a trend which Tillis said strongly contrasts with his own personal views.

"In a sense, [affirmative action] is about learning how to work within a diverse population," he said.

Gloria Ortiz, a fellow EEO worker, echoed Tillis' sentiment on affirmative action, adding her own perspective on the University's commitment to the policy.

"We always look for initiatives to move forward," she said. "Nowhere does it say that we hire without proper qualifications."

Ortiz then noted that, contrary to the popular belief that blacks benefit most from affirmative action, women are actually the greatest beneficiaries.

Following Ortiz was Mzamo Mangaliso, a South African–born management professor, who said his stance on affirmative action stems from the stark reality of his homeland, where few blacks were able to escape poverty during the country's racist regime.

Mangaliso said he found through research that in the biblical time of Moses, women received 60 percent of the comparable male wages, a statistic that has only risen 11 percentage points in the years that followed.

"The whole thing started off on an unfair basis," he said. "It's like trying to run a race starting 20 meters behind the starting line, and you're expected to stay at the same pace."

The corporate arena

Loctite executive and UMass alumnus Don Atencio further emphasized the need for minorities to be brought up to pace and said many in the business world are eager to aid in that advancement.

"We look at diversity as a competitive advantage," he said of his company's efforts to recruit quality candidates. "It's not good enough to say, 'We need to bring X number of minorities in.' I think it's criminal to go out and recruit that way."

Although several technical journals directed toward women and minorities exist, Atencio said that Loctite has ceased placing recruitment advertisements in these publications, due to the targeted readers being generally aware of the corporate opportunities available to them without the advertisements.

"I have yet to hear someone say to me, 'Gee, I read about your major corporation in a certain journal,'" he said. "There is no correlation."

The evening's final panelists, General Electric representatives Jim Torres and Andre McDaniel, said branching out to employees and customers is vital to the diversity process.

"People can't be brought to their fullest potential," said Torres, an 1982 UMass alumni. "If they don't feel respected by their peers."

McDaniel broadened Torres' statement to include the international scope of GE, a $60 billion a year corporation.

"In order to be effective enough to sell products into [a foreign country's] economy and environment, you need to be involved on a personal level," he said. "The only way to be effective is to have a diverse population in our corporation."

Rally opposing Queer-Fest '95 hits opposition

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The Silent Majority co–organized what turned out to be a 10–minute rally in opposition to "Queer Fest '95" on the steps of the Student Union at the University of Massachusetts.

Philip N. Milson, chairman of the Silent Majority, called the object being protested "an abomination of society's standards."

Young Americans for Freedom also co–organized the rally, which was met with strong and heated reactions from the crowd. The two organizations are recognized on campus as conservative, and the Silent Majority publishes The Minuteman.

"Sodomy is illegal in the state of Massachusetts," said Milson, editor of the Minuteman. "For this reason alone, measures should be taken through law enforcement, to prevent events such as 'Queer Fest,' organizations such as the LBGA [Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance], and homosexuality in general."

The LBGA neither protested nor endorsed protesting the rally, according to Ashavan Doyon, LBGA political chair. Individuals voicing opposition were there by choice.

"I ... ask that you show respect to today's speakers as they most certainly would for you," Milson said. "Please do not interrupt the speakers, shout profanities, throw items at the podium, approach the podium or interfere in any way. This is a peaceful rally."

"Queer Fest" is a festival of pride for gays, lesbians, bisexuals, transgender people and their allies. It is scheduled to commence on campus at 11 a.m. today, according to Ward Henline, organizer of the event.

"Any lucid, reasonable person would plainly see that breaking the law is nothing to be proud of," Milson said. "There is no organized movement for the pride or acceptance of other deviants of society such as drug dealers, child molesters or murderers."

Members of the audience often yelled and screamed after what they perceived as incendiary remarks made by Milson. A protester held up a sign that read: "Freedom to love," while others wore pins that read "Gay rights are civil rights."

"Being gay is wrong any way you slice it," Milson said. "That, in essence, is my personal opinion on the issue."

He went on to cite what he called "hardcore statistical data."

"The average homosexual AIDS victim has over 1,100 sex–partners in their lifetime," he said.

At that point, a female protester yelled, "I wish!"

Paul R. Ferro, member of the Silent Majority and president of the Republican Club, took the podium when Milson completed his speech.

"Say no to events like 'Queer Fest' that pollute our campus with this sick and deviant behavior," Ferro said. "We will not stand by and watch our country destroyed from within by moral crimes like homosexuality.

"We ask you to stand with us and turn back the tide of immorality that is sweeping our great country. Stand on the side of decency. Stand on the side of morality."

Ferro paraphrased the Old Testament forbidding relations between members of the same sex as an abomination.

"Help us bring our country back to the moral high ground that it deserves," Ferro said. "Let's put homosexuality back where it belongs — back in the moral garbage heap."

The crowd reacted most loudly at this point in the rally, as two women approached the podium, faced the crowd and began to embrace and kiss.

"Let us walk together in our unity and strength when we say no to deviancy, no to sodomy, no to 'Queer Fest' and yes to morality," Ferro said. "Thank you and God bless America."

Ted Maravelias, a UMass alumnus who graduated in 1991, was scheduled to speak but cancelled at the last minute. He was the former editor of the Minuteman and former president of the Republican Club.

Report on UM from Scott and provost leads to debate

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The recent release of reports which outline the University of Massachusetts administrative mission has functioned as a jumping board for debate on various hot–button issues.

Faculty are currently looking over the reports in preparation for next week's Faculty Senate meeting, where the chancellor and the provost will be available for questions, according to Ed Connors, chair of the senate rules committee.

"There is a lot of material here that verges on potentially explosive," said Ernest May, chair of the department of music and dance.

The two reports, one drafted by the provost and the other by the chancellor, collectively attempt to set guidelines and objectives for achieving excellence in academics and research.

Unfortunately, the reports were released too late in the semester to truly conduct effective discourse and debate on the issues, May said.

The reports will be presented at the Board of Trustees meeting in June, May said. The trustees' timeline calls for implementation of the Chancellor David K. Scott's plans by the fall.

"The question is how the campus community is going to be able to collectively ponder material in a sensible way with these time constraints," May said.

Although the reports came later than had been expected, the process by which the data was collected was lengthy, Provost Patricia Crosson said.

Detailed reports were gathered from each department — a process which was time consuming but vitally important, Crosson said.

"It was essential to involve faculty and staff members," she said. "We need to chart our future together."

The reports put forward the issue of identity as a University, Crosson said. This entails that the campus discuss whether it is ready to strive towards membership with the Association of American Universities (AAU).

The AAU consists of renowned institutions of research, and membership relies heavily on the amount of money brought in for research, said Frank Hugus, head of the Germanic languages and literature department.

If the University was put in the position where it had to invest its scarce resources into departments that could potentially bring in the most money, reallocation could wipe out areas

Letter incites debate across UM campus

By Jessica Taverna

Although the author of a letter to The Massachusetts Daily Collegian declaring that the "Jewish identity" is "offensive to most" said her statement was not racially motivated, many disagree.

The Collegian has received a tremendous response opposing the views of retired University of Massachusetts professor Helen F. Cullen, according to Darienne J. Hosley, editor in chief. The newspaper has received approximately 20 letters, in addition to columns, phone calls and visits, since the letter was printed Tuesday.

All of the letters have been critical of Cullen's argument, Hosley said.

Cullen, a professor emeritus who taught mathematics at UMass for 43 years, wrote the letter in an effort to recite historical events and tried not

Vice chancellor Ron Story

Story makes final speech at Advancement Awards

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

This Wednesday's University Advancement Awards luncheon marked one of the final appearances of Ron Story as vice chancellor.

In this first year of the advancement awards, $500 awards were given to individuals voted to be the greatest advocates of the University of Massachusetts.

Story is stepping down as interim vice chancellor for student advancement. He is leaving the position to rejoin the history department as a scholar and a teacher.

Many students and peers said they had great respect for Story as an administrator.

"He's an amazing advocate for the University," said Marc Kenen of the Student Center for Educational Research (SCERA). "It makes me very sad that he's leaving as vice chancellor."

When he spoke to close the luncheon, Story began by saying it was a privilege and an honor to promote the University. He said his goal was to help build bridges between all facets of the University. The only way he found to do this was to give people free reign — suggest ways to coordinate with other groups, but never try to control.

"For only being vice chancellor a short amount of time, he's done a great job bringing about a positive outlook," said George Parks, director of the UMass marching band.

He also talked of the need to build a culture of advocacy here, which then builds public roots.

"If we were to stop advocating, we lose those roots," Story said.

What Story tried to do as vice chancellor was to bring people together, even a little bit, he said.

"What we've done is just the beginning. We succeeded during tough times in the legislature," Story said. "It's a good base, so don't stop, just keep going."

Story was not the only one honored at this ceremony.

The first of the awards went to Kenen and Lynn Robitaille for their work on SCERA.

Al Lizana, student representative on the University Board of Trustees, and Mirran Raphaely, last year's president of SGA also received awards.

"It's important to take the time to thank the University for advancing us," Lizana said.

The third recipient was Merilee Hill, director of the Video Instructional Program. This program broadcasts by satellite UMass classes to off-campus students, giving them the opportunity of receiving degrees in certain fields at home. The classes are also sent throughout the UMass campus system.

The fourth award recipient was Prof. Craig Moore, who wrote "The New Economic Reality — Massachusetts' Prospects for Long-Term Growth."

"This book made UMass an actor in the current economic debate," said John Brigham, emcee of the awards ceremony and a UMass political science professor.

The final winner was professor and band director Parks. "[Parks] uses the band to put the University in a positive perspective," said Brigham.

"UMass is class, we're the best there is," Parks said.

Editorial-Opinion pages moved to 12 and 13 today.

Correction

Yesterday's front-page story on the current Graduate Student Senate elections misidentified a write-in candidate. Hari Subramanian is running for vice-president on presidential candidate Shan Manikkalingam's ballot. The Collegian regrets the error.

Also, in his opinion column yesterday, Shan Manikkalingam did not intend to suggest that he and his running mates support discrimination. He says he meant to declare their opposition to discrimination at UMass.

SOM throws carnival for underprivileged kids

By Gina Larson
Collegian Staff

A volunteer program at the University of Massachusetts School of Management department will hold a carnival for underprivileged kids this weekend.

Volunteers Initiative Blending Education and Service (VIBES) will hold the carnival on Saturday afternoon between the plot of grass near the Newman Center and the SOM building, according to Amy Sullivan, coordinator of VIBES.

Children will be picked up from local shelters on busses and driven to campus where they can enjoy a festival of food, events and fun, Sullivan said.

The children will be transported from shelters such as the Main Street Shelter, Brodrick Shelter, Jessie's House and the Amherst Survival Center.

"It gives these children a day for themselves to have fun and smile a little," Sullivan said.

Each child will receive a volunteer chaperone who will be their guide to the festivities.

The committee has prepared to entertain all the children with face painters, pie throws, golf putting, dunking booths, a "moon walk" and juggling clowns — not to mention the old carnival staples such as cotton candy, candied apples, popcorn and snow cones.

"We have been raising money all year for this event," Sullivan said. "We have received enormous support from corporate donors as well as smaller places in town."

Milton Bradley has offered to donate toys to all of the children who will be at the carnival and Friendly's has donated ice cream for the event.

Besides the tremendous financial support, Sullivan said there has also been warm outside support from other local groups.

Apart from the volunteers of the 600 student members VIBES organization, the carnival will also receive a helping hand from the UMass football team, the Accounting Association and several sororities and fraternities.

$1 bills may be replaced by coins

By Dave Skidmore
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Dollars would jangle in Americans' pockets rather than pad their wallets if Republican budget-cutters get their way.

They're eyeing millions in savings that could result from replacing $1 bills that wear out in 17 months with $1 coins lasting 30 years.

A diverse coalition of special interests, ranging from blind operators of concession stands to public transit companies to copper-mining corporations, is backing the effort.

The opposition — paper and ink companies and the unions involved in printing the bills — has over the years succeeded in blocking the coin forces.

In Massachusetts, the proposal is opposed by The Crane Paper Co. in Dalton, which supplies the paper for printing money. Other companies involved with coin or metal manufacturing, however, could ostensibly benefit.

"A dollar coin sounds like a good idea but is really a bad idea that's been tried and failed," said Rep. John Olver, D-Mass., whose district includes Crane. "The proposal is ridden with serious, inescapable problems and disadvantages."

But the coin proponents' cause has been given new life this year by the Republican Congress' struggle to balance the budget. "Significant government savings are no further away than our wallets or purses," Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., told the House Banking subcommittee on monetary policy Wednesday.

Although it costs twice as much to mint a coin as print a bill — 8 cents vs. 4 cents — the coins last 21 times longer, said Kolbe, who has introduced legislation to replace the dollar bill with a coin.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates the savings at $120 million to $180 million a year.

And switching to coins will save millions for private industry while offering added convenience for the public, proponents argue. No longer would commuters riding express buses from Staten Island to Manhattan have to pay with 16 quarters — twice a day — because New York City buses don't accept dollar bills. No longer would shoppers in downtown Washington have to feed meters with 16 quarters to park for two hours. No longer would the Chicago Transit Authority have to pay 20 full-time employees to straighten out and stack the dollar bills its receives.

Nearly every other major industrial nation already has switched to high-denomination coins. Canada, for instance, has a one-dollar coin, nicknamed the "Loonie" after the picture of a loon that it carries, and plans to introduce a $2 coin next year.

Coin opponents answer proponents' argument with a single phrase: "Susan B. Anthony."

In 1979, the government introduced dollar coins with the picture of the famous feminist. The public hated them. Sixteen years later, nearly 300 million of them still sit in government vaults. Coin backers counter that Susie Bs failed because they looked too much like a quarter.

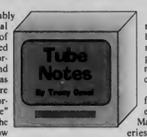
"No TV Week" comes to end



A number of younger viewers probably greeted the start of May with unusual enthusiasm, as they reached the end of what some elementary schools designated as "No TV Week." What happens is, unfortunate 10-year-olds are forced to spend seven days away from such fictional pals as the Bradys and Power Rangers, and are given no choice but to submit to that horror of horrors — spending "quality time" with the old folks. I wish I had been in the audience for last week's "Donahue" show focusing on this topic. I would like to have heard Phil's well-meaning, ultra-righteous child psychology experts explain exactly how depriving children of their natural right to watch television does not qualify as cruel and unusual punishment.

I was especially interested in hearing more about how people who rot their brains watching multitudes of programming are presumably unable to write complex and coherent sentences. If you ask me, that observation was particularly perceptive and insightful. Uh-huh.

But maybe it wouldn't have been so bad for a lot of us to take a break from TV, especially since the first major event of May sweeps was CBS' drab western miniseries "Buffalo Girls." You would think an all-star cast could inject some liveliness into even the most unoriginal material — but alas, few of the actors here seem to be having a very good time. You can hardly

The coming of summer usually heralds a return to TV reruns, super-extensive shopping and increased sightings of those Ex-Ed Naked T-shirts on people other than the one or three times/year that would be a smaller time for one of those things. But most importantly, the onset of summer means a return to the level, air-conditioned multiplex with some of Hollywood's biggest stars posing off-set in a way you'll almost never have the opportunity to see on a movie screen, as first-run movies are shown here, as first-run movies are shown here, as well as a true blend of seasonal reruns.

Columnist pens book on own experiences

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Rare is the man who is willing to lay it all on the line for the love of a woman — or women, as in the case with author/columnist Andrew Postman.

For four years, women have been able to enjoy his column "Jake: A Man's Opinion" (under the nom de plume "Vince") in the pages of Glamour magazine. Every month, Postman willingly bares his heart and soul to the subject of women, talking about everything from first dates to first loves to one-night stands. Witty, insightful and always entertaining, Postman manages to consistently elicit some sort of response from his mostly female audience. Moving up in the world, Postman is now a novelist with Now I Know Everything, a book based on his experiences as a "Jake" writer.

The 33-year-old author grew up in New York City and went to public school. He continued his education at Yale University with a bachelor's degree in English. While at Yale, he studied under a number of writers including John Hersey.

"My first job was as an assistant editor for McCall magazine. It was new for me because here I was a lone male in a woman's magazine. But it was really good experience," Postman said.

While at McCall, Postman heard about a position at Glamour as a new "Jake column" writer. He called the magazine and said he would like to be considered for the job.

"At first I wrote spec, you know, I'd write an article and they'd pay me, but eventually they liked it and I was hired for a year," Postman said. "My contract was renewed for three years and I ended up writing for four years until about nine to 10 months ago."

The author never intended to keep his column for such a long time. At first, writing a column for four years was a "horrifying" thought. But a new relationship in Postman's life enabled him to look at things in a different perspective and keep up the knowledge to impart in his column.

"I met a woman who gave me new things to write about. In the column, I refer to her as A. I had whole new aspects on romance, love and relationships. It was kind of like a second wind," Postman said.

Many of the situations and feelings in his column were from his own experiences; however there were times when he would solicit advice from a circle of male friends.

"I would call them up and they were really enthusiastic. They would give some really wonderful, colorful and exciting stories," he said.

It is only natural that when giving a man's standpoint on views like sex and relationships women are going to respond. Luckily for Postman the majority of mail he does receive is "uniformly" positive.

"About 97 percent of the letters I get as 'Jake' are from women," Postman said. "I don't get a lot from men, but men do read them. You know, if a man is married or goes out with a woman who reads Glamour he might pick it up."

He is glad that women are able to look at things through his perspective. His writings and responses are geared toward women and he doesn't feel he has to make up situations to hide who he is or how he feels.

"I consider it my responsibility and I look forward to saying things to women, things they may not want to hear about, things like date rape," he said.

"Jake: A Man's Opinion" also serves as an insight to men as well as an expression of their feelings.

"Men can be even more vulnerable than women with things like commitment phobia," Postman said. "This column is a chance for women to see that not all men have deep-rooted fears in things other than being lunkheads or Neanderthals. I try to take a stab at explaining it and that's just about all I can do."

COURTESY CROWN PUBLISHERS

Andrew Postman's new book Now I Know Everything talks about life in the '90s.

The author said he doesn't consider himself an expert on men and woman nor does he see himself as a "referee" whose job is to get men and women into the ring and then come out with some cosmic understanding of each other.

Postman said he hopes to continue his career as a novelist and has also been asked to freelance for other magazines as a "Jake."

"Competitors have now asked me to write now that my contract is up. I am flattered but I feel that if I continued to just write things like that I'd be typecast like an actor. I also think that I have a lot to offer as a book writer," he said. "I prefer to write books as opposed to magazines, but I could see myself doing another column other than 'Jake.'"

Though the transition from columnist to novelist may not seem like a big stretch for some, the stretch from book to film is a whole other story. Castle Rock Pictures and director Andrew Bergman (Honeymoon In Vegas) has expressed interest in the book, and a screen writer is currently working on a script.

"I have an idea of how one would turn it into a movie. I think the book has a lot of visuals," Postman said. "I don't mean to sound egotistical, but it's unusual for a book about a writer to have cinematic sequences that could make it a somewhat easy transition to screen."

Postman has no qualms about letting a big star portray him in the film, but he has some ideas about who he'd pick. Although he has no say in the matter, Postman, as always, will voice his opinion if asked.

"If some big star get the part that's fine with me," he said laughing. "It helps get the movie made. But I think someone like John Cusack would be good or David Schwimmer on the show 'Friends.' He seems to have become very hot lately. Plus, he has that unusual awkward charm about him."

Postman never meant for the book to be considered as a film, but said that Hollywood has developed quite an appetite for books that are film-friendly. He is to be married in two months to the A. in his column and is currently working on a second novel.

"I don't think writing the column taught me everything," Postman said. "I think there is learning just in living and having new experiences. Women and relationships I learned about through life. The column was just a way to chronicle my mistakes and learning."

Journal gives forum to diverse poetry, prose

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

There are many students at the University of Massachusetts who have the need to express themselves in their native language, but don't always have an outlet to do so. Fortunately, for the last two years, the comparative literature department has been producing a literary journal entitled mOtherlongue which gives these students a forum for their poetry, prose and artwork.

"We're looking to capture some voices that don't necessarily have a voice at the University, and want to write in their native language," said Matthew Daube, a comparative literature major and an editor of the journal.

Started in the spring semester of last year, mOtherlongue offers work from UMass students who write in a variety of different languages and come from different backgrounds. An English translation is provided with each of the pieces for readers who don't speak the various languages to enjoy.

"We want to give [students] a forum, but we realize that most of the audience will be English-speaking, so really we are getting the best of both worlds," said Daube.

According to Valirie Conte, a comparative literature major and an editor for the journal, the process of putting the journal together is a long one.

"We meet once or twice a week, work on advertising for submissions and set up time on the course in order to accept submissions," Conte said.

"Since it is our second year we are still trying to build a name."

According to Conte, although the journal is relatively a new project, she does think it has been a success so far. The journal is still trying to accept as many submissions as it can in order to give exposure to as many different languages as possible.

"We got more submissions last year. Many people wanted to submit but were too busy," said Conte. "We accept a lot. We don't like turning people down, but we are not taking handouts — the material we have is good stuff.

"We are creating a place where they can put [their writing] on paper. There is a lot of people out there who have so much to say."

This year's journal features 24 pieces by UMass students, ranging from poetry and prose to even artwork and photography.

"The artwork in thpre now is very cultural," said Tanya Chor, a comparative literature major and an editor for the journal. "The masks that are featured are Puerto Rican and the photos of sugar cane come from Costa Rica."

Tonight at Café Mediterranean in downtown Amherst, the comparative literature department will hold a reading of the various works featured in mOtherlongue.

The reading will open with a brief introduction from a few of the editors, and then they will read their works in both their native languages and then in English.

According to Chor, some of the writers may not to have someone else read the English translation due to the fact that they may feel uncomfortable reading the pieces in a language other than their native one.

The reading begins at 7 p.m. and is free and open to the general public. mOtherlongue journals are currently available for free in the Campus Center Concourse.

The News Department needs writers.
Any students interested in writing for the news section should contact Jessica Taverna at 545-0719 or come down to the Collegian office in the Campus Center Basement.

Film fails to turn on any charm

Movie lacks any genuine wit; Tarantino disappoints as actor

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

DESTINY TURNS ON THE RADIO
Directed by Jack Baran with Dylan McDermott, Quentin Tarantino
Playing at Mtn. Farms Four

Here are a few things I learned while I was imprisoned, er, watching Destiny Turns on the Radio:

1. Quentin Tarantino should stay behind the camera.
2. Although, even then, he's more problematic than brilliant.
3. Even The Shawshank Redemption had a better title.
4. There are 457 tiles on the ceiling of the movie theater.
5. James Belushi is the devil, sent here to control our minds through hideous acting.

While I'm not sure about the last one (I'm still following up several leads), I'm fairly certain Destiny is the worst movie I've seen in all of my four years reviewing movies. Utterly unconvincing, fitfully boring and frightfully unfunny, Destiny curdles along for a while as a curiosity (of the highway accident kind) until it becomes absolutely repellant — the film version of Raid.

In Destiny, the performers spend most of the time trying to overcome being miscast, while viewers are left to subsist on a diet of deadpan non-sequiturs masquerading as witty dialogue and a mishmash tone that's supposed to be cleverly farcical but ends up like a "Saturday Night Live" skit that will never mercifully end.

Quentin Tarantino is (eh-hem) Johnny Destiny, a quasi- mythical figure who drops in and drops out of the lives of a handful of dreamers and schemers in a cartoon Nevada landscape. Johnny has some sort of magical powers (too bad he didn't have the power to rewrite the script) and he seems to know a lot about a rag-tag band of quirky rooks and crooks — played with absolutely no charm or style by Dylan McDermott (In the Line of Fire), Nancy Travis (The Vanishing), James Le Gros (Guncrazy) and Satan himself, James Belushi (who also starred in the similarly titled Mr. Destiny — a coincidence? I think not).

Johnny first makes his appearance to Le Gros by emerging naked from a pool with electricity swirling around him like he's in a porno movie directed by Andrew Lloyd Webber. Otherwise, he's restricted to third-rate Wizard of Oz antics, played with a tiresome wink and a lame smirk. It's the film's flattest joke that Tarantino is supposed to represent some sort of stunt-casting coup, but all it truly reveals is that the man has something of an unnaturally large head and no screen presence whatsoever.

Johnny intersects mainly with an escaped crook (McDermott) who returns to the scene of the crime to get his cut of the stolen money from his partner (Le Gros), only to find out that it has been stolen again ... by Johnny (don't ask). McDermott is also back in town to win back his girl, a lounge singer (Travis), who is now pregnant and married to a local casino owner (Belushi). Nothing much interesting happens, though I'm sure the filmmakers would contend the plot was indeed thickening. I just thought the plot was thick.

Before it ascends to just mere nonsense, Destiny careens back and forth between obnoxious pomposity and plain old tedium — thinking itself all the way a clever joyride. It isn't. Its idea of a funny running gag is to have James Belushi continually grab his balls. Funny thing is, I wanted to grab his privates too, if only to inflict the same sort of pain Belushi was forcing upon me. Now that's entertainment. F

South Asian Dancers to perform at UM

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

The South Asian Dance and Music Program will put on its annual dance concert this weekend, featuring two works based on the concert's theme — "Death and Renewal." Namaskar will be presented this Friday and Saturday at 7:30 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

The first piece will be entitled Gita Govinda and is based upon a 12th century love poem written by the poet Jayadeva. Govinda tells the story of the development of the love between the god Krishna and his companion Radha. The poem is meant to demonstrate the futility of jealousy and exclusiveness and to promote a form of selfless love that involves becoming one with God.

The second piece will be a more modern piece entitled "Talam," which is named after the Hindu philosophy based on the god Shiva. "Talam" was created by the program's artistic director and choreographer Ranjanaa Devi. Devi draws upon the belief in Shiva's upholding of the universe through his actions, using dancers to represent corpses rising to dance in a complex circle of patterns and movements.

The "dance-drama" that the Indian culture partakes in is considered to be much different than western styles of dance. The stage is rarely left bare and frequent use is made of various props and equipment. The subjects touched upon are usually those of heroic and dramatic events, drawn from pre-existing texts, and use Indian gods to personify the action.

The dance company will be accompanied by percussionist David Nelson and his orchestra. Nelson specializes in the mridangam, a South Indian drum.

Namaskar will take place this Friday and Saturday at 7:30 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. Tickets are $5 for students and $7 for the general public and are available at The Fine Arts Center Box Office. For more information, call the box office at 545-2511.

Connick Jr. takes Smith by storm

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

HARRY CONNICK JR. AND HIS FUNK BAND
John M. Greene Hall
May 2

NORTHAMPTON —— The line started forming outside John M. Green Hall at noon.

At 8:15 p.m. screams arose as the band took the stage.

Women young and old surged to the stage as Harry Connick Jr. jauntily appeared sporting a gray Smith College T-shirt.

"How y'all feeling tonight? You all ready to party?" Connick asked with a smile.

The madness had begun.

Since his move from the more subtle and classical sounding jazz to a rollicking, no holds barred New Orleans style funk, the 28-year-old musician couldn't have been in finer form.

Connick and his four member Funk Band (dressed in sundresses and straw hats) whipped the crowd into a frenzy dancing, jumping and basically celebrating their last show of their college tour.

"I'm so psyched I'm ready to explode," Connick said pounding away on the piano in front of him..

"I came here to play some New Orleans' music for y'all. It's a mix of funk, rock'n'roll and parade music."

And that is exactly what he did. It was a solid three hours of high energy music laced with soul feeling bass, snazzy guitar riffs and pounding drum solos.

Connick has talent and his band couldn't have sounded tighter, yet at the same time you had the feeling that this was child's play.

The New Orleans native was quick to show his musical prowess not only on the keyboard but the guitar, bass and drums.

Musical numbers ranged from the kind of music you'd hear on Bourbon Street to something Def Leppard might whip up.

The majority of songs were from his latest album She.

Connick was everywhere — jumping into the audience, running across stage, and pandering to the delight of entire audiences.

"He touched me!" one girl screamed to her friend and you never wash that hand again.

COLLEGIAN / DAYMON SMITH

Harry Connick Jr. and his Funk Band stirred up a packed John M. Greene Hall this past Tuesday.

But Connick wasn't the only highlight of the show. Two members of his Big Band showed up to join in the festivities and lend to the music the screaming melodies and notes only brass can.

Especially proficient were Leroy Jones on trumpet and the trombonist, nicknamed Fish, dressed in a yellow rain slicker and toting a fishing rod.

Guitarist Jonathan DuBois Jr. was an exceptional performer jamming along with whatever Connick threw out.

Some people may have felt his show was a little self- indulgent, but everyone had to agree the guy is entertaining.

He can play a crowd almost as well as he can play piano. Anyone who can keep a sold out crowd riveted with a 15- minute monologue about taking a shower has to be good.

And if that same person keeps throwing out by-the-book concert phrases like "Are you ready to rock'n'roll" and still manages to elicit a wave of shouts and applause every time — he's a crowd pleasing virtuoso.

The evening was capped with five huge beach balls thrown to the audience during the last song.

The concert came to a crashing halt with the encore "(I Could Only) Whisper Your Name" which had everyone on their feet wishing there was more.

Doc Hopper punk pop to hit basement

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

Punk's not dead, but it does seem to be horribly disfigured.

The mainstream "Buzz Bin" status of today's "platinum punks" has done a lot to tarnish the traditionally anti-commercial, "do-it- yourself" reputation of true punk rock.

It is refreshing to see then that there are still some fans and musicians who are working to keep that independent DIY spirit alive.

Thanks to the efforts of such people, this Saturday night, the Butterfield Basement will host an eight- band punk and hardcore extravaganza featuring acts from all over the Northeast and Canada.

Headlining the show will be Boston pop-punk favorites Doc Hopper, a band known for their unforgettable live shows.

Formed just three years ago, the band's Sweet'ums 7" caused quite a stir on the Boston scene and they have since gained broader recognition with the release of their first full- length album Aloha.

Although they started out as a four-piece, Doc Hopper have recently trimmed down to a sleek three-member line-up consisting of ex-AGs' guitarist/vocalist Chris Pierce, bassist John Madden and drummer Greg Hoffman.

If the new, smaller line-up has affected their sound at all, it has only made them even tighter and more explosive.

Doc Hopper's sound is old-fashioned pop-punk in its purest form.

Heavily influenced by The Descendents, Doc Hopper's songs are fast and aggressive enough for the most die-hard of punks, yet illustrate the fact that they are ultimately suckers for a good melody.

Live, Doc Hopper subscribes to the harderfasterlouder approach, creating a close but informal rapport with the audience.

The band's tendency to play a healthy dose of cover songs (ranging from Simon and Garfunkel's "Homeward Bound" to the Go Gos' "Head Over Heels") also contributes to the general sense of uninhibited fun that characterizes one of their live shows.

Also appearing on the bill Saturday night will be fellow pop-punk devotees Weston.

The band, who originally hail from Bethlehem, Penn., have been gaining national popularity since the release of their first LP, A Real-Life Story of Teenage Rebellion, last fall.

Fresh from their recent show at Pearl Street, the Boston- based death metal act Overcast will also be bringing their decidedly un-hippy tunes to Butterfield — what could be more fun than that?

In addition, Saturday's show will feature performances from the-Canadian punk band The Stand GT, the New York hardcore act Abalienation, Connecticut's newly-formed Know Nothing and "anachro punk" acoustic guitarist Diana Davies.

The event, a non-profit benefit for the Amherst Survival Center, is the sixth such show organized by UMass students Seth Cohen and Bob Barron. So far, these shows have raised over 500 pounds of food for the shelter.

Doc Hopper will headline the Butterfield punk show this Saturday night. The show starts at 7 p.m. and admission is $3 plus two cans of food.

Velocity Girl excite with sugary pop tunes

By Michael Burke
Collegian Staff

Velocity Girl will bring their pop melodies to Pearl Street Friday.

COURTESY JOHN FALLS

Over the past year, female-led pop bands have exploded on to the music scene with the success of bands such as the Breeders, Veruca Salt and Letters to Cleo. Lucky for those in the Valley, two of the finest female bands on the East Coast, Velocity Girl and Tuscadero, take the stage this Friday at Pearl Street.

Velocity Girl has been churning out catchy little numbers since 1989, back when Veruca Salt was still just a character from Charlie and the Chocolate Factory. Coming out of Silver Springs, Md., the band was formed with Bridget Cross on vocals but she was soon replaced by current singer Sarah Shannon.

With Shannon at the helm, the band's rise to stardom took off. In 1991 they released the classic "My Forgotten Favorite" single which gained the band lots of airplay on college radio everywhere. Soon afterward, Alternative Press named them one of the hottest new bands in America.

1993 saw the release of Copacetic on Sub Pop and propelled the band into the national scene. Though the album was about as grungy as a remixed Madonna song, the album went on to become Sub Pop's second best-selling record behind, you guessed it, Nirvana's Bleach.

Although Copacetic was an impressive album, it was a let-down for many older fans who wanted an album filled with irresistible catchy pop songs. Instead, the album had some melody but it was drowned in layers of feedback à la My Bloody Valentine.

After touring the world, the band went home to rest and listen to some classic oldies. Not surprisingly the new album Simpatico! is chock full of songs influenced more by the Beach Boys and the Hollies than any current indie scenesters.

Simpatico! featured some of the sweetest and chewiest bubblegum pop in recent memory. The hit singles "Sorry Again" and "Don't Stop Smiling" were well received on alternative radio and even MTV.

As a bonus treat, the always enjoyable Tuscadero, from Washington D.C., will be opening up the show. Just 15 months ago the band played their first gig and since then they have released three singles and one full-length (all on Teenbeat) and even graced the second stage at Lollapalooza. With songs like "Nancy Drew" and "Dime a Dozen" the band is guaranteed to put smiles on the faces of all in attendance.

Velocity Girl will play at Pearl Street on Friday. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. Admission is $8 in advance $10 at the door. The show is 18+.

In concert expect the band to abandon much of their noisy past; gone are the days of the feedback drowning out Shannon's beautiful voice. Much of the set will concentrate on the newer tracks and, for old times sakes, don't be surprised if they play "My Forgotten Favorite."

Photographers needed. No prior experience necessary; must have your own camera. Come down to the Collegian office in the Campus Center Basement and talk with Rebecca Peterson.

The FYI section of the Collegian is open to the community to advertise events in the area. Our deadline is 3 p.m. daily and we do not accept FYIs over the phone. Please mail or hand deliver your submissions as early as possible.
All submissions must be typed with a contact name and phone number to clarify any questions.

movies

made (again) — in and, thus is said, this world — he action epic is sure to be one of the most talked about flicks of the year. Plagued by enormous load self- publicized production and personnel problems, Waterworld tells the story of a future engulfed by water and a group of rainmaks led by Kevin Costner and The First's Jeanne Tripplehorn who battle it out for local rights with an ergopatch wearin' Dennis Hopper, playing yet another psychotic villain for the ath time.

It's directed by Kevin Reynolds (last year's expensive and Rapa Nui, who is used to working with troubled productions, and who nevertheless managed to pull a $100 million- plus hit out of Robin Hood I mainer, though, is a more danger. His last three movies I Perfect World, Want Larg, The Bart were bombs and people are starting to forget this is the guy Hollywood was re-anning over five years ago, throwing multiple-hearts at him and his silly hipper western, Rapers Kid Video, Final word, it would be too easy to remind ianies like Last Action Hero or Robin Hood, But hey, if it looks like a Howard the Duck and walks like a Howard the Duck . U.L.)

Die Hard With a Vengeance
The first Die Hard is top notch suspenseful classic and Die Hardier is an adequate enough actioner. So things are looking pretty good for the third installment, right? But Vengeance Hires 2

Anyway, this screwed sequel is trying — very hard — to recast the original, with numerous ins to the popular 1965 thriller First, it's got the first's director, John McTiernan, who's suffering through a string of bombs I Predator Hun, Last Action Hero and it's borrowing an important plot point. Jeremy Irons has been pegged to play the brother of the Alan Rickman villain, out to bomb most of New York. Fitty to get in one pesky cop, the indestructible John McTiime Hitler Bruce Willis!

Fellow Poly Grams - alumni Samuel L. Jackson is also on board as Willis' partner, and the trailer is teeming with a string of truly impressive stunts — that is, until Willis cracks one of his infamously dopey jokes. Final word, If Willis keeps his mouth shut for most of the movie Then count the same thing happen to the same guy for the third time!" and it doesn't turn into Home Iron Die Hard With a Vengeance looks to be the summer's best ticket for action fans. U.L.)

Apollo 13
The actual Apollo 13 tragedy of 1970 had pilots racing and Americans on the edge of their seats, glued to the televisions, waiting to see what would happen to our valiant astronauts trapped in space. So we can only hope the cast and crews of Apollo 13 can recreate the suspense and give us a gripping, heart--pounding, historical thriller.

The three unlucky astronauts are played by Tom Hanks, Bill Paxton and Kevin Bacon. Hanks, who is still riding high on Forrest Gump fame, teams up with Gump-co- star Gary Sinise. Sinise plays one of the screwed-- and VASA ground crew members along with Ed Harris I The Right Stuff.

Director Ron Howard I Backdraft. The Paper has an affinity for blending action and drama to produce reunion- filled suspense films. Hopefully, this film will have a little more of each quality. If Apollo 13 delivers the suspense it promises, it should thrill fast as heart- renderly rockets audiences as did last summer's The Fugitive Considering Hanks' current popularity, he should easily slide right into Harrison Ford's old spot.

Final word: Gump is space? So that's what went wrong . U.L.)

Also coming soon ... James Bond returns with "Remington Steele" star Pierce Brosnan in MC's latest adventure, Goldeneye. Denzel Washington and Gene Hackman are teaming for red October with the sub thriller Crimson Tide. Tom Cruise, Richard Gere and John Grisham team up to rewrit the film noir legend in Mint I Knight. Bret Gilmore does his best Bob Roy impression as a kilt- wearing warrior in Braveheart. Billy Crystal and Debra Winger try to Pungent Pants in this romantic comedy.

Meryl Streep and Clint Eastwood fall in love in the Eastwood- directed version of the bestseller The Bridges of Madison County. Gwen Stefa is a female pirate in Cutthroat Island, co- starring Matthew Modine. Harrison Ford, Greg Kinnear Ft and John Brosnan (sequel-remake the Mel but Dabrina, with Sydney Pollack's The First directing. Ben Kingsley battles a new breed of alien in the sci- fi thriller Species.

Sylvester Stallone in Judge Dredd is the futuristic sci- fi action pick about the popular British comic book anthers. Tom and Ryan O'Neal try to revive their careers with Faithful, written and co--starring Oscar nominated Thass Finkelstein's Bullets Over Broadway. And Hugh Grant plays the harried father -to- be in a pregnant Julianne Moore in Nine Months, directed by Home Alone's Chris Columbus and co--starring as Grant's best buddy ... Tom Arnold! U.L.)

Bophers and Jackie O spotted. Already wrap--around sunglasses have become the rage and scarves can been seen over many a collivar. Looking for class? Then try a short- sleeved cardi sweater over capri pants accented with a thin leather belt, all by Roberta Flack. Or maybe you want to look a little more professional with wide leg cotton trousers in summer white and a navy blue blazer with a simple cropped vest. Sanitral and off--American enough to be invited to the Kennedy compound for nutrition.

Nothing sucks are also following this conservative line of design. Tank tanks with modest rip cut backs and simple lines become the rage. Grey and black seem to be the colors of the summer, although the Flannel Troop may still have a few favorite yellow Nikka number on Donna Champbell. Or it could have been an excuse to show off her navel ring.

Socks are also looking remarkably similar to one another. Slim jeans and fitted jackets are the recipe for success. Husband Tyler Hanz of celebrity sextet, Immaculate Fingers and Barney Rumsell all have low- ripped numbers with nipped in waists and notched collars, but a simple bottlestrap or piece of polyester is to be found.

Trench coats are also a hot item this summer, mainly due to movies like The Professional that had Sharon Stone extraordinaire sporting a silky purple one by Karan. How do you wear them? Low--length, tied, looped or bowed, but never buckled unless of course you're going for the 3 in Empire look in which case you'd belt it tight, button it up, cuff the sleeves, slouch and pray no one mistakes you for Inspector Gadget.

Polo shirts have lots of hip and resistance to crop up on every catalogue from J. Press to Spiegel. But don't think designers have decided to make tee polo shirt? No sir! You have long- sleeved, short- sleeved, cropped--sleeved, cropped sleeve tee--sleeved and that's just for the shirt. You can also have polo dresses, lounge wear, evening wear and of course, sports wear. You can have it cropped, tight, poor boy or ascii--colored. Tight--waves, loose--waves, low gauge or pearlies. The possibilities are endless and you can always steer clear of the lurpe and buy the one with the green alligator.

Barry Harris was nice enough to try to help out these readers by devoting two pages to the hot new hairstyles. Basically, there are five views, wet, curly side- part and evening. The writer will kindly show you the looks of Sasha, Helena, Katie and Shalom in five different styles that you know you will never be able to duplicate in a million years. But it's nice to get people's hopes up and boost sales in Lloyd's hair products — our answer of glossy stuff for 1995.

And finally the footwear of the moment is the sandal. Strappy, sexy and versatile it can be matched with anything and everything in a plethora of styles that can make your head spin. Unfortunately, rumors have been confirmed and the jelly shoe is also a hot item. But it isn't your old jellies. No, these are designer jellies going for $75 in all their glittery inclosure. Maybe they will once again catch on with mens producers and you can pick up an equally tacky pair for $2 at K--Mart.

So grab your sunscreen, slather on the self--tanner, strap on your sandals, sweat in your vinyl dress and try to be cool behind your wraparound and don't forget your trench jacket. With that like this summer you can't possibly go wrong.

Speaking of the past, the biggest blasts when the weather gets warm will be a tour--up between Beatles and Jimmy Page/Robert Plant. They will be playing all those songs you loved so much, and with just as much hair.

On the up side of the summer rumor grapevine is the rumor that Blues Dude Bulls may be breaking back on the road via Trent Reznor can break more keyboards and give his drummer more chances for brain damage from flying equipment. Nirpe points made, they will be a welcome addition when the dog days start to set in.

Due to their constant desire to retain their credibility by fighting the establishment, Pearl Jam, said to be working on an album with Neil Young, will start their tour of "alternative" venues this summer. I can see the marquee now — "Temple Pearl Jam ... Tomorrow: Clarkie Fingers $2.50 a bucket."

Good news for "punk" fans, Rancid will be finishing a new album early in the summer and plan to bring their punk shoes and attitudes out to auditoriums by late July-early August.

Any for some last minute concert updates, It hasn't been confirmed but official sources tell the Daily Collegian that Stone Hiller, Pilot, The Grateful Dead and Jimmy Buffet, in unprecedented moves, have all decided to tour this year. Line up for your tickets now for as you all know opportunities to see these guys come more as a lifetime.

Another popular form of paperback has always been the romance novel (and no just for Fabio either). What better time for a journey into the world of love and lust than during those sweltering summer nights. According to Gilrich, some of this genre's more popular romance novels will be putting out books this summer include Amanda Quick, who will be releasing her latest entitled Mystique and Sandra Brown, who will offer up Two Alone Yank.

So for in the world of non--fiction goes the best for books as though it could be By George he, you guessed it, heavyweight champion himself George Foreman.

According to Wally Seid, manager of the book department at Berlin Pizz and a manager of other Valley book stores since 1824, another non--fiction titles worth checking out include The Sound And The Story: NPR And The Art Of Radio by Thomas Lawlor, a resident of Perham. According to Seid, with Congress and company rolling back funding for NPR and public television the book should interest many people

If big names and big hype are not exactly your thing, then there are still plenty of recent best books to feed your soul with over the summer.

Seid said some books which should be checked out during the upcoming season include An Anthropologist on Mars, by Oliver Sacks, who is most known for his popular book The Man Who Mistook His Wife For a Hat. Sacks book tells personalized tales that deal with such things as an artist who gets in an accident and loses his ability to see colors.

Another book Seid said the book will do well with be Pasole by Isabel Allende, who is the author of the acclaimed book, turned star--studded movie House Of Spirits. Those who enjoy lifestyle should also check out Gabriel Garcia Marquez, the Nobel Prize - winning Columbian novelist, who, according to Seid, walks a fine between surrealism and reality. Marquez will release his latest novel Of Love And Other Demons this summer.

blame Anjelica Huston for looking a bit depressed — she specializes in portraying shrewd, glamorous femme fatales in the movies (see Prizzi's Honor), but shuffles awkwardly as the down--to--earth, tomboy heroine Calamity Jane.

Furthermore, the script saddles Huston with a lot of melodramatic junk about romance and motherhood — as though even the most rebellious, gender--bending women in history couldn't resist their natural feminine inclinations to throw themselves at rugged cowboys, dote on their children, and generally act like sissies. And as if that wasn't enough, one of the most annoying actresses of our time, Melanie Griffith, was also on hand to give yet another "fingernails-- on--blackboard" performance as a hooker with a heart of gold. Which might have been a thrill for the five or six viewers in this world who enjoyed Griffith in last year's big screen disaster Milk Money (you know who you are) — but it was pretty awful for the rest of us.

CBS fared much better with its new "Cagney and Lacey" movie (subtitled "Together Again"), as the two middle-aged investigators collaborate to find the killer of a homeless man. Not much has changed since the regular series ran — everybody's a little older, but good--looking Sharon Gless is still mouthing off and having relationship troubles, while frumpy Tyne Daly continues to bumble around with oafish, likeable husband Harvey. Most importantly, the duo haven't lost their rough edges over the years — Cagney and Lacey are still tough, sarcastic women with a lot of personal problems and sleuthing to attend to, and (unlike the Buffalo Girls) they juggle their lives with a minimum of stereotypical feminine whining. Maybe they're the ones who should have gotten a miniseries.

Another watchable drama series revival was NBC's made- for-TV movie "The Return of Hunter," with Fred Dryer coming back to avenge the murder of his fiancee. This "Hunter," however, has a sense of humor when it comes to creating its villain — who is not only sadistic and deranged, but also a media freak who watches "Cops" religiously and is determined to become a TV star through the local tabloid journalists. "I want my 15 minutes of fame, dammit!" the guy screams, becoming the first serial killer I've seen who quotes Andy Warhol during times of crisis. All of the media--bashing stuff is very tongue-in-cheek (after all, this is a TV show that's telling us how bad TV is), while Dryer holds it all together with his deadpan delivery and refined eye--rolling. His return is indeed welcome.

Finally, two long--running sitcoms have reached milestones this past week, beginning with the dullest number one series to hit prime--time, "Home Improvement," which celebrated its 100th episode. I still can't figure out why so many people watch this show — I mean, half the time the studio audience is enjoying jokes that don't even exist. Even "hi honey, I'm home" usually rates at least a chortle from the Tim Allen laugh--o--meter.

And another so--so sitcom, NBC's "Empty Nest," aired its series finale after a six--year run. If anyone still cares, it ended with the neurotic daughter and feisty nurse getting married (but not to each other, unfortunately — that would have been a weird, great way to finish up), while Richard Mulligan heads off to Vermont to escape his obnoxious co--stars. Although I can't say I'll miss the show, I'm hoping that Mulligan — an inherently funny actor — will be able to land some new projects better suited to his off--balance, slightly goofy persona. If not, there's always the possibility of a "Soap" reunion — if it can work for aging drama stars, then maybe Mulligan's chance at renewed stardom isn't far behind.

Speech focuses on the working class

Speaker says whites benefit in workplace

By Syed Mohammed Ali Raza
Collegian Staff

The Maoist Internationalist Movement (MIM) organized a discussion to celebrate May Day at the Campus Center.

The purpose of the event was to determine the position of MIM regarding the issues of working class in "Amerika."

Chris Johnson, a MIM representative, presided over the meeting, which was co-sponsored by the Revolutionary Anti-Imperialist League (RAIL).

Johnson said when it comes to socialism there is a very important question that should be asked: "Do first world workers owe something when it comes to socialism? Or is something owed to them?"

Johnson said the white workers of "Amerika" would lead to more meaningful lives under socialism but it is not in their materialistic interest to do so. He also said Americans keep offering higher wages to white workers at home by exploiting workers abroad.

He said this was an effort to stop any sort of revolution at home and the strategy is to keep the workers at home happy.

According to some calculations done by Johnson, minorities are underpaid by 35 percent as compared to white workers. He said the major chunk of corporate profits come from the exploitation of minority workers. Johnson compared the wages of American workers with that of workers in the Third World.

According to 1977 statistics he offered, the average American wage was $7.60 an hour while the average wage in a country like South Korea was $0.06 an hour. He said immigrant workers in the States might work over here for as low as $2 an hour and still raise a family while the whites earn much more and still end up complaining. Chris Johnson said it is a proven fact that if you are white then your chances of qualifying for a mortgage are higher than if you are a minority.

According to statistics Johnson gathered, there are more rich whites than there are rich minorities. He further stated that the unemployment gap between the minorities and the whites has increased during the period of "recovery."

Johnson said inequality was actually reduced during the period of recession. He said that before the recession blacks had more health care coverage compared to whites; this was not the case after the recession when people got their jobs back, blacks were on the other side.

Saqeeb Qasim, a participant at the meeting, said the affirmative action policy encourages the employment of colored women rather then men. The MIM representative said affirmative action policy is a "cosmetic" policy and it is just a tactic the government has imposed to promote "Amerikan neo-colonialism."

Another participant of the discussion said "blacks are the last to be hired and first to be fired."

In his closing remarks Johnson said manufacturing jobs are leaving the first world countries for the Third World countries, while also discussing the foundations of the labor aristocracy thesis in Lenin and Engels' writings.

FBI sorting through bombing leads

By Fred Bayles
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Two weeks after a bomb shattered downtown Oklahoma City, the investigation has yielded one steely suspect who's keeping his mouth shut, a cast of odd characters, several dead ends and plenty of questions.

With thousands of tips still to be followed up on, a federal grand jury has begun sorting through evidence in the secret confines of Tinker Air Force Base outside Oklahoma City.

The bombing's death toll now stands at 145, with a child's body among those found Wednesday. Twenty-eight people were missing, according to the state medical examiner's office.

While there have been frustrations in the past few days, those knowledgeable about major investigations say the public shouldn't conclude the case has bogged down.

"The time that has passed since this incident is merely days. There's no reason the government shouldn't take another couple of weeks to gather all the evidence before making a final charging decision," said a former federal prosecutor who insisted on anonymity because of current involvement in a government case.

There have been initial successes: the arrest of Timothy McVeigh, a rich harvest of evidence linking him to the bombing, and connections to James and Terry Nichols, two Michigan brothers in custody who shared McVeigh's penchant for bomb-making and anti-government rhetoric.

There have also been high-profile failures. Most notable: the dramatic arrest and subsequent midnight release of Gary Alan Land and Robert Jacks, two drifters whose travels seemed to connect them to McVeigh.

Although the two were released, the FBI is still checking their movements.

At the El Travotore Motel in Kingman, Ariz., where they lived for five months, owners June and Bill Terranova said the FBI searched until Wednesday afternoon.

Also Wednesday, two agents interviewed the manager of Gene's Motel in Marshall, Mo., where Land and Jacks reportedly stayed last month.

"Their names came up," said the motel manager, Louise Henricks. "I'm not commenting on what they asked about." Saline County Sheriff Wally George said the FBI was tying up loose ends: "They are simply following any and all leads to make sure there are no surprises in the shadows somewhere."

ABC reported that Land and Jacks have been subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Oklahoma City.

Staff responds to letter

Reasons behind printing letter

Phone calls about Ms. Cullen's letter started coming in over a week ago, questioning why the Collegian would even consider printing her letter. It's offensive, they argued, and offers little to intelligent debate. I agree that it's offensive; I disagree that it is valueless.

Ms. Cullen first brought her letter to the newspaper early last week – Holocaust Memorial Week – seeking to buy advertising space. We rejected it as an ad; the Collegian does not sell space to attack specific groups of people. Her writings have appeared as paid advertisements in the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

About 20 staffers — both writers and editors — discussed the letter last weekend. Everyone said they were shocked and disgusted by Ms. Cullen's letter, but nearly all agreed the newspaper had no grounds to block out her views. The decision to publish was supported by a clear majority of our staff, and transcended religious affiliation. We are not in the business of deciding which opinions deserve to be heard.

Ms. Cullen could speak in public, on the Amherst Common or the Student Union steps, and we would print what she had to say and what readers wrote in response.

It would be hypocritical and cowardly for us to deny her the opinion page, which we treat as a public forum. The views expressed by columnists and letter writers do not represent those of the Collegian staff. If we agreed with all that we printed, we'd have an identity crisis of astronomical proportions.

What Ms. Cullen wrote was offensive, and very hurtful to the entire community — not just Jewish people. But it is irresponsible for a newspaper to just print what the majority wants to read. Ignorance can only be defeated through education.

The response letters printed in these pages are proof that Ms. Cullen is not only virtually alone in her opinion, but that her argument is dangerously misinformed. And her narrow view is being defeated by exposure.

In making an effort to set the record straight, the Collegian's readers have made it a very valuable debate.

Darienne J. Hosley
Editor in Chief

Newspaper didn't take responsibility

Is the Collegian anti-Semitic? As Jewish Affairs editor, it is a question I have had to deal with far more times than I would have ever imagined over the course of the last year.

And now the question has arisen once again with the printing of the virulently anti-Semitic letter by a professor at the University of Massachusetts.

It is not an easy situation, and when the printing of the letter was discussed in board of editors, there were two main points raised by the majority of editors who voted for the letter.

The first, freedom of speech and of the press, is not a valid point. What the First Amendment says is that Congress shall make no laws abridging either freedom. It does not say that every paper must print everything it receives. The Collegian could have exercised its ability to not print the letter on the grounds that it could cause danger to the Jewish community. Professor Cullen would still have the freedom to speak or to publish her hate speech elsewhere.

The second issue raised was the University community has a right to know there are professors who hold these beliefs. It is a very valid point, and one that I originally believed. However, the Collegian is unwilling to take responsibility for its printing of the letter.

It was decided that the letter should be printed alone, and that in the following days it would print whatever responses were received. However, by doing this, the Collegian showed that it does not care if these hateful ideas are allowed to be spread through the University, regardless of the hate and fear inflicted on the Jewish community. It would have been far more appropriate for the Collegian to state that anti-Semitism is not acceptable and not leave the letter to sow dissent on its own.

So is the Collegian anti-Semitic? While it is something every individual must decide on their own, I do not believe the letter was printed with the intent to hurt or defame Jews. I do believe that the Collegian was irresponsible and insensitive to print this letter without any voice also acknowledging that hatred is not acceptable on this campus, especially from a professor.

Jacob W. Michaels
Jewish Affairs Editor

Campus response isn't equal

The Collegian board of editors thought long and hard over the decision to print Helen Cullen's letter. By an overwhelming majority, it was decided to print the letter in hopes of fostering a dialogue on campus.

Our hopes have been realized, but it still leaves me feeling strangely hollow. The chancellor and provost were quick to respond with letters condemning the anti-Semitic message in the letter. Other faculty, administrators and students were also expedient in their responses.

Why, I ask, is no one as fast to respond to letters and opinion pieces that attack other oppressed groups? The director of human relations asked me if I would print a letter about another "ism." I said yes and used the example of an opinion piece recently printed that was very sexist. He said, "That's not exactly the same thing. I mean something racist or about someone's ethnicity."

Others who have come down have brushed off comments about sexism or homophobia with similar comments.

Is this a game of who is more oppressed, or who has more lobbying power? Why doesn't the chancellor respond to all letters that offend communities?

This campus needs to realize that there are views that offend all people and respond to all equally.

Tracy Monahan
Editorial Editor

Chancellor is missing point

Chancellor David K. Scott's missing the point and his statement was extremely disappointing.

Instead of strongly condemning the vile and irrational hatred and bigotry espoused by Professor Emeritus Helen F. Cullen, he instead chose to take the easy way out and reflect upon the "irony" of a man hired to help fight the very sentiment the chancellor stopped short of denouncing.

While respecting everyone's right to be heard, one is only led to wonder about obvious questions that beg answers.

Professor Cullen, if your illogical and nonsensical "knowledge" of history is any indication of your work ethic and your career content, exactly and precisely how qualitative your tenure was is in question.

What could you possibly have taught the thousands of students you have had in class over the years?

Irrational hatred pervades this campus at all levels, as exemplified by a higher-ranking member of the faculty.

What is more is that the opportunity to grasp and seize this occasion has been passed by the prime individual who could have made a difference.

In closing, a challenge now stands to the rest of the University of Massachusetts' esteemed faculty to come down where the chancellor neglected.

This challenge directly faces the faculty who find themselves in leadership and pivotal positions, but does not discriminate in garnering support for civil people looking to make a difference.

At an institution of higher learning, the heart of critical culture, nothing less is acceptable.

Henry J. Brier
News Associate

Real issues behind letter

The issue is no longer the idea of free speech. Professor Cullen has already been given her voice and that argument is over.

What still faces this University community is how to deal with White, non-Jewish people who wish to propagate a tension that permeates the world. This is just another example of the ruling class trying to keep their power by forcing the minorities classes into civil war. You see, they know that if we work together to fight the true enemy we will win the war and gain control.

Perhaps it is time to see this Black/Jewish "tension" for what it truly is: a conspiracy. It is time that our leaders come together and realize they have been baited into this "battle of the oppressed." It is time to show that scapegoating does not work.

There are some similarities between Blacks and Jews to consider: enslavement by White European Protestants and Catholics; exile by White European Protestants and Catholics; mass murder and torture by White European Protestants and Catholics; thought of as subhuman by European White Protestants and Catholics; a strong family and ethnic bond; and the desire to never let history repeat itself. It seems like there is a pattern here. With this many similarities we must realize that someone else is fighting to keep us apart.

I invite any and all minority groups to use this and all of the oppressive events on this campus as a catalyst to unite.

Letters to the Editor

Editor's note: Letters are in response to "History behind campus tensions" by Helen Cullen on May 2.

To the editor:

I wish to respond (as a Christian) to the recent letter concerning the supposed "historical" source of conflict between Jewish groups and others on campus and around the world.

Professor Cullen makes two claims: first, that biblical literature has been used to justify several forms of oppression: misogyny, American slavery, South African apartheid and racism in general. She might have included homophobia for good measure. I do not dispute this point. It is her second claim and the conclusion she draws at the end which I find to be both erroneous and offensive.

Her second claim is that "the Jewish Testament" is the unique scriptural inspiration for racism and misogyny, and not the "Christian testament." This is utterly indefensible; both Jewish and Christian scriptural sources have been misappropriated to this deplorable end. Listen to any right-wing Christian radio station for a few minutes and you will have no shortage of examples.

Paul's Letter to the Ephesians — particularly chapters five and six — has often been cited as a justification for slavery and women's subordination. Moreover, there is today a heated debate among Christian scripture scholars as to the anti-Jewish nature of Christian scripture (refer to recent writings by John Dominic Crossan and Raymond Brown for two divergent Catholic views).

A prime example of this phenomenon is the Gospel of John (8:31–46) in which non-believing Jews are referred to as "children of the devil." All of the Gospels explicitly blame the Pharisees and Sadducees (two groups of First Century C.E. Jews) for the death of Jesus. Jewish leaders are the paradigmatic "bad guys" in Christian scripture, analogous to the way "Arabs" (sic) are regarded in Jewish scripture. I have to presume Prof. Cullen is referring to biblical Canaanites, or perhaps Egyptians, because she does not specify who these mistreated "Arabs" were. However, this assessment is by no means universally true; many non-Jewish "Arabs" are regarded with great fondness in Jewish scripture.

It is because of the anti-Jewish nature of Christian scripture that Jews have acquired the tragically familiar epithet: "Christ killers." This contributed to the apathy and complicity of German (and American) Christians during the Holocaust.

Some might claim that it is a problem endemic to Judeo-Christian traditions — and with all religious traditions which claim for believers exclusive access to God's favor. I would claim it is a problem with biblical fundamentalism and with those who seek to use scripture and religion to justify their own twisted ends.

Scripture, when read carefully, defies the agenda of racists. It is Paul's Letter to the Galatians (3:28) which declares that in Christ "there is no longer Jew or Greek ... slave or free ... woman or man; for all are one." The Torah has historically been a source of inspiration to oppressed people. Can anyone deny the centrality of the story of the Exodus in African-American Christian spirituals — songs which have their roots in the time of American slavery?

It is, however, Professor Cullen's final conclusion which I find to be most disturbing. Based on her observation of the misuse of Jewish (and Christian) scripture by Christian slave owners; White, Christian supporters of apartheid; and Mormons, she somehow concludes that it is Judaism itself which is to blame. She doesn't even make the argument that Jews themselves have been guilty of racism or sexism: Christians have been, but it is the fault of "traditional Judaism." I find this conclusion to be a bizarre and offensive twist of logic.

Jon Davison
Westford

To the editor:

In my three years at UMass I've read too many letters condemning Jews and Judaism. I feel offended by Tuesday's hate-mongering by Prof. Helen Cullen. She makes illogical statements that she labels "historical record" about Judaism. The irony of this revisionist account coming on the heels of Holocaust Remembrance Week has prompted a long overdue reply.

Judaism's appeal to me is its promotion of choice. I embrace a religion and culture that encourages questioning and the freedom to interpret its teachings in a way that is spiritually enriching for the individual. I've often thought the Old Testament was a rich source of folklore (definitely a minority interpretive view in my religious Jewish family) largely because, like the New Testament, it reflects the dominant male time period in which it was written and literally feels out of date.

Irony and anger abound when I read that Cullen believes usage of Old Testament writings — a foundation of Christianity by the way — has served "to blame women for all of the tragedies and sufferings of the human race." Cullen's writing is offensive to me, whose thoughts regularly go to my grandmother who, unlike her murdered parents and siblings, survived the brutal regime of Adolph Hitler.

Cullen's conclusion that "traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings" tears at my soul. Earlier this week, for the first time in 20 years, I wore my Star of David necklace. My Jewish identity is clearly not offensive to friends, colleagues and clients who opt to interact with me every day. But despite having never met me, since I identify as a Jew, according to Prof. Cullen's logic, I thereby offend her.

Hate-mongering is abhorrent. Sweeping generalizations are oppressive. As hateful and oppressive words came out of the mouth of a professor I feel the hurt more. Her letter was felt to be offensive to each and every person of varying religious beliefs and skin colors who I discussed it with.

Deborah Stoloff
graduate student in Counseling and School Psychology program

To the editor:

I was outraged and disgusted by the letter that ran in the Collegian Tuesday. The sort of blatant anti-Semitism expressed in this letter, under the guise of "history," is exactly the sort of poison that keeps the conflicts between us going.

Helen Cullen is listed as a professor emeritus of the math and statistics department. I cannot think of a single academic who would dare submit to any journal or conference a paper as poorly reasoned and based on narrow, tunnel-blind interpretations of both logic and history. The Old Testament, the letter reads, is a document of the Jewish religion — many oppressors (Mormons, the Confederate South, South Africans) who primarily practice religions containing the Old Testament have oppressed Blacks — therefore, the authors of the Old Testament are the cause of Black oppression.

Cullen does not, it seems, give any credit to the myriad other influences on this disparate societies; the fact that the Old Testament is the basis for none of them hold no weight with her. Interestingly, she states that the Arabs are also the targets of this ancient Jewish book; and yet the Koran contains many laws and traditions that parallel the Jewish traditions; Islam, as well as Christianity (and Mormon), has its basis in Judaism.

Cullen adds insult to injury by not even taking these views to be the product of her mind: "Judaism and Jewish identity, I am told ..." Then she ends the letter by stating the "facts" she presents can be checked by anyone. Apparently, Prof. Cullen does not need to actually research these sorts of things; the fact that she has been told them is sufficient to justify her belief.

I am Jewish. Jews have oppressed other people; to deny that would be ridiculous. But Jews did not invent oppression any more than they are the sole purveyors of it. Many populations which have never seen a Jew, let alone been influenced by the Old Testament have oppressed others.

The appearance of this letter, as I have mentioned, disturbs me. I can only hope that a better understanding of the complex interplay between groups can be reached through communication and a research of history.

To the editor:

The letter by Helen Cullen regarding Jewish history was so insulting, bigoted and riddled with misinformation that I feel I must respond to it. Apparently, she has confused the Torah with the Talmud. The Torah, or law, is what we now have as the first of five books of the Old Testament, known collectively s the Pentateuch. The first of these, Genesis, is where the story of Adam and Eve can be found. The Torah was written and compiled by Moses, whose death is recorded at 1451 B.C. The Talmud is a commentary on Jewish scripture written and compiled by the Rabbinic scholars of the first four centuries after the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans.

Nowhere in the scripture, Old or New Testament, is there justification for racism. Throughout time, people have misused and misquoted scripture to their own ends, but this is obvious to anyone with knowledge of the context or history of the Bible. If by Arabs she means Muslims, their history is also in Genesis, as Abraham was also the father of that people through the divine intervention of the same God, known to them as Allah.

Persecution of a people for race, religion, gender or any other superficial reason is, in my opinion, more a direct result of blind hate, disrespect and ignorance than anything else. Prof. Cullen's letter is a good example of how this bias spreads from one generation to the next. It can, and must, be stopped by its recognition and social unacceptability. It is this prejudice that is offensive to human beings and will always cause trouble. Remember, it's only been 50 years since the Holocaust.

I must suggest strongly to Prof. Cullen that she takes a course in Jewish history; Judaic 101 is being offered this summer. There is no excuse for the spreading of ignorance and it cannot be tolerated.

Opinion/Editorial

University needs to be stronger

Helen F. Cullen is an anti-Semite. She is also an emeritus professor for the Department of Mathematics and Statistics at this University. Her status as an emeritus distinguishes her as an honoree faculty member which grants her to be a life-time member of this University's faculty.

This is a woman who successfully was able to pay for an anti-Semitic ad that appeared recently in the Daily Hampshire Gazette. She is a known anti-Semite who has a well documented history of writings, ads and actions that define her as anti-Semitic. The question I raise is why has this woman been allowed and tolerated by the University's administration, and by the academic and local community of the Pioneer Valley, where she continuously promotes hate in addition to her unfounded and asinine views? Why hasn't the administration taken any action to strip this individual of her bestowed honorable title of emeritus and send a message out — this University refuses to tolerate any discrimination and hate by anyone including faculty. Furthermore, one must question why no official administrator has ever attempted to get rid of Ms. Cullen prior, due to her record as an anti-Semite?

Adam Scott Roberts

Cullen claims that "Judaism and Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the world." Ironically, it is her egregious statements such as this one that try to place blame on the tensions that plague this campus and the entire world. Ironically, she is a racist, and targets the Jews and makes accusations that she herself is guilty of in her hateful propaganda.

Furthermore, she is using the math and statistics department's name for which she is a life-time member, reflecting upon the department and the University. They should not just try to distance themselves from a member of their faculty — they should condemn her and call for her immediate removal. Chancellor David K. Scott should take immediate action in having Ms. Cullen stripped of her title and apologize to all members of this University including alumni for ever allowing such an individual to be a part of this academic institution.

As a Jew, I have a strong connection to my heritage and Jewish identity. I am insulted and surprised that this University, which prides itself on multiculturalism and diversity, would condone such statements by allowing Ms. Cullen to remain as member of this University.

Professors are supposed to foster an atmosphere to stimulate thought — they are not supposed to, nor is it acceptable to, promote hate and propaganda. In revoking her title of emeritus and removing her as a member of UMass academe, the administration will send a strong message to the Jewish students, faculty and the entire alumni that individuals such as Ms. Cullen will not be tolerated now or ever.

In not specifically announcing any plan of action, the chancellor and administration seem to set a scale for determining different types of racism. Had a letter been printed that specifically targeted African-Americans, Asians, Arabs or homosexuals, the University would have been up in arms in outrage. However, it only can appear that since the attack was aimed at the Jews and our history and identity, one can only conclude the administration is saying that targeting Jews isn't really racism but rather is on the line of racism.

It is Ms. Cullen's racist and insulting opinions that can be turned into an educational instrument that does not need any classroom to be useful. She has successfully aided the community in reminding us that anti-Semitism still flourishes today. Ms. Cullen has proven many things: she is a disgrace to society and can only be credited as successfully stirring the community — the very same thing she accuses the Jews of doing.

Moreover, the administration needs to know that speakers may come to this University to educate on occasion. However, these speakers are only guests and disappear from this campus after their speeches. It is important that the University have members of their own administration and faculty to educate and discuss such important issues that affect us all. I call for the immediate removal of Ms. Cullen, who insults the intelligence of all members involved in the higher education institutions of the world.

Ms. Cullen, I am a Jew — I am a proud Jew. I wear my Jewish "Chai" with pride. You can insult, degrade and promote your hate. However, the one thing you can never take from me is my dignity, my heritage and my identity. As a result, you have only strengthened these things and the connection I have as Jew to the Jewish community and the world.

Letters to the Editor

Editor's note: Letters are in response to the letter "History behind campus tensions" by Helen Cullen on May 2.

To the editor:

On Tuesday, a blatantly anti-Semitic letter appeared in the Collegian. The letter was written by Helen Cullen, a former faculty member in the department of mathematics and statistics.

I am the head of that department, and I write to disassociate the department of mathematics and statistics in every way from the repulsive remarks made in that letter. Our department strives to create a vibrant, enriched environment in which the teaching and learning process can flourish, and we open our arms wide and embrace and encourage all who come into that environment.

Additionally, this incident carries a very personal dimension for me. Helen Cullen apparently believes she is expressing these thoughts on behalf of the African American community. Although she is not African American, I am. She most decidedly does not speak for me, nor do I believe that her expressions of hate are in any way representative of the thinking of the African American community. In particular, I find the remarks expressed in Helen Cullen's letter utterly disgusting and despicable.

To the editor:

I would like to comment on the letter from Professor Emeritus Helen Cullen published in the May 2 Collegian. I am surprised that the Collegian would choose to publish such a letter. Now that it has been published, however, it is terribly important for the readership of the Collegian to understand that the views expressed by one professor in no way reflect the views of other faculty members on this campus, nor indeed of the faculty as a whole. Personally, I find the concluding sentence ("consequently, one can only conclude that traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race") appalling and completely unsupported, within the letter or elsewhere.

To the editor:

Telling the sufferings of the Jews and other victims of the awful Nazi-Regiment is important, necessary and understandable, and useful also for the coherence of Jewish people of today. But sometimes only proclaiming that those sufferings should not happen again does not seem to me sufficient. You will find the roots of the Nazi Regiment in the agony of the Weimar-Demo-crazy. Who really wants to research how "it" could happen has to be busy with that history. And by the way (to the reported observations of Mr. Bloom in Germany): Surely you will find here and there some xenophobian graffiti on German walls. But xenophobia is in Germany today by no means more widespread than in other civilized countries, including the United States.

Dr. Wilhelm Kuhlmann

To the editor:

We are writing as co-chairs of the Jewish Faculty and Staff Group to protest Helen Cullen's letter.

Helen Cullen's letter is outrageously anti-Semitic. She uses a series of half-truths, lies and misrepresentations to demonize Jews, a tactic with which we are all too familiar. The fact that she submitted her letter to the Collegian to be published during Holocaust Memorial Week was an attempt to desecrate the memory of those who were murdered by Nazis and to provide a rationale and justification for their murder.

Professor Cullen's letter also attempts to create antagonism between the African American community and the Jewish community. We have witnessed throughout this year continuing attempts by people who are members of neither community to create such divisions. We are thankful that people of good heart, intellect and courage in the African American community, in the Jewish community, and in other communities on campus (including faculty, staff and students) have worked hard this year in rejecting attempts at polarization.

We are thankful that people from all segments of our University community have worked hard at keeping attention focused on our common foes: those who would foment hate, those who would rationalize and justify genocide and murder, those who would demonize a particular group of people, those who would have us ignore the "social contract" that requires all of us to care about each other and to create a University environment where we can all thrive.

During our observance last week of Holocaust Memorial Day, in the midst of our sadness we renewed our pledge never to forget, always to speak out vigorously against the hatred embodied in messages such as Helen Cullen's. We wish that Helen Cullen had not written her letter, but more importantly we hope for a time when no one will hold such views about Jews or about any other social group or act upon them. We firmly believe that the overwhelming majority of people on campus reject the message in Helen Cullen's letter. We are greatly encouraged by the strong criticism against it that is being voiced on campus, who realize that an attack against one group is an attack against all. As a community, we must continue to stand together as we combat hatefulness in all of its ugly forms. In order for this fight to be most effective, we all need ongoing education, bridge building, communication, sensitivity, study of Jewish history and the histories of other people, and the cooperation of the entire University community.

To the editor:

As concerned members of the Jewish community, we would like to respond to Helen F. Cullen's letter regarding tensions between African Americans and Jews. Letters such as Cullen's, which distort the beliefs of Jews, serve only to make tensions worse rather than to build bridges between the two communities. While Jews do in fact believe in the Old Testament, which contains the story of Adam and Eve, this is also a fundamental part of the Christian faith. By criticizing Jews in this manner, Cullen is also insulting Christians. We do not intend to perpetuate tension that for some reason exists between two oppressed groups, nor do we hope to offend members of any religion.

Riders to compete nationally again

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

A tradition is being established by the University of Massachusetts equestrian team, as they have earned the right to compete nationally for the second year in a row.

UMass coach Wendy Cicciu's squad outdistanced its nearest competitor by a convincing 45 points, leading them to their second regional title in as many years.

UMass rider Janelle Parker also ended the season as the region's leader in points. Parker and her team travel to Colorado State University this weekend to compete against the nation's top riders for the prestigious Miller's cup.

"This is the second time in 19 years UMass has earned the right to compete at the nationals, which proves the team isn't just riding on luck," Cicciu said. "Winning the region this year by such a large margin reflects how much the team has matured and also shows that all our hard work has really paid off."

UMass earned 298 points this season. Mount Holyoke College was their nearest rival with 253 points. In regional competition, teams accumulate points for individual shows. Over 5,000 collegiate riders from 18 regions of the country participate in the regional shows.

At the national championships, only a select group of 108 riders compete individually. In team competition, only the top team from each region, out of a total of 200 teams nationwide, competes for the national title.

UMass looks to ride home with that title.

was visibly upset and protested with the umpire — but to no avail. The potential tying run did not cross the plate and the inning ended with the Minutemen trailing 4-3.

"It was definitely the turning point in the game, if I was safe we had some big guys coming up to hit," Jette said. "I thought I had third, everybody thought I was safe, and I definitely got under the tag."

Instead of scoring the tying run, the Minutemen went cold and were blanked the rest of the way by Northeastern pitcher Paul Houser. Houser retired nine UMass batters in a row at one point and hurled a complete game, allowing only three earned runs on six hits, walked three and struck out five.

The Huskies knocked up Dart for two hits in the eighth before Stone looked to his bullpen and sophomore Jason Bennett, who was last week's Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week, for relief. Bennett was unable to display the magic of the prior week, as four more Northeastern runs scored in the final two innings.

The Minutemen look to re-group as they travel to Connecticut today to face the Blue Devils of Central Connecticut. Game time is at 3 p.m.

Astros, Rockies and Cardinals all win

Astros 11, Cubs 2

CHICAGO (AP) — Darryl Kile allowed three hits in six shutout innings and doubled in two runs as the Houston Astros routed the Chicago Cubs 11-2 Wednesday for their third consecutive win.

Kile (1-1) struck out four and walked none. Dean Hartgraves, making his major league debut, walked three and allowed a run and one hit in one-plus inning.

Jim Dougherty relieved with the bases loaded in the eighth and completed the six-hitter. He gave up a run-scoring, double-play grounder to Kevin Roberson in the eighth and an RBI single to Jose Hernandez in the ninth.

Steve Trachsel (0-1) allowed four runs and six hits in 4 2/3 innings as the Cubs lost their third straight. Houston, which had 14 hits, took a 1-0 lead in the second on Luis Gonzalez's second homer of the season. Biggio hit a three-run homer in the fifth, and Houston batted around in a four-run sixth. Kile's double and Derek Bell's run-run single made it 8-0. Craig Shipley's two-run homer in the seventh put Houston ahead 10-0. Bell added an RBI groundout in the eighth.

Rockies 12, Padres 7

DENVER (AP) — Joe Girardi tied a club record with six RBIs as the Colorado Rockies rallied to beat the San Diego Padres 12-7 Wednesday.

Colorado rallied from a 5-0 deficit with a five-run fourth inning off Joey Hamilton (0-1), then went ahead in the fifth on Girardi's first homer of the season, which chased Hamilton. While Hamilton was breezing through his first three innings, allowing just one bloop hit, the Padres built a lead against Kevin Ritz and reliever A.J. Sager.

In the first, Ken Caminiti had the first of his three RBIs with a ground-out, and Roberto Petagine followed with an RBI single. Caminiti drove in another run in the third with a single. In the fourth, Bip Roberts singled, took second on a groundout and scored on Tony Gwynn's two-out single. Caminiti then doubled for a 5-0 advantage.

The Rockies promptly erased the deficit in their half of the fourth, helped by three errors. Dante Bichette and Andres Galarraga both reached on singles, and Mike Kingery tripled. Girardi then drove in Kingery with an infield hit.

The Rockies' fourth run scored on Roberto Mejia's groundout, and pinch-hitter John Vander Wal completed the scoring with an RBI single.

Bichette and Galarraga scored ahead of Girardi's two-out homer in the fifth.

San Diego's Melvin Nieves hit a solo homer in the seventh. The Rockies countered with a run in their half on Vinny Castilla's single. Steve Finley singled in a San Diego run in the eighth. Kingery got his third RBI when he drew a bases-loaded walk off Jeff Tabaka in the ninth. Girardi then hit a two-run single. Roger Bailey, the third of six Rockies pitchers, earned his second win in as many days. Bruce Ruffin pitched the last 1 1/3 innings for his third save.

Cardinals 8, Pirates 6

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Pitcher Allen Watson drove in a pair of runs and got his first win of the season as St. Louis took an early 8-1 lead.

"Sometimes, its hard for me to concentrate when I have a big lead," Watson said. "Today, I tried to act like the game was close and on the line every inning when I went out there. I got tired in the sixth, but it wasn't from a lack of concentration. I didn't have my good stuff, but I didn't allow any home runs and I got ground balls."

Watson (1-0), making his second start this year, allowed four runs and nine hits in 5 1/3 innings. In his previous outing, Watson had 7-2 lead over the New York Mets and ended up with no decision.

Pirates rookie Esteban Loaiza (1-1) allowed eight runs and 11 hits in 3 1/3 innings. His ERA rose to 8.64.

Brian Jordan gave the Cardinals a scare in the ninth with a diving catch and a slide to break up a double play. The right fielder said this spring he was going to be a little less aggressive after getting sidelined with injuries during parts of the previous two seasons.

With the score tied 1-1, the Cardinals scored five runs in the third on Jordan's RBI single, Scott Cooper's run-scoring groundout, Jose Oquendo's two-run double and Watson's RBI single. St. Louis make it 8-1 in the fourth on Cooper's RBI double and Jordan's run-scoring single.

games of the season.

"We should've won more games than we did," Brew said. "I think we could have. A lot of times, I don't think we were sure of ourselves. If we went out more positive, with confidence, we would have done better.

"A lot of times we didn't play as a team. The defense would have a great game one day and then the offense would have a great game the next day. The games that we both connected were the games that we won and the games that we did well together," she said.

Success in the future will rely on the experience the team has acquired this year. Brew realizes this was a year of transition and development. She is extremely optimistic about how her team will fare next season.

"I definitely think that next year we're going to come out and we're going to win a lot more games. We're going to come out stronger," she said. "Maybe we just needed one year to practice and play together. Each game we have built upon. We played better and trusted each other a bit more each time. Now, we're starting with more of a foundation so we can go from there."

For Brew, there is nowhere else to go but up. In high school, she captained her lacrosse team to a state semi-final berth and enjoyed playing field hockey, another sport which she plans to continue playing this summer at home. An animal science and pre-vet major, Brew hopes to continue with lacrosse after she graduates, maybe coaching on a lower level.

"I want to be remembered as a good lacrosse player, as a good goalie and as someone who tried," Brew said. "A team player."

Harris named NBA Coach of the Year

NEW YORK (AP) — Del Harris, who guided the Los Angeles Lakers to the second-biggest improvement in the NBA from last season, today was chosen the league's Coach of the Year.

Harris, 57, in his first season with the Lakers, received 62 of a possible 105 votes from a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters. Cleveland's Mike Fratello was second with 15 votes. He was followed by San Antonio's Bob Hill with 12 votes, Utah's Jerry Sloan with 11 and Dallas' Dick Motta with five.

The Lakers, who failed to qualify for the playoffs for the first time in 18 years after posting a 33-49 record last season, improved by 15 games to 48-34 this season and qualified for the postseason. Only the Dallas Mavericks, who went from 13-69 to 36-46 — 23 more victories than the previous season — improved more than the Lakers. Los Angeles also had a big upswing in scoring, going from an average of 101.4 points per game, 17th in the league last season, to 105.1, seventh this season.

Harris will receive the Red Auerbach Trophy, named for the president of the Boston Celtics, who led the team to nine NBA championships between the 1956-57 and 1966-67 seasons.

EVERETT, Wash. (AP) — Seattle Seahawks coach Dennis Erickson chose Wednesday to defer his prosecution on drunken-driving charges and begin two years of treatment for his drinking problem. If he successfully completes the program, which will be closely monitored by probation officers, Snohomish County prosecutors will drop the charges, Everett District Court administrator Lois Eaden said.

The treatment will not interfere with Erickson's coaching. "He understands he's got a responsibility to the community, and also he's got a responsibility to the team and organization," Seahawks spokesman Gary Wright said. "And he's going to meet all those responsibilities."

Erickson was arrested April 15 near Marysville, about 25 miles north of Seattle, after other drivers reported his erratic driving to police. A breath test measured his blood-alcohol level at .23 percent. The legal limit in Washington is .10 percent. As part of his agreement with prosecutors, Erickson had to agree he needed treatment, Eaden said.

"I made a mistake," Erickson said. "I don't want this to happen again and by going deferred prosecution this will give me the opportunity to ensure it won't happen again."

If convicted, he faced one to two days' mandatory jail time, $350 to $1,000 in fines, and suspension for his driver's license for up to 120 days. Erickson appeared Wednesday in court, where Judge Roger Fisher approved and ordered the deferred treatment.

Women's series ends with Caribbean lecture

By Maureen Rozanski
Collegian staff

Monday night the Five College Women's Studies Research Center concluded its "Works In Progress" series with the presentation of academic scholar and socio-political activist Alexandrina Deschamps at Mount Holyoke College.

Deschamps, a Dominican native, is currently studying at UMass for her doctorate in developmental education.

She has done research in the Eastern Caribbean and her studies focused upon participatory research of gender development on the island of St. Vincent.

"My voice is a woman's voice," said Deschamps as she stressed a deep personal interest in the behavior of women in the villages of St. Vincent.

She said she was inspired by her own experiences, female friendships, childhood, motherhood and socio-political activism, she studied the lives of women in the villages of St.Vincent transforming their communities.

"Most Dominican women don't know what the word 'feminist' is," Deschamps said. "For the women, populist feminine work is a way of survival."

On the island of St. Vincent and other Eastern Caribbean islands, Deschamps stressed the importance of community, kinship and survival strategies.

In St. Vincent she said she observed the progress of the Women and Development Unit project (WAND) — established to target micro-developmental issues through the empowerment, consciousness-raising and transformation of socio-political aspects of village life in St. Vincent.

The WAND project enabled women to broaden and sharpen their creative skills, while using their voice and power to alleviate social, domestic and political problems in their village communities, Deschamps said.

She said she focused specifically on the distinction between the female's role in the private versus public sector of the community. For many Eastern Caribbean women, survival chores and services reflected in the community involved all aspects of domestic, social and political life.

"I'm not here implying that there's no inequality between men and women ... by work and communal activity women gain a well-informed knowledge of the community, but gain status through men only," Deschamps said.

Deschamps said she left St.Vincent feeling that the progress of WAND was "transferable, cohesive and valid," and that Caribbean women "have been brilliantly creative in their response to economic crisis."

Deschamps said she is currently compiling notes and data on the progress of WAND, as her dissertation targets the actual functioning of participatory progress and its validity.

Faculty take part in educational TV

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts School of Education began airing a series of educational television programs on Dimension Cable Channel 20 last week.

The programs consist of topics and subject matter appropriate for children, communicated by UMass faculty.

"These programs will help get educational issues out to the community, so that the University can be more closely connected with the public schools, parents and children," said Bailey W. Jackson, dean of the School of Education.

The first program is entitled "Teacher Feature." This show takes a look at Amherst teachers and students at Mark's Meadow Elementary Laboratory School.

In the first show of this series, Amherst teacher Diane Mercomes conducts an instructional program on the Nubian civilization.

"This show will really give parents insight into a master teacher's planning and teaching skills," said Liane Brandon, co-director of UMass Educational Television co-director.

One of the programs, "Who knows," features UMass faculty and staff answering children's questions on a variety of subjects.

"Children ask the best questions, and their simple questions provide great opportunities to show young children that the University is an exciting place," said Richard Konicek, a School of Education faculty member.

Some of the other programs that will be aired are "Good Night Amherst," which shows faculty and staff reading bedtime stories to children, and "Teacher Tech," which is a five-part series on technology in education.

This program shows children how to develop media literacy with faculty and staff who are experts on the effects of television and how to help children overcome the pressures of the media.

According to Brandon, all of the programs are pilot shows.

"We will see which ones work, and then we will continue to produce those shows in the fall," Brandon said.

"I hope the children who watch will get a different type of programming on television instead of the regular programs they usually watch," said Jackson.

According to Jackson, "Faculty and staff will be able to get a wider contact with the children and their parents. This will also help them capitalize on the resources that are available."

Jackson said these programs will run through the middle of May.

"Watching UMass Educational Television programs will be a new experience. We hope that families will watch our program together and be stimulated to talk with each other about what they see," said Brandon.

to expose her point of view, she said.

However, she also said that hers was "one point of view that needed to be heard." Her view stipulated that the 3,300 years of suffering that the Jews have experienced are proof that "they have a long history of trouble with people," Cullen said.

"She takes huge amounts of historical information and applies it to simplistic formulas that don't say anything," said John Bracey, secretary of the Faculty Senate and a professor of Afro-American studies. "Arguments based on religious history are not valid anyway — they have a mythological value."

Cullen claims she wrote the letter in defense of Blacks, Arabs and women. She said they are the victims of racism in the Old Testament of the Bible, which is the primary text for Judaism.

"If she's concerned about stereotyping and scapegoating, let her look into her own actions," said Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter.

According to Donald St. Mary, head of the department of mathematics and statistics, Cullen's views do not represent those of the department, or the Black community.

"It affected me as an African-American," St. Mary said. "She purports to be speaking in some sense on the behalf of the African-American community. I can assure you that she does not."

In the time that St. Mary has known and worked with Cullen, he said that this is the first time he had heard her voice "anti-Semitic" views. In the past he had heard her make statements that were either anti-Catholic or anti- Christian, St. Mary said.

Bracey expressed sentiments of the same nature, and questioned the Collegian's decision to print the letter. He said that Cullen once came to a union meeting and insisted that the Pope was conspiring to take over the campus.

"You know, from now on she's going to send [the Collegian] a letter every week," Bracey said. "Now she's [the Collegian's] friend."

On Tuesday, Hillel held a meeting with a large turnout of "hurt and angry" students, according to James Resnick, student president of Hillel. They are planning a rally against anti-Semitism for next Thursday on the Student Union steps.

Highlights...

None if you're a fan of Massachusetts. The Minutemen turned in their worst performance of the season as Brown dominated every aspect of the game. Josh Selig and James Gaensbauer each had four goals, while Dave Evans three goals and three assists in the game ... Brendan Glass had three goals, while Mike Valente added two goals and two assists for the Minutemen. Massachusetts will play its final game of the season Saturday at Army.

could have won on defense alone, as Dennis Fitzgibbons conducted a coverage clinic in which teammates Dennis Sullivan and Kevin Braney were head instructors.

"If we play that well again in the playoffs, we're going to be tough to play," Lasagna said. "I knew we had to shut down their attack and their patterns. They're a very patterned team and they run those two-man and three-man plays really well, so we wanted to try to disrupt them."

The disruption led to disintegration. Fitzgibbons knew Brendan Glass' life history by the final horn, and while UMass' top scorer added three tallies (Nos. 34, 35 and 36), two came in garbage time.

Robin Prince put Brown ahead 5-1 at 3:51 of the second, and though UMass had two extra man opportunities soon after, Longmeadow's Chris Martinelli scored with a quick stick (lacrosse's version of the one-timer) from Alex Goodman (four assists) at 11:54 and Gaensbauer added another at 14:45 for a 7-1 halftime lead.

Cannella sat second leading scorer Jeremy Murphy for the first quarter, and his blistering shot was sorely missed in limited duty thereafter. Bailey and Mike Valente (two goals, two assists) did some damage, but it was another case of a superior offense burying UMass' thinning attack.

John Kasselakis relieved LoPresti in goal at the start of the second half but fared no better. Martinelli scored on the first shot on the freshman at 1:50, and though Mike DelPercio cut it to 8-2 at 2:58 from Valente, Brown scored three more in the next 3:19, the last on a sweet 360-degree spin in the slot by Gaensbauer that prompted a UMass timeout.

Lost in between was a rare example of a goal that UMass could use a lot more of. At 4:37, Jay Robbins won a clean faceoff, streaked into the offensive zone and fed Glass on his left for the score.

The Bears, all but assured of an NCAA tournament bid, were without injured No. 2 scorer Brian McNally. Goalie Greg Cattrano (eight saves, six goals allowed) got the win before giving way to Dan Giannuzzi with about 7:30 left.

■ NCAA

lackadaisically. Offensively, defensively and in goal, UMass played a sloppy game.

In the second quarter, the Minutemen made few attempts to penetrate Brown's defense and didn't attempt a shot until Brendan Glass sent a bounce shot wide of the goal, with 45 seconds to play.

"Most of the team just didn't show up today," UMass attackman Mike Valente said. "We weren't hungry enough and we lacked intensity."

"We were flat, and they never let up," goaltender John Kasselakis said. [We learned that] we've got to come to play every day.

"This was our chance and we didn't capitalize."

The Bears taught UMass a valuable lesson in what can happen when a team doesn't show up mentally for a title game of this magnitude.

Failing to qualify last year as well, this will represent the first time since 1985 that UMass has gone two seasons without earning an NCAA bid, and for the first time since 1983 that they have had successive seasons devoid of a New England Championship.

Due to today's weak showing, for the second consecutive year, a meaningless game against Army will conclude the season for the Minutemen and not NCAA competition.

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

The UMass men's lacrosse team, shown here against Syracuse, got smacked by the Brown Bears yesterday 18-8.

Brown takes NCAA bid from men's lacrosse

New England Championship goes to Bears in 18–8 drilling

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — If future New England Lacrosse Championships are this one-sided, it will have to be re-named the Super Bowl.

The No. 9 Brown Bears (9–5) whacked No. 10 University of Massachusetts (6–5) 18–8 yesterday at Stevenson Field, eliminating the Minutemen from post-season consideration.

Massachusetts	8
Brown	18

UMass did not show up for this pivotal game, as Brown hit the throttle from the opening faceoff and never let up.

After Eric Bailey tied it 1–1 at 6:58 of the first quarter, the Bears reeled off seven goals in a row and tenaciously denied UMass the chance to come back.

Josh Selig, one of the game's most accurate shooters, scored on all four shots he took, giving him 26 goals for the season. He opened the scoring at 5:34 of the first and began the decisive run at 9:43, taking a feed over the defense from James Gaensbauer (four goals) and beating Tom LoPresti.

Leading scorer David Evans (three goals, three assists) started his busy day at 2:57 of the second, hitting Selig for a long score from LoPresti's left to make it 4–1.

Brown has made the second quarter its best all year, outscoring opponents 60–23. But it wasn't so much that Brown scored four unanswered goals in the second period, but that they limited Massachusetts to only one shot in the period, as the Minutemen's confidence was drained.

"We were beat by a team that outhustled us," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Their effort was better and we didn't come ready to play mentally. [UMass] learned when you play a good team and you don't come ready to play, you get your ass kicked."

UMass' lack of preparation was compounded by Brown coach Peter Lasagna's infallible game plan. The Bears

Minutemen fail to reach NCAAs for second year

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—The 10th-ranked University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse traveled to No. 9 Brown yesterday for a date with destiny.

With a victory over the Bears, euphoria would ensue. The Minutemen would secure the New England Championship, and along with it, a likely berth in the NCAA tournament. In a year that saw the passing of the legendary Dick Garber and a coaching change for only the second time since 1955, a berth in the NCAA tournament would be the perfect way to finish the 1995 season.

A loss to Brown and failure to gain an NCAA berth would represent a complete and utter disaster. Failing to qualify for the NCAA tournament, the accomplishments of the entire season world be rendered moot.

With only the nation's top 12 teams included in the NCAA tournament, neither Brown nor UMass could qualify without winning this game and securing the New England championship. The task was at hand when the Minutemen arrived in at Stevenson Field, and the mission clear.

The mission, to beat Brown, failed miserably.

The Bears steamrolled UMass by a deceptive 18–8 final score. The game was not even that close. Brown led 7–1 at the half, 13–4 after three quarters, and coasted from there, right into the NCAAs.

"I knew it would come down to this game, it always does," Brown coach Peter Lasagna said. "This was a playoff game and we had played with playoff intensity in a game we knew that we had to win. We came to play and felt confident as a result."

The same response did not come from the Minutemen, who played their most apathetic game in arguably their most important game of the season.

"We were beat by a team that outhustled us," UMass coach Greg Cannnella said. "Their effort was better and we didn't come ready to play mentally. We learned that when you play a good team and you don't come ready to play you get your ass kicked."

To his credit, defender Vin Dello–Iacono did an exceptional job in marking David Evans, Brown's leading scorer. Evans scored three goals, but only one while covered by Dello–Iacono.

Little positive can be said of the remainder of the team who played

Fielding woes doom Massachusetts

They say defense wins championships.Luckily, there was not one on the line yesterday for the home team.

The University of Massachusetts baseball team had some troubles in the pasture of Earl Lorden field as seven Minuteman errors contributed to an 8–3 defeat at the hands of the Northeastern Huskies.

"When you make seven errors, you're not going to win ball games," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We have been playing sloppy and getting away with it in the past, but we gave them four runs early."

Despite lack of support in the field, junior southpaw David Dart provided solid pitching on the mound for UMass, striking out six Huskies in eight innings while only allowing four earned runs.

"I felt good out there and sometimes you're forced to throw some pitches you really don't want to throw," Dart said. "We have a great defense, but that's the way baseball goes sometimes."

In the bottom of the first inning, the Minutemen got on the board first when junior lead–off man Ryan Jette walked and stole second base. Freshman Mucho Dagfbre followed with a deep fly–out, enabling Jette to tag–up and advance to third. Jette was plated when junior Nelson Ubaldo hit a sacrifice fly to right–center field to round up the scoring.

Each team picked up runs to keep the score tied at two until the fifth stanza, when Dart was tatooed for a two–run shot off the bat of Northeastern's Mike O'Donnell that put the Huskies ahead, 4–2.

In the bottom half of the same inning, junior Justin Kelly lined a base hit and stole second, putting himself into scoring position. Jette stepped up to the plate and drilled a line shot over the Husky center-fielder's head. Kelly scored from second and Jette was on his way to a triple before he was thrown out at third on a questionable call. Stone

The Minuteman baseball team committed seven costly errors on its way to an 8–3 loss at the hands of Northeastern.

Brew is a keeper for UMass

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

"My mom was the coach of my eighth grade team and we didn't have a goalie. She didn't want to play favorites so she put me in goal. I've loved it ever since." — Kate Brew

Fortunately for the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, freshman Kate Brew has come a long way since the days of recreational league in her hometown of Annapolis, Md.

Brew has already made a name for herself nationally in her first collegiate appearance, holding the 10th best save percentage in the country with 0.613 as of May 1, and climbing as high as fourth over the course of the year.

Having started all 13 games of the season, Brew has made an impressive 196 saves with a 10.89 goals against average. Not bad for a freshman who was recruited to back up the existing goalie.

Brew has proven that she does not belong on the bench. She recalls the first game of the season against Brown as the game that stands out most in her mind. The Minutewomen lost this heartbreaker 8–7 in sudden death overtime.

"I was so nervous going into our first game against Brown," Brew said. "Before the game, I didn't know if I was going to play or sit the bench. I ended up playing the entire game. I was so excited to just get a chance. It was my favorite game to play in."

Brew is a strong and aggressive goaltender. She provides a quick and mobile resistance, an anchor for a defense led by the powerhouse three from Ridley High, Penn., which includes sophomores Erica Bryan, Kristen Hocker and Michelle Warrington.

"Her size could be a detriment, but it does take skill no matter how tall you are," Hocker said. "There are a lot of big goalies out there that duck at the ball — she is not scared."

"Mentally, my weakness is that I can get down on myself and take myself out of the game," Brew said. "I want to stop every ball that comes to me. A lot of times I get frustrated. I get down on the defense more than I think I should, but maybe because we're a young team and we don't have leadership on the defense. I try to take it over but I don't think that I go about it in the right way."

This season for the Minutewomen is indicative of the potential waiting to explode next year. Brew knows what can happen to a team whose new crop of freshmen includes three high school All–Americans and two All–American honorable mentions, and a complete returning starting line– up that will only lose one to graduation. Not to mention new recruits eagerly awaiting their chance to play with such a talented squad.

"I enjoy playing with this team," Brew said. "We're a young team. I know that comes up a lot, but it's true. We've really come together and work very well together. It's fun to play with them because they are a great bunch of people. We're all very different but we enjoy each other out on the field. That is our strength as a team."

Although their record was statistically inconsistent and ended at 3–10, the Minutewomen have made notable progress in their passing and communication skills. Under the guidance of coach Francesca McClellan, Brew and her team have refined the execution of their game plan and have worked on producing a team effort lasting both halves, an integral exchange missing from their earlier

Minutemen end year at New Englands

By Andrew Bard
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team concluded their 1995 season with a fine showing at the New England Championships in Storrs, Conn., last weekend.

After ending the season with a dual match record of 6–6 (9–9 including the fall) and a seventh place Atlantic 10 tournament finish, the Minutemen finished in a fourth place tie with host Connecticut — behind first place University of Hartford, Northeastern University and Providence College.

The Minutemen were led by an outstanding performance by junior Justin Lynn, who won the No. 4 singles flight by defeating U.S. Coast Guard Academy's Arturo Perez 6–0, 6– 1 to win the title. After receiving a first round bye, Lynn put together a run of three straight set victories to advance to the final round of competition. Lynn finished the 1995 campaign with an overall record of 8–2 in singles competition.

Freshman Alex Aller also played well for the Minutemen as he advanced to the semifinals of the No. 6 singles flight. Aller was beaten by eventual No. 6 champion, Joel Merrifield of UConn, 6–4, 6–2. Aller finished the season with an overall team best record of 10–1.

Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon was pleased with her team's performance in Storrs.

"I'm ecstatic," Dixon said. "I couldn't have written a better finish to the season. Everyone played to, or above, their ability level."

The team says goodbye to senior co–captains Tim Lipsky and Keith Murray. Lipsky finished the season with a singles record of 5–6, while Murray finished 0–3 in limited action. The duo finished 4–2 in doubles play. Even with the loss of the two seniors, Dixon still has great expectations for next season.

"I am really optimistic for next year," Dixon said. "We have seven new players coming to this team.

"This is gonna be a turnaround team for UMass tennis. We could have next year, or the year after, a regional ranking with no scholarship money, which is unheard of."

The recruiting class is led by junior transfer Lex Carrington from Easthampton. Carrington was ranked No. 1 in juniors in 1991, and was a member of the junior National tennis team, which played extensively on an international basis. Carrington played one year at Pepperdine University before transferring to Holyoke Community College for his sophomore year, and now is headed to UMass.

The Minutemen also recruited Todd Cheaney from South Dennis. Cheaney was ranked No. 1 in the New England Challenge Division in 1994.

Dixon has also picked up two players from Ohio. The two are Cincinnati native Nathan Kluster, who finished in the top 50 in the Western section in 1994, and Mike Skeels from Plain City, who was ranked No. 1 in the Northwest in 1994. The Minutemen also signed Jason Blind from Lindenhurst, N.Y., who was ranked in the top 75 in the Eastern Tennis Association, and Leonard Davis who was the top–ranked player in his home city of Pittsburgh.

Dixon is also close to signing two more recruits and is already excited about the recruiting class so far.

"I feel like this is the class of UMass tennis," Dixon said. "With Lex and company, we have a chance to be nationally ranked."

Men's rugby demolishes Holy Cross

By Jameson Heos
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's rugby team annihilated the Holy Cross Crusaders in a 73–9 rout in Worcester last weekend.

Despite injuries to key veterans Larry Scanlon (two broken legs) and Robby Debrocke (separated shoulder), the Minutemen were able to improve their record to 4–2, with outstanding play from their younger players.

Freshman back Pete Matson scored the first try in only his second game while also adding another score later in the second half. First semester coach Rich Shewack said he was proud of his team.

"The main points were just the outstanding play of the guys who are new," he said. "They really came through and played a fantastic game."

Wings Pere Berkowitz and Brian Colica led the team by scoring three tries each while keeping the Crusaders chasing UMass all day.

"What really did it for us was that we finally started getting the ball to the speedsters, Pere and Brian," Shewack said.

Holy Cross hardly had possession of the ball and they rarely got the ball out to the wings at all. The Minuteman pack pushed the Crusaders back all day and Holy Cross seldom advanced the ball over midfield. Conner Delaney and Kevin Bunch each scored a try in UMass' fourth win, while Brian Borgeson converted five extra points and nailed a penalty shot to drive the score up.

Holy Cross scored on three penalty kicks but were left short when UMass captain Greg Davie raced down a sprinting Crusader in their only real shot at a try. Holy Cross became disenchanted and a small fight broke out that displayed their frustration. UMass used this altercation to boost themselves up as Berkowitz shortly later raced in for his final try.

The last score of the game came when 8–man Jeff Sotek raced from his own 22–yard line and scored his try to rap up the scoring. Shewack felt that this game was a real indicator of what the Minutemen could do.

"They will pull through so well and I think they are all learning the game rapidly," Shewack said. "I really look forward to our first fall game."

UMass will continue its spring season this Saturday against Mystic River at 1 p.m. at Lower Boyden Field.

UPC budget cut by 23K at chaotic SGA meeting

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

University Productions and Concerts (UPC) was hit hard by the Student Government Association's (SGA) budget that was completed and finally passed at about 1 a.m., closing up a tedious, unorganized meeting Wednesday night.

Budget meetings are confusing and stressful, said Christine Lopes, SGA President. "I wish there was an easier process, but I do respect the process that was taken."

A non–senator shouted over the senate's bickering, "This is violent abuse of the system. This is not how government works."

The senate first voted on the budgets of agencies, and some senators suggested cutting money from UPC because Spring Concert "is a one–day event."

Amidst Speaker Tom Darby's shouts of "Order" and "Shut up," Senator Dan Rivera proposed the passed motion, which took $10,000 from UPC and allotted portions of the money to the following groups.

Men's and women's rugby, $2000; AHORA, $2000; Haitian American Student Association, $1600; Radical Student Union/Alliance for Student Power (RSU/ASP), Casa Dominicana, $1300; Concepto Latino, $250; and the Greek area, $2400.

"We should give funds to groups that are going to affect students to the utmost," Senator Jaime Resnick said in support of the motion.

UPC is a student–run production agency funded through the SGA which puts on about three or four shows in addition to spring concert each semester, according to Stacey Peck, director of UVC promotions.

The Ways and Means committee's recommended budget cut UPC $5000 from last year's $87,064. The loss of the $10,000 and an additional $8000 under the spring concert fund equaled a total cut of $23,000.

"[The senate] threw the money around like it was trinkets," Peck said. "Some organizations gained money they didn't ask for in their budget proposal. [SGA] just didn't consider the organizations and their feelings or UPC not being able to function as a production company."

The groups that received money from the UPC budget deserve the funds, according to Lopes.

"I am disappointed that UPC got a decrease more so than the Ways and Means committee recommended," she said. "But most of the organizations that received the money were very active and prosperous."

Lack of money could make '95 the final UMass spring concert

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The University Productions and Concerts (UPC) held a general staff meeting last night to talk about the Student Government Association's decision to cut $23,000 from the 1995–1996 budget.

"We think it would be way too drastic to not have the spring concert. But; we do feel that the SGA, by not showing support for us next year by cutting our funds, aren't really supporting us now," said Stacey Peck, promotions director for UPC.

Sixteen staff members attended the meeting and decided to continue with this year's spring concert, but wanted to inform the campus that it would be the last one if students didn't start showing support for the UPC.

In response to the budget cuts made by the SGA, the UPC has sent a letter to the SGA, asking them to "take into consideration their proposal and reconsider the difficult situation" they have put UPC in.

The letter also refuted the fact that UPC was not multicultural and that they "disprove any such allegations," a partial listing then followed of some of the diverse acts UPC has presented to the campus with success. A copy of this letter was also sent to Chancellor David K. Scott and the Vice Chancellor of Student Activities Thomas Robinson.

"I think it's really awful how when it comes to budget time, students are pitted against students for money," said Judy Gagnon, student advisor.

One of the issues brought up by the SGA was the fact that UPC didn't feature enough diverse groups that reflected Asian, Latin American, Native American organization (ALANA), Black Mass Communications Project (BMCP) and other minority groups at UMass.

Like other senators and Registered Student Organization's (RSO) representatives, UPC was given three minutes to present their argument, but they felt the time wasn't adequate.

"We were given only three minutes to speak to the SGA and present our side," said Caroline Pollich, production manager. "We were really unprepared going in there because we only thought we were going to lose $5,000 and we had accepted that."

In order to garner student support, UPC is handing out petitions and asking students to write to the SGA. They also plan to use the spring concert to address the campus and ask them to support UPC.

If UPC's budget is not repeated by the SGA, they would be "forced to increase ticket prices, drastically cut back on shows and try to get money from the off–campus crowd," according to Pollich.

Queer Fest is a celebration of pride

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Bright sunshine and music drew people from all over the University of Massachusetts campus to the area by the Student Union for Queer Fest '95, an all–day celebration of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender pride.

"The only disturbanee here is that dog," said Erica Wheeler, a folk singer who performed on a stage set up by the Cape Cod Lounge. Wheeler referred to a dog that was barking at two horses being used by mounted police monitoring the event.

More than a dozen tables were set up on the W.E.B. DuBois Library Lawn by vendors and GLBT community organizations.

Frank Spizucco, manager of Army Barracks, Inc., in Northampton, said he was proud to be selling pride flags, freedom rings, and other GLBT items alongside the regular army surplus goods offered by the franchise.

Tables operated by GLBT organizations offered information and educational carnival games, including "Pin the Tail on the Homophobe" and a variation of bingo called "queer."

David Anderson said he was walking around after lunch when he noticed the crowd by the Campus Pond.

"Someone told me that it was Queer Fest and I said, I knew it was today,' so I came down," said Anderson, a UMass sophomore.

The master of ceremonies for the event was Judith Sloan, a comedian, writer, and performance artist based in New York City.

"Welcome to 'an abomination of society's standards,'" said Sloan, quoting Philip N. Milson, chairman of the Silent Majority, who spoke against Queer Fest at a rally on May 3.

The keynote speaker for the event was Claire Hemmings, who told the audience that her body is unacceptable "because it's queer."

"I've been told by the Church of England and the church here that I can be lesbian, queer, or bisexual, as long as I don't act on it," said Hemmings, a research associate at the Five College Women's Research Center.

Besides Erica Wheeler, performers included poet Susan Stinson, comedian Chris O'Carroll, folk singer Linée Perroncel, and a group from Valley Women's Martial Arts.

Himanshu Patel said the best thing he and his friends got out of Queer Fest were the free balloon hats he was given by a clown who was walking around the area all day.

"Seriously," Patel said, "you just enjoy the day, walking around, getting educated on something that maybe you don't know that much about."

Ellen Rodrigues said she made a point to come to Queer Fest because she was "insulted" by the protest rally that had been held the day before.

"I knew people [who supported the rally] and I was ashamed to go to the same school as them," Rodrigues said.

Many students entered the area without knowing what was happening, and while there were a few raised eyebrows, nearly everyone seemed to take the event in stride.

"I had no idea this was happening, but it looks like fun," said Aaron Raynor, a UMass junior majoring in wood technology.

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested for the two shootings that took place last weekend in Southwest Residential Area.

George Jean–Louis, 19, of Dorchester was arraigned on criminal charges yesterday in Hampshire County District Court, according to a statement released by the UMass Department of Public Safety.

Jean–Louis voluntarily appeared in court, police said.

He was charged on two counts of assault with the intent to murder, one count of carrying a firearm on school grounds and one count of possession of a firearm without a license, according to police records.

Jean–Louis allegedly shot two male non–students on Sunday, causing minor gunshot wounds.

One of the victims is identified as a 20–year–old, and the other as a 25–year–old, police said.

At approximately 4:11 a.m. Jean–Louis was allegedly involved in an argument outside of Washington Residence Hall. The arguing escalated and Jean–Louis allegedly shot off several rounds from a handgun at a person involved in the dispute, police said.

The victims reported that they had been sitting on a nearby wall, and were not involved with the incident when the shooting took place.

One of the victims was found with injuries to the arm and leg, and the other with a stomach wound, police said.

In an incident that occurred earlier that morning, an individual reported that he was assaulted by two males who ripped a gold chain from his neck in front of Hasbrouck Laboratory.

A struggle ensued and after one of the assailants dropped a small handgun, the second picked it up and struck the victim on the head with it, police said.

The assailants fled and the victim declined medical treatment.

In the proceeding incident, a witness who chose to remain anonymous said that the man who had fired the gun fled with another man.

"The University takes these charges very seriously and will be proceeding with the appropriate disciplinary process," said Jo–Anne Vanin, the dean of students and associate vice chancellor for student affairs.

Thomas Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs, released a statement on Wednesday in response to the incident.

"The campus administration is making every effort to pursue a 'no tolerance' policy for this kind of behavior," Robinson said.

The UMass police, with the assistance of the Massachusetts State Police Investigative Unit, are continuing their investigation.

Anyone who has any information relating to the case should contact the University Police Community Disorders Unit at 545–0893.

UMass students to travel to join national protest

By Rana Meyer

SPRINGFIELD — University of Massachusetts students will be joining other campaigners in a nationwide protest against the Contract with America tomorrow in front of the Federal Building.

The National People's Campaign, a coalition opposed to the contract, will host a variety of guest speakers involved in local issues targeted by the document, according to Nick Cameria, a member of the National People's Campaign.

The Contract with America is an agenda set by the Republicans in Congress in an effort to hold their promise of creating a "better America."

Some of the major issues addressed by the contract include subsidies for public education, wel-

Hooker's e-mail informs students, follows UM's plan

By Purva Pandey
Collegian Staff

Yesterday's electronic mail message sent by University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker to numerous faculty, staff and students brought him a step closer to his plan for the year 2000.

Nearly 1,000 faculty, 1,700 staff, 2,300 graduate students and 5,700 undergraduates received the message at UMass– Amherst, according to Duncan Chesley, director of computing administration at the Office of Information Technologies (OIT).

"Using e–mail is one of the goals. We want to utilize existing systems," said Bill Wright, spokesman for the president's office.

In February, Hooker presented "The President's Action Plan for the Year 2000" to the UMass Board of Trustees.

In part of the plan, Hooker called for the use of electronic libraries and inter–campus connections "to promote quality and responsiveness."

In the plan, Hooker also stressed that it would be essential to "put in place the programs necessary for the University to up–date its educational technology infrastructure."

"The use of e–mail makes contacting wide audiences very quick," Wright said. "It puts us in the high–tech computer era."

In the e–mail message sent Thursday, Hooker informed internet users that the House has allocated $9.1 million more to UMass from last year, bringing the UMass budget up to a proposed figure of $19.1 million for next year.

On April 24, Hooker requested $21.7 million for the University to the Senate Committee on Ways and Means. Hooker explained. He said his arguments were "firm."

The senate attempted to pass numerous motions throughout the evening to take away the money which was allotted to the rugby team through the motion because the organization did not go through the proper budget procedure. The final budget for the team was $1200.

"As an RSO (Registered Student Organization), the rugby team did make a mistake," said Jim Simpson, team member. "[Asking for funds] last night was the proper procedure for getting the money without a proposal."

The senate tried to rescind something they had voted on hours before, Simpson said. "There was bickering for four hours and nothing was accomplished," Simpson said.

According to Lopes, the rugby team should not have received any funding. "I am disappointed an organization that did not go through the budget process got funding and an organization like UPC did follow the process and was cut dramatically."

RSOs allotted the largest budgets were the Black Mass Communications Project, $19,500; New World Theatre, $10,400; and the Student Union Art Gallery, $9000.

GLBT Pride March kicks off day's events

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Pioneer Valley pride events continue tomorrow with the 1995 Northampton Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender Pride March.

The celebration that has become the kick–off event for nationwide pride activities will run from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. and will include marchers, speakers, performers and several other GLBT events.

The march is sponsored and organized by local community members who met for several months to plan the day.

Marchers will gather at 11 a.m. at Parson Street Extension near Lampron Park in Northampton. Beginning at 11:30 a.m., they will march down the streets of Northampton, where will meet for a rally at Pulaski Park, across the street from Bart's.

As in past years, the rally will include speakers and entertainers, including representatives from the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and bondage communities. There will also be music, announcements and a raffle.

In addition to the action on the stage, various community organizations will be present to provide information and raise money for their causes.

Other events are scheduled for the same day. A pancake breakfast is scheduled run from 7:30 to 10:30 p.m. in the basement of the Northampton Unitarian Society. The Unitarian Society will also present the play Patience and Sarah at 4 p.m.

Beginning at 8 p.m., the Academy of Music will present the Valley Gay Men's Chorus and the Young at Heart Chorus in Flaming Saddles.

Bilingual office reminisces over 20th graduation

By Sanuber Denizmen
Collegian Correspondent

The Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP) at the University of Massachusetts is celebrating its twentieth graduation today, as 80 students from 25 diverse majors will be graduating this year.

A Caribbean dinner will be served at 7 p.m., followed by a short ceremony and a dance.

BCP has a multicultural focus, serving students from South and Central America, the Caribbean, Russia, Europe, and North America, said José Bou, financial aid advisor of the program.

BCP was initially established to provide academic support to the children of Puerto Rican migrant and seasonal farm workers in 1974, according to Bou.

As an academic support program, BCP helps students gain acceptance to the University, ensures their retention and helps them to successfully complete their college education.

BCP staff is bilingual, multicultural and consists of experienced professionals in the areas of academic and personal counseling, admissions, financial aid and career counseling.

Alberto Morales, the Hispanic out–reach coordinator of the program, said they were proud to see these students get together informally at the graduation because it recognizes the fact that they made it to the University and were able to remain inside, an opportunity many other Hispanic students haven't been offered and often have not been able to afford.

The drop out rate for Hispanic students at the high school level is 60–70 percent; in considering the fact that these numbers increase at the college level, one can say that "these students have accomplished something extraordinary," as Morales put it.

Even when these students go to graduate school or start a career, they will still be breaking a lot of grounds for other disadvantaged students. Morales said, "Whether they become doctors, lawyers or professors, their numbers will be few and they will be presenting an underserved community."

The Bilingual Collegiate Program Graduation will take place at the Campus Center Auditorium, starting with a banquet at 6:30 p.m., and will be free of charge and open to public.

Students in DC to meet Israeli, American leaders

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

A delegation of six University of Massachusetts students is going to Washington, D.C. this Saturday, to lobby Congress in strengthening United States and Israeli relations.

The American–Israeli Public Affairs Committee (A.I.P.A.C) Policy Conference 1995, taking place May 7 through May 9, will attract over 2,000 pro–Israeli leaders from all 50 states in America, according to a pamphlet.

"We are going to lobby Congress in support of Israeli issues," said Omri Niv, A.I.P.A.C. liaison to UMass.

The conference's opening session tentatively features President Bill Clinton, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and Jordanian Crown Prince Hassan, according to the pamphlet.

The banquet is to be attended by over 50 senators, 100 representatives, and other diplomats, according to the pamphlet. Officials from the White House, the Pentagon, and the State Department will also be present.

There will be roundtable political discussions with members of the media, according to the pamphlet. Also at the discussions will be House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Mayor Ehud Olmert of Jerusalem.

Discussion topics include discourse about the rivalry or collaboration of the Palestine Liberation Organization and Hamas, consideration of terrorist threats to America and Israel, and the impact and capability of ballistic missiles and weapons of mass destruction. The pamphlet also features face–to–face lobbying with members of Congress.

UMass expecting ultimate weekend

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The Northeast Regionals in ultimate frisbee will be held this weekend at the Boyden Fields, with 32 teams vying for bids to Nationals in Champlain, Ill., which take place Memorial Day weekend. Sixteen teams from both men's and women's divisions will be there, with the double elimination format choosing the top three teams from each division for Sunday's finals.

More than the game itself will be there on Saturday and Sunday. A complete sight and sound package will include music and tents with t–shirts and frisbees on sale from all the schools that are participating. Saturday's games run from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and will feature sixteen games going on at once. On Sunday, the Finals also start at 10 a.m., with the top seeds from Saturday competing for the opportunity to battle for the National Championship crown.

"You will see ultimate at its finest, at its most energetic and you will see amazing frisbee competition," Chris Hynds, of UMass' team Zoo Disc, said. "A lot of people do not know what ultimate is, and this weekend they will get a chance."

The University of Massachusetts will have both of its men's and women's teams represented at the Regionals this weekend. From the men's division, Zoo Disc will bring in a No. 5 seed, resulting from their successful showing in last weekend's Western New England Sectionals, held at Williams College in Williams. With their three wins against Williams College B (11–0), Hampshire College (11–9) and Amherst College (11–5), they got the automatic bid for this weekend's action.

Yale, Cornell and WUFO (Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization) will be the teams to beat, but to Hynds, the team has a chance to make it to Sunday's finals.

"We could definitely take our pool, and we have looked really good this whole year," Hynds said. "We were not expecting to get to Regionals, but if we work hard, we should get to the finals."

Dole threatens to bar vote on nomination

By Nita Lelyveld
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There would be "plenty of precedent" for not bringing Henry Foster's surgeon general nomination to a vote, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole said yesterday. Democrats argued that Foster deserved a vote and expressed growing optimism he would win it.

"I think we're going to have the number," said Minority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota.

Dole, who has threatened to keep the nomination from a vote, declined to say in a letter to Daschle whether or not he would do so. Instead, he said he would "be back in touch when I decide how best to proceed."

Responding to an April 27 letter from Daschle in which the South Dakota Democrat said Foster "deserves a full and fair hearing," Dole said, "Now that Dr. Foster has completed his two days of testimony before the Labor Committee, I am sure you agree that he has received such a hearing."

Throughout the letter, he justified his suggestion that he might not bring the nomination to the floor for a vote, even if the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, which just finished Foster's confirmation hearing, reports the nomination favorably. Citing the Congressional Research Service, Dole said, "At least 161 Republican nominations were returned to the president from 1987 to 1992, a six-year period when the Democrats controlled the Senate."

"In fact, during the Bush Administration, 54 nominations to the federal judiciary and at least 34 non-judicial nominations did not even receive a committee hearing."

While Dole has talked of refusing to bring the nomination up, fellow senator and presidential nomination rival Phil Gramm (R-Texas) has threatened to filibuster if it does come up.

FanFest: a baseball celebration

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

Come one, come all — to the very first annual UMass Baseball FanFest tomorrow at Earl Lorden Field, which will benefit local Little Leagues.

The FanFest, presented by University of Massachusetts sports management students, will be kicked off at 10 a.m. with a skills competition for children, followed by a double- header between the UMass Minutemen and the St. Bonaventure Bonnies at noon.

Activities will include several games, contests and raffles, with the prizes being drawn during every inning of the first game, making for an exciting nine innings.

And the price of admission for such an event, you ask? One hundred and fifty dollars? No less than $10? Nope, your presence at this worthwhile cause will cost you absolutely nothing.

"FanFest will be great for the community, and for UMass baseball," says UMass baseball coach Mike Stone.

FanFest, whose proceeds will benefit Amherst and Northhampton Little Leagues, is a creation of the advanced sport marketing class to help promote the UMass baseball team. Taught by William Sutton, associate professor of sport studies, the class incorporates practical and cooperative learning and emphasizes hands–on work experience.

"FanFest provides our students with practical experience and opportunity to apply their classroom knowledge to situations they may encounter in their professional career," says Sutton.

To help promote the event and community involvement, instructional clinics are being held by the UMass baseball players at several local elementary schools.

The Minutemen have recently clinched first place in the Atlantic 10, and will play conference rival St. Bonaventure.

Presenters of this fun–filled occasion also include WHMP, Today's 99.3, Pizza Hut, Saturn, Fleet Bank, Friendly's and Champs.

It should truly be a day full of baseball, fun, food and prizes.

fare, the minimum wage and many others, Camerita said.

"This contract is one of the ugliest assaults that the right wing activists have placed against the people," Camerita said. "We are urging all of the students in the five–college area to protest this contract."

Ben Swan, an African–American national activist and Carmen Rosa, a Latino who is knowledgeable in secondary education are just two of the many speakers that will be attending, Camerita said.

The keynote speaker Greg Speeder will discuss the social and economic effects of the budget cuts on Springfield and the surrounding communities.

The rally will also include a moment of silence for the people who lost their lives in the right wing activist bombing of Oklahoma City.

"This rally has enormous potential for the rebirth of activism on college campuses," Camerita said. "It will be very peaceful and legal, and any step that we take forward in this case, will be a step backward for [Speaker of the House New] Gingrich."

UMass students had also planned a bus trip to New York City for the national rally, but they could not afford the buses. There was little student participation, according to Ken Miller, a member of the Alliance for Student Power (ASP).

"We do have carpools going down, and people who want to drive or who need a ride, should go to the [ASP] office," Miller said. "People that paid can pick up their money at the TIX office."

The New York rally against the contract is specifically targeted at Wall Street, Miller said.

"We are excited about going to the rally because it has a very clear agenda," Miller said. "It is not just between the Republicans and the Democrats. It is a one party system."

Frances Young, a supporter of the National People's Campaign and a graduate student who is on welfare said that "the contract has gotten many people together who aren't usually politically active."

Tomorrow's rally will begin at noon.

According to Hooker, his proposal was "well–received and seemed to be well understood by members of the committee."

In the message, Hooker called for the renewal of the Physical Plant through the Capital Bond Bill, and the funding of faculty pay raises.

Hooker also stressed the need to "provide necessary tools" to create a positive environment for researchers. He affirmed the ties that research has to teaching, fund–raising and community service.

In mid–May, the Senate Ways and Means Committee will bring the proposal to the Senate floor for discussion.

Hooker added that the Chairs of the House and Senate Ways and Means Committees want the decision to be completed on the Governor's desk by June 1.

Hooker urged all faculty, staff and students to contact their state senators and members of the Senate Ways and Means Committee to voice their concerns.

"President Hooker is looking forward to seeing what the feedback is," Wright said.

According to Wright, Hooker plans to continue using e– mail to strengthen the involvement of the UMass community in the political happenings at the State House.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1916 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1958. Livin' like a slob

"Where the hell is that shirt?" I mumble to myself as I rummage through the clothes in my closet. Diving head–first into the heap of clothing in my too–small closet space, I am unable to find the button–down shirt I wanted to wear.

"It friggin' better be in here," I say as the volume of my voice begins to increase, despite being the only person in the room. I search my laundry basket, as the pile of shirts, pants, undergarments and various other foreign objects seap over the sides.

"It's gotta be here somewhere," I softly say to myself. Throwing the unwanted clothing around the room in search of my shirt, I spot it at the bottom of the basket. Smiling, I grab it with both hands, and put it in front of my face proudly. The smile turns to frown, as the damn thing is very wrinkled.

"Screw it," I contemplate to myself as I put the shirt on. I look down at the front of the shirt, and it's covered with little stains that commemorate the many days I've worn it without washing.

"Dammit," I scream out loud, frustrated with my slobbish self. I run into the bathroom, and apply hot water to each stain. Unfortunately, I realize that my mother and my girlfriend are the only ones who can get stains out. "I don't have TIME for this," I holler rather immaturely. To myself, nonetheless.

"Alright, I know that notebook is somewhere around here," I think to myself as I search for my work. My desk is cluttered with books, notebooks, newspapers, sports magazines, pencils, pens, stray paper, change, opened old mail, unopened old mail, empty soda cans, empty beer cans and other useful/useless junk. But the damn notebook I want is not in sight.

"I can find my Pride gas station baseball cap with the stiff brim that I never wear, but not the notebook, huh?" I exclaim as I search underneath my bed. While t'se desktop is messy, the space underneath my bed is a complete sty.

"What the hell," I grumble to myself as I look for the notebook. Anything found on my desk and much, much more can be found underneath my bed. Yet, there are added fixings — dirt, dust balls and dinglebberries, alike. Tasty stuff, indeed, but still no notebook.

"Now, I'm starting to get pissed off," I holler out to the world, which isn't listening. I start to chuck stuff around, with first dibs going to my couch. As I heave one of the cushions, I find my notebook.

"Thank you, thank you," I say to someone up there for helping me find my notebook. Now, with piece of mind, I go to put a CD in. Lionel Richie was played when I went to bed the night before, so I decide on good ol' James Ingram. I go to get the CD, but the Beastie Boys CD is in the James Ingram case. So, I find the Beasties case, and inside is Jane's Addiction's "Nothing's Shocking." I get the Jane's case, and Bob Dylan's friggin disc is in there.

"Sonuvabitch," I angrily scream out as I throw the CDs in their own cases while trying to find my Ingram disc. Within minutes of switching, everything is cool, as I place the Ingram disc in the CD player. My knee, though, accidently hits my pile of VCR tapes, and they fall to the floor.

"That's it," I furiously roar outside my window. I sit there, and jam each tape back into the entertainment center. Useless tapes of my old roommate's high school soccer games and his senior activities clutter the shelves, and almost make their way out the window as I get more pissed off by the second.

I sit back, and try to cool off. The room is a mess, I have VCR tapes I don't watch, the CDs aren't in the right cases, I can't find things I need, and clothes are too dirty and wrinkled.

I don't like living in this environment. I am not fond of living in a pig pen. Stains on my shirt is not the style I'm trying to achieve, and actually working hard to play a CD or get my notebook is not my choice.

The time I have on my hands has been limited, and the time to clean in that time frame is obsolete. When I come home after a long day at classes and here at the newspaper, I want to relax. Clean? You crazy. It's my time to relax, and my idea of hanging out is not by the washing machine nor under the bed.

There's a knock at the door. Still fuming a little bit, I walk over and open the door. It's my girlfriend. So pleased to see her, I give her a big hug. She hugs me for a few seconds, and says in my ear, "Your room is a pit."

"C'mon in, honey," I say, gritting my teeth.

Amendments used by idiots

It's times like this when I'm ashamed to be an American. Every day, it seems there are more and more stories coming out which could happen "only in America." Sometimes, I wonder why that is. Why, if America is such a big and powerful country, is it so idiotic?

Maybe that's because Americans are given too much personal freedom. Freedom is a good thing. That is if those who possess it are mature and intelligent enough to handle it. The stories I read in the newspaper and see on television each day lead me to believe that we Americans have not yet learned how to handle even the most basic rights.

For example, the First Amendment states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press..."

If James Madison could only see how his First Amendment is being used, he would probably die a second time. Originally meant to protect sane people, this right has become the shield of the insane. Every day, I hear someone claiming that this amendment gives them the right to say whatever they wish. The sad truth is that it does.

I'm sick of hearing a bunch of idiots running around, speaking words of hatred and carrying a copy of the Bill of Rights. What is more important, the right of an individual to speak his/her mind (or lack of), or the right of an individual or group not to have to put up with raving lunatics? I think it's time to modify the free speech part to say, "... or abridging the freedom of speech in cases where the speech makes any sense at all."

Right now, free speech, one of our most sacred rights is one of the most disturbing aspects of our society because in the instances where it is used, the "free speakers" misuse it, and instead of being the bastion of freedom originally intended, it has become a bastion of cowardice and hatred.

The Second Amendment gives us the right "to keep and bear arms." I see this as one of the silliest provisions in the whole U.S. Constitution. It was originally meant to insure that the young republic would be able to field an army for defense if necessary. Now, in our day it is being abused in a myriad of different ways.

Some would lead you to believe that stockpiling weapons is something that any American has the right to do. Any violation of this right, they seem to think, justifies taking action. They consider owning not one, but many guns a basic right.

This concept bothers me because the only legitimate reason I see for owning a gun is protection of self and property. How many guns are necessary to achieve this? If somebody can't stop an intruder with one gun, what are 2,000 more going to do? Once the rightful purpose of these weapons is negated, the only other reasons I see for owning them are bad, and please don't try and tell me that hunting is a sport.

If guns weren't legal from the beginning, I doubt there would be as many problems with them as there are today. There are just too many guns out there, and they're one of the factors that is destroying America from the inside out.

Crazy provisions in the Constitution are killing us, and they're not all that unusual either. If you were to look through the Constitution, you'd probably find some rights that you didn't even know you had. Don't get me wrong, I'm not suggesting that you find and exploit these like the others. I just think you should be aware of how much you really have.

We, as Americans have so much freedom that the word "freedom" goes hand in hand with our government. We have too much freedom, I believe. We don't have the ability to handle all the rights we have, and that can be seen every day on the television and in the newspapers.

Whether or not the Constitution would be a perfect document if this was a perfect society may be debated, but the United States, as imperfect as it is, cannot function with such liberal portions of freedom handed out blindly to the people.

Perhaps we ought to take away some of the rights which seem so basic to Americans. These rights, or should we call them privileges, are being abused more now than they ever have been. Taking them away for a while may help Americans realize how important these privileges really are, and for what reasons they were really intended.

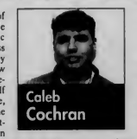
Ignorance on the Op/Ed page



An editorial page is a useful thing. It gives readers, as well as staff members, a forum to express views which are not necessarily fit for the news page or any other section of the paper. Readers have a chance to respond to news stories or editorials that have recently been printed. The trouble with the page comes in when individuals try to crash the page by writing columns or letters which, in an ideal world, would be flushed down the nearest toilet.

Does this mean I'm against freedom of speech? Absolutely not. I just wish people would educate themselves on a topic instead of spewing their ignorance across the editorial page. As a reader, I enjoy columns which open my eyes to a new way of thinking or even anger me by presenting a view that I don't agree with. If the writer has supported his or her case, these are often the best columns on the page. The difference between a well–written, well–supported column and one in which the writer simply states how pissed off he or she is, or how much he or she hates a group of people, or how the student newspaper is a rag, however, is a very big one.

The only salvation I have as a reader when I come across some of the garbage that has recently graced the Op/Ed page of the Collegian is that I know other readers realize how ignorant the writer is as well. The stack of letters to the editor that pour into the office each day is evidence of this. Just as the writer has the right to make his or her ill– informed opinions public, the reader who responds should be granted equal space to reply. I only wish that we had enough space to print every single letter that is written in response to these unsupported letters and columns.

Just to give an example of the kind of writing I'm talking about, let's look at Tuesday's Collegian. By now, most readers are aware of the anti–Semitic letter written by a retired University professor. All that I can say about this letter is that Helen Cullen deserves whatever she gets. If you want to be an anti–Semite, I guess that's your right, but don't bitch when your life becomes a living hell after you've made that view public.

A second piece which ran on Tuesday was less offensive, but equally ill–informed. Charles R. Venator Santiago's column entitled "Liberal culture" is a textbook example of how not to write an editorial. The column is littered with inaccuracies which show that the author didn't bother to do one bit of research on his topic.

For example, the author states that writers who submit letters or columns to the editorial page "are constrained to the little space available, mostly due to the economic resources of this institution." Perhaps if Mr. Santiago had bothered to read that little box on the top left hand side of the editorial page, he could have avoided looking like an idiot. In that box, underneath the names of the staff members, it says, "The Collegian is financially independent of the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales." Oops. There goes your brilliant theory about our poor University.

The writer also states that the Collegian is a "rag" which "seeks to define what is normal by excluding diversity and difference." Again, a quick glance at the top of the editorial page is all the research Santiago would have needed to do. The list of editors includes Black Affairs, Developing Nations, Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual Issues, Jewish Affairs, Multicultural Affairs and Women's Issues. The claim that the Collegian excludes diversity just doesn't hold water.

Freedom of speech is an important right, but it is a right which is much more powerful when supported by fact rather than ignorance.

Spring Concert 1978–1995

To the editor:

Born in 1978, Spring Concert has been a much anticipated event each year for 18 years. But no longer. With proposed budget cuts for the 1995–96 academic year, Spring Concert will be forced to lie down in the grave that the Student Government Association has already started digging. The Student Government Association has graciously volunteered to hold funeral services at their office at 420 Student Union. Burial will take place at Spring Concert 1995, campus pond lawn. Feel free to call the SGA office at 545–0431 to express your condolences.

The SGA proposed budget cuts totaling $23,000 for University Productions and Concerts yesterday at the annual budget meeting. It will be virtually impossible for UPC to operate a successful production company under these financial conditions. UPC will be forced to close shop after 18 years of concert production at UMass. SGA budget cuts means no more Spring Concert. Please work with us to fight the SGA and keep Spring Concert alive.

Campus responds to prof's letter

To the editor:

We were appalled by the anti–Semitic content of the recent letter by Helen Cullen to the Collegian (May 2). As members of the mathematics department, we have a particular concern since she identified herself as a former department member. We would like to assure the University community and the student population in particular, that these opinions are Cullen's alone, and that they do not reflect the opinions of other members of the department.

D.F. St. Mary, department head
Robert Gardener, professor
Arline Norkin, staff associate
Greg Pearlstein, TA
Richard S. Ellis, professor
James E. Humphreys, professor
John L. Sicks, associate department head
Thorsten Zoerner, graduate student
Elaine Puleo, visiting assistant professor
Cynthia M. Magelinski, staff
54 other people signed this letter.

To the editor:

We are writing in response to Professor Cullen's letter of May 2. As members of the Jewish community who have chosen to continue our Jewish education, we feel compelled to respond both because of the letter's gross misrepresentation of Jewish ideas and values as well as its false academic nature.

"You can prove anything using statistics —" so goes a well–known statement. As a Professor Emerita in the mathematics/statistics department, Cullen should be well aware that one can arrange and misrepresent facts in order to arrive at predetermined conclusions. According to Professor Cullen, "in the minds of many, traditional Judaism is completely offensive to all women." Professor Cullen goes on to point out that Southern Confederates, the Mormon Church, and former President Botha's South African government have used the "Jewish testament" to justify their acts of cruelty and injustice. Anyone who is familiar with Jewish thinking realizes that these groups have misrepresented Jewish ideology in order to justify their own agendas.

Professor Cullen suggests that her agenda is to examine on–campus tensions by providing a history lesson in Jewish thought. Ironically, in the process of trying to explain the source of these tensions, Professor Cullen creates a far more hostile atmosphere than that which previously existed. Her efforts would be better used to focus on ways to reduce tensions on campus rather than spreading rhetoric that promotes intolerance and hatred.

In reality, Judaism is largely based on one simple premise: "Love thy neighbor as thyself." It is this tenet that provides direction in our dealings with the rest of humanity. Professor Cullen should take this lesson to heart.

Dance company delights sold out audience

By Seema Gangotirkar
Collegian Staff

Words alone cannot express the beauty and strength of the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater. The company put on a breathtaking performance on May 3, receiving an extended standing ovation from the sold–out house at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

The company opened their performance with a piece called The Winter in Lisbon. The music was written by Dizzy Gillespie and the opening theme featured the entire company. The dancers enchanted the audience with the cleverness and fluidity of their motions. The second movement, "San Sebastian" was a lively and humorous dance that featured Michael Thomas and Leonard Meek. Following "San Sebastian" was the delicate and sultry "Lisbon" danced by Renee Robinson and Meek.

"Lisbon" told the story of two lovers who are passionately involved. At the end of the dance, Robinson blew Meek a kiss and he reached up as if to catch it, then cradled the "kiss" to his chest as if it were precious treasure. The dance ended with "Manteca" which was loud, colorful and lively. The dancers acted as if they were at a giant street party and punctuated the music with shouts of their own.

Hymn, choreographed by Judith Jamison, paid homage to the dance company's founder, Ailey, who died in 1989. The dancers sometimes danced to written words without music. The text which consisted of Ailey's words in his own voice as well as interviews with the dancers, was written and performed by actress Anna Deavere Smith.

Notable performances were given by Elizabeth Roxas and Karine Plantadit–Bageot. Roxas, in her interview, recalled the black dress that her idol, Judith Jamison, was wearing when she met Jamison as a little girl in the Philippines. Plantadit– Bageot told the story of returning to her native Africa and the tremendous joy she found in Africa. Another brilliantly choreographed piece was "Dance" which featured the entire Company and over the music, a voice proclaimed that " dance is the manifestation of spirit."

The program ended with Ailey's inspirational masterpiece, Revelations. This suite explored the motivations and emotions through the rich and colorful African–American tradition of religious music. Meek and Roxas delivered classic elegance and beauty in "Fix me, Jesus " while Thomas delivered an emotional performance in " I Want To Be Ready." Revelations ended with the perfectly executed movements, "You May Run On" and the lively "Rocka My Soul in the Bosom of Abraham."

Benefit 'Raises Roof' at Hampshire College

By Matthew Justin Foerber
Collegian Staff

This Saturday, the Pioneer Valley chapter of Habitat for Humanity will be presenting "Raise the Roof '95," the group's first annual fund–raising festival, at Hampshire College. The all–day event, which will feature a wide variety of activities, is intended to give the organization a greater sense of visibility in the community.

Habitat for Humanity is a non–profit organization which works with volunteers to make home ownership possible to those who could not otherwise afford it. The purpose of this Saturday's festivities is twofold — to raise funds and to actually construct a house for one local family.

The festivities, which will run from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., will include a handmade craft show, a bird house art show and auction, a building supplies tag sale, as well as a host of musical performances.

Headlining the musical acts will be a special performance from folk musician/storyteller Arlo Guthrie and his son Abe. After growing up on the influences of Pete Seeger, Leadbelly and, of course, his father, folk legend Woody Guthrie, Arlo went on to become one of the chief spokesmen for his generation, beginning with the classic "Alice's Restaurant Massacre."

Also appearing Saturday will be local favorites Salamander Crossing, the Horse Mt. Jazz Band and The Earth Circus.

For the kids, "Raise the Roof '95" will also feature a LEGO's playhouse, complete with junior building projects, computer games and build–your–own–sundaes sponsored by Bart's.

Habitat for Humanity was founded in the mid–70s when Millard Fuller, a wealthy attorney from Alabama, began, with the help of his wife Linda, to use his considerable fortune to build affordable homes for poor people in the South.

Since then, the organization has grown exponentially, taking in volunteers from all walks of life — from college students and former Peace Corps workers to retired businessman and clergy members. Habitat for Humanity now has representative projects in hundreds of U.S. communities.

By carefully planning construction operations and utilizing locally available buildings supplies, Habitat for Humanity chapters are able to construct homes for needy families at a mere fraction of what they would usually pay. According to Habitat's statistics, the average cost of a single family house in 1993 was $159,759. The average cost of a Habitat home the same year was only $45,000.

The house which will be constructed as part of "Raise the Roof '95" will be based on the design of local architect Chris Riddle. After construction, it will be moved to a new piece of land in Amherst where it will be inhabited by Heather and Thierry Borcy and their son Nicholas.

Habitat for Humanity's "Raise the Roof '95" begins at 9 a.m. on Saturday, May 6. The event will be held rain or shine and admission is free to the public. For more information call 256–8250.

UM conservatory to hold exhibit

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

It is not often that artists get to display his or her show in an environment that both compliments their work and enhances the viewing atmosphere at the same time. But Alexander S. Magay, just may have lucked out.

Today, from 5:30 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. and Saturday, from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m., students and the Valley community will be able to view this artist's first show in New England at the beautiful Durfee Conservatory free of charge.

Maygay's work will be exhibited throughout the five room conservatory. His series of 15 paintings on both wood and canvas will be complimented by the thousands of exotic plants in the conservatory. Built in 1867, and one of the four original buildings on campus, this lush collection of vegetation is a perfect back drop for the artist's vibrant colored paintings of people from a wide variety of cultural backgrounds.

Strong colors and bold strokes are used to create powerful images and messages through simplified forms and subject matter. Maygay uses his interest in multi–culturalism to highlight his exhibit and convey a message of unity and tranquility in an otherwise tumultuous world.

His life–like portrayals of events such as two Jamaican men playing dominos invites viewers to almost step into the canvas and enjoy the game along side it's subjects.

Also on exhibit with the artist's paintings will be several local sculptures scattered throughout the conservatory.

Music and hors d'oeuvres will be on hand and everyone is greatly encouraged to see these rare works of arts in an equally rare setting.

The Durfee Conservatory is located on the University of Massachusetts campus between the Morrill Science Center and the University Health Services. For more information call 545–5234.

But give him time, you can't expect him to win 20 games in his first year, although it would be nice. His shaky first start was proof that he still needs time. Vaughn Eshelman, who pitched in AA last year, was outstanding in his first career start against New York pitching six innings of shutout ball. But again, he is young and needs more time to become an effective major league pitcher.

The bullpen has question marks as well. Ken Ryan is the closer and if he lives up to his potential, he should save at least 20-30 games. But after that there are question marks.

My pick for the Sox? A wild-card berth. I always go with my heart.

• Congratulations to UMass women's soccer assistant April Kater for being named the first-ever women's soccer head coach at Syracuse University. The Orangewomen got themselves a winner in Kater. She won as a player and as an assistant, and she'll win as a head coach. Kater said to give her three years and she'll be able to compete with the likes of UConn. I have no doubt that she will.

• NBA playoff teams must watch out for the Chicago Bulls, simply because of two words.

Michael Jordan.

The Bulls without Jordan were hardly a sure bet to make it past the first round. But with Jordan, they are definitely a NBA Championship contender. The foursome of Jordan, Scottie Pippen, B.J. Armstrong and Toni Kukoc is as good as any four in the Playoffs. The only thing that could possibly prevent them from winning it all is not having Horace Grant. Grant was an integral part of the three championship teams and a Luc Longley, Corie Blount or Will Perdue just doesn't cut it. The only other thing that could possibly hurt them is the absence of John Paxson, but Steve Kerr has done well to make up for that loss. Some will say that the Bulls miss Bill Cartwright too, but I don't think so. The Bulls could have won the three championships without him. No doubt.

Not having Grant won't end up being a problem though. Jordan will make up for that loss. He always steps up his play in the playoffs. Look for a rematch of the 1993 Eastern Conference Finals which saw the Bulls meet up against the New York Knicks. And once again, Jordan will stick it to 'em, leaving Patrick Ewing short of the championship once again.

Candice Flemming is a Collegian columnist.

Other names to look for will be senior Paul Doyle and freshman Jeffrey Brusso as both will be competing in the decathlon. Doyle should also have a strong showing in the 110m hurdles.

The Minutemen will enter the Eastern Championships as one of the leading contenders to take home first place. Other teams in contention are defending champion Rhode Island and host Southern Connecticut.

Rhode Island is a team that will score well in most events of 400m and under as well as many field events. Southern Connecticut is the one team that can match the depth of the Minutemen.

Martens

at the Princeton Tournament last weekend when Martens belted two homers against Hofstra. Those two round trippers helped propel the Minutewomen to a 8-0 thrashing of the Flying Dutchwmen advancing them to the championship game against Connecticut, which ended up being cancelled because of rain. She hit a total of three home runs during that week (April 23-30).

"When it comes down to crunch time, that's when I want to hit.," Martens said. "It's a great rush. It's just a great feeling if you can [get the clutch hit]."

Martens came to UMass as a catcher, but with Michele Shaw already behind the plate, Martens was moved to the outfield, where she has flourished.

"She's worked herself into a very, very solid, sound outfielder," Sortino said. "She's really improved. She's making great catches out there. She's really worked hard at developing her skills out there because she came here as a catcher. My hat's off to her because she's hitting the ball in a real big way and making great plays in the outfield. She's at the top of her game."

Martens, who hails from Swift Current, Canada, almost didn't get a chance to be at the top of her game at UMass. If it weren't for a timing error by Sortino, she would have never became a Minutewoman.

"I went to a tournament [Colorado Fireworks tournament] to look at the following year's class and I got the games mixed up so I went to the field too early," Sortino said. "I was sitting there for an 8 a.m. game and I just happened to go over and sit down. There was nobody around, nobody's watching anything and Chris's team was playing another team. There weren't any other coaches there and I was sitting there, kind of half falling asleep and just watching the game, and this kid steps up to the plate and whacks the ball right out. I was like, wow, who's that?"

"She saw me hit a home run and that kind of caught her eye I guess," Martens said. "She contacted my coach and from there, here I am."

One of the main reasons why she ended up deciding to attend UMass was the experience of the coaching staff and the fact that they had a good animal science program.

"I knew that I could become a better player by coming here," Martens said. "Also, [because] the pre-veterinarian program that they offered. There's a lot of hands-on experience that you won't get back in a university back home."

"I think this University got a great investment when they brought in Chris," Sortino said. "Because they got a great student-athlete. She's the typical total student-athlete."

While a player of her skills could go on and on about her impressive stats, Martens would rather talk about the team.

"I'm not really big into stats. I don't think about it," she said. "I think we can go all the way to the World Series. It's a young team but we have all the potential. If one person isn't hitting well, there are four or five others that can pick up the slack. There's no weak spot on this team. If anything, it's just a matter of numbers that we can run short of an injury. But if everything clicks all at once, we could do amazing things."

Martens hopes that those amazing things can start today, at the Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship.

Glass

ego about it. An impressive feat, considering the accolades that have come in his direction.

After Glass scored five of UMass' eight goals in its 8-6 win over Harvard, Crimson goalie Rob Ling sang the attackman's praises.

"Brendan Glass has to have the quickest release out of all the attackmen I've seen," Ling said. "Inside, he doesn't miss. He's a great finisher."

He was named a high school All-American twice, the 1993 Massachusetts Player of the Year, and the best player ever to play at Lincoln Sudbury High School.

After that stellar high school career, Glass came to UMass, and after an impressive preseason, set out to make an immediate impact.

After scoring two goals in his first three collegiate games, Glass went on a tear that peaked with a seven goal two assist performance against Yale.

"When I got the bid to start, I thought I could contribute," Glass said. "I ended up doing that by scoring 30 goals."

Going in his second season, however, there were question marks. In the first season he had thrived on being an unknown, while upperclassmen Wes Depp and Mike Valente drew the opposition's tough defenders. Could Glass build off of that freshman campaign or would he be suffocated when opponents clamped down on him with more talented defensemen?

Glass put all questions of a sophomore slump out of people's minds pretty quickly. After a pair of two-goal games in the teams' first two outings, Glass caught fire.

He has torched opponents for an average of over three goals a game. He is clearly stronger that he was a year ago, and has added 10 pounds of muscle to his frame. Cannella points to the sophomore's work ethic as the key to his success.

"Brendan is a real competitor," Cannella said. "You know he's going to be ready everyday. My hat's off to him because he works so hard and he deserves it."

Glass' success has found him a following. After every game several kids rush over to get an autograph from the All-America Candidate.

"I get a kick out of it. I'm just happy to sign it. My parents get a big kick out of it," Glass said. "I would have been the first in line if I were their age and lived around a college campus like this.

"I used to joke around with the older guys in my town,, saying I'm going to be better than you guys someday."

Those older guys now joke around with him, because he was right.

What advice does Glass have for the kids that idolize him? "Practice. Keep your stick in your hand at all times," Glass said. "...and find a wall."

The Minutemen will close out their regular season tomorrow afternoon against Army.

Softball hosts A–10 tourney this weekend

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team was on the road in clinching its eighth Atlantic 10 regular season crown in the first of a doubleheader at Rhode Island. Now, the Minutewomen have a chance to capture the conference championship in the friendly confines of Totman Field.

"We're very excited. It's great," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "It's nice to host a championship here."

In the second-ever A–10 Conference Softball Championships held at Totman, top-seeded Massachusetts are the congenial hosts of the tournament. The three-day event opens with this afternoon's first round game between second-seeded Rutgers and third-seeded St. Joseph's (2 p.m.).

The Minutewomen run into a similar position like they had in the April 25 doubleheader with URI. In order to be in the prime position to win the A-10 Championships, they have to get by the Rams in today's 4 p.m. game.

Rutgers comes to Amherst this weekend as the defending A–10 Tournament champion, defeating Massachusetts 3–1 and snapping the Minutewomen's five tournamcnt title winning streak (1989-93).

Note that the four-team A–10 Conference Softball Championships is double-elimination. In fact, the Minutewomen, who had one loss entering the championship, edged unbeaten Rutgers, 5–4. So, another game had to be played, and the Lady Knights won the tournament championship as the result.

Here's a look at the first round pairings:

No. 1 UM vs. No. 4 Rhode Island

The Minutewomen (34–17) enter the tournament after sweeping Boston College, 1–0, 2–1 on Tuesday afternoon. With two Minutewomen over the .400 elip in leftfielder Chris Martens (.418) and first baseman Kim Gutridge (.405), the team is batting a solid .297.

Kelly Daut, who won five consecutive A–10 Pitcher of the Week awards, is sporting an impressive 22–8 record, and will take to the hill this afternoon for Massachusetts. Daut's 0.83 ERA leads the A–10.

Rhode Island (23–24) is led by freshman Meredith Cloutier's .318 average. Sophomore Renee Lukashefski and senior Theresa Squarcia round out the Ram group of those batting .300, with .313 and .311, respectively.

Junior Sue Foggo has started 20 Rhode Island games, and has a 9–11 record with a 2.50 ERA. Freshman Kathy Bailey is the other mainstay in the rotation (10–8, 5.06 ERA).

No. 2 Rutgers vs. No. 3 St. Joe's

Safe to say the Lady Knights (27–13) can hit the ball, as evident by their outstanding .324 team batting average. The bats run deep in Piscataway, N.J., as eight Rutgers players are hitting over .300. Sharon Morris is tops on the Lady Knights at .385, along with her team-leading 40 RBIs.

A look at the statistics of the two-deep Rutgers pitching staff sees similar numbers by Meg Knudsen and Kelly Riedel. Knudsen is 13–7 with a 2.20 ERA, and Riedel's 14–6 record and 2.28 ERA are comparable, and pose a double– threat to opposing offenses.

The one problem for Rutgers is the opposition's offense, and St. Joseph's enters the weekend with a league–leading .329 team average. Dana Moyer leads the A–10 with a .434 average, and fellow Hawk Danielle Cavone bats .423 with seven homeruns.

Janielle Hoffman heads the mound work for St. Joe's with a 15–5 record and a 1.27 ERA. The Hawks also have five other pitchers with at least a win this season.

Minutewomen notes: The Atlantic 10 announced the 1995 Softball All Conference team yesterday afternoon, and the Massachusetts softball team received several accolades.

Kelly Daut won the A–10 Pitcher of the Year, Elaine Sortino captured the conference's Coach of the Year, and Gutridge was honored as the Rookie of the Year.

Daut and Gutridge were also named to the All Conference team, along with second baseman Tracy Osier and leftfielder Chris Martens. Honrable mentions on the All A–10 team for the Minutewomen included shortstop Kelly Buckley, third baseman Sam Cardenas, centerfielder Stephanie Mareina, and catcher Michele Shaw.

The discovery of sophomore Chris Martens was a fortunate accident for softball coach Elaine Sortino.

Chris Martens continues to prove that she belongs

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

"When I came on my recruiting trip, the one question that I asked the coach was do you think I belong here. I asked myself that through the first season and through this season. I still ask myself that. But things went well for me. It kind of fell into place. I'm doing all right."

Chris Martens is doing all right. She does belong.

For anyone who doesn't believe that the sophomore belongs, just check out the numbers. She led the team in batting average (.404), hits (67), runs batted in (35), doubles (17), triples (five), home runs (three) and slugging percentage (.620), as a freshman. Atlantic 10 Conference Rookie of the Year, All–Atlantic 10 first team, Northeast Region All–America second team, All–New England and ECAC All–Star distinction.

This year is no different. In fact, Martens has been even better. She still leads the team in hitting (.418), home runs (six), RBIs (38) and slugging percentage (.623). Her six homers puts her tied (with Barb Marean) for second on the all–time UMass single season home runs record. She needs to hit three more dingers to break the record held by Sherri Kuchinskas in 1993. Her nine career blasts puts her in sixth place on the all–time career list.

"Chris is a great softball player. She is so strong," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "She's got great versatility. She's a gamer. Chris likes the big games."

She's come through in those big games. An example of that is in the championship semifinal round

Game is still fun for Glass

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The 11–year old boy is by himself. While his friends are off watching TV or playing Atari, he is alone. Alone with a lacrosse stick and the wall. He plays the solitary game of catch almost every day. Lefthanded 100 times. Righthanded 100 times.

"The wall is always there. It's always your friend and it always throws it back to you," said Massachusetts sophomore attacker Brendan Glass, whose lacrosse skills have improved considerably since his days at the wall. "When I was a little kid, I used to throw it off the wall 100 times. It's those little things over the years that paid off."

The 20–year old Glass has become Massachusetts' most potent offensive threat, scoring 36 goals and four assists to lead the Minutemen (6–5).

While coach Greg Cannella is characterized as intense fiery leader, his star forward is quite the opposite. Glass is good. Really good, and he knows it, but he refuses to think that his skills are anything to make a big deal about.

"I just have fun. If I go out and score seven goals, I kind of put a burden on myself because I expect to do that. It's my job. I should do that. You can't walk around like it's some great thing," said Glass, who despite the pressure on him, still loves the game. "It's such a great game. It's got all the aspects, hitting, speed, shooting, agility ... I just have a lot of fun playing it."

Example: On April 22, Glass scored seven goals and led a second half comeback as the Minutemen upset No. 11 Notre Dame. After the game Glass was nonchalant about the performance.

"I honestly didn't think it was a big deal. I was more mad, when Mike sticked me with the pass in the fourth. I thought I should have had eight," he said. "It was one of those days that I just knew from the get–go that it was going to be a good day. Scoring early gives you momentum and you have confidence the rest of the day."

If the line between confidence and cockiness were a tight rope, Glass would be a natural for a stint with the circus. The Sudbury native is confident about his skills and what he can do, but there isn't even a hint of an

Baseball flawless in win over CCSU

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.

No errors, no contest.

After committing seven miscues in the field that resulted in a loss against Northeastern the day before, the University of Massachusetts baseball team bounced back, played impeccable defense and beat up on Central Connecticut State yesterday, 7–1.

The Minutemen improve to 30–10 with the victory, while CCSU falls to 13–24.

Freshman Jeff Puleri (2–1) and sophomore Chad Sullivan combined to hold the Blue Devils to the one run on seven hits. Puleri walked two and struck out four in seven innings of work. CCSU's Chris Strehowski (3–5) suffered the loss.

Massachusetts jumped out to a 1–0 advantage in the third inning, as junior leftfielder Ryan Jette tripled and scored on a groundout by freshman second baseman Muchie Dagliere. The Minutemen added two more in the fourth to secure the win. Senior catcher Andy Pelis singled and scored on an RBI single by sophomore centerfielder Nate Murphy.

A base–knock from junior first baseman Justin Kelly plated Murphy, giving Massachusetts a 3–0 lead.

Jette was the offensive star for the Minutemen, going 2–for–3 with a pair of three–baggers and two stolen bases.

Rightfielder Bill Knight crushed a solo home run in the sixth inning, giving him 15 dingers on the season. Dagliere added a two–run shot in the top of the ninth.

Massachusetts (18–3 in the Atlantic 10, clinched first place) returns to action this weekend to battle St. Bonaventure (9–8 in A–10, fifth) at Earl Lorden Field, with a doubleheader on Saturday and a single game on Sunday. Both contests begin at noon.

The Minutemen are looking to break their own record set last season for most wins in the conference (19).

The Minutemen and Bonnies are the main attraction for Saturday's FanFest, an event put on by a class in the UMass Sports Management Department. Festivities begin at noon (See related story, page 3).

Track hopes to have success at Easterns

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

The undefeated Massachusetts men's outdoor track team has taken the opportunity the past two Saturdays to better themselves as the Minutemen look ahead to tomorrow's Eastern Conference Championships. They competed at the Holy Cross and Brown Invitationals, which are both non-scoring meets, but there was much more important things found at these events then wins and losses. Experience.

"I believe the two meets definitely helped us as a team," UMass assistant coach Jim Giroux said. "The meet atmosphere will give the guys more experience and practice going into the Easterns."

Members of the team that are looking forward to postseason success were able to fine tune themselves for their individual events and attempt to qualify for the New England Championships that will be held a week from Saturday.

The depth of the team was the leading factor in the team's 8–0–1 record heading into the post season. Going through the cast of characters for the Minutemen, it is easy to see the team's well roundedness.

Junior Marc Lefebvre was one of those athletes who got better in the preparation meets. He improved on his shot put and discus throws, the discus throw eight feet further than his former personal best. Fellow junior thrower Michael Masone could also be a force in the field as he will be throwing javelin.

The jumpers, who look to land points for the Minutemen on Saturday, include senior captain Tom Galligani. He was a factor by placing in his specialty, the triple jump as well as the long jump all season, but wasn't quite jumping the distance his coaches were accustomed to. Being the defending New England Champion in the triple jump, Giroux feels the Championship competition will improve Galligani's marks.

"Tom seems to rise the occasion when the meets mean more," Giroux said. "I think you'll be seeing some really big jumps from him starting Saturday."

Galligani's partner in the long jump will be senior Johnny Johnson. He is also one of two senior sprinters who will be in the running for the 100 meter title, along with Lyonel Benjamin. Both men have under 11 seconds over the distance. The 4x100 relay team, that includes Johnson and Benjamin, could carry the baton cross the finish line first.

In the 200 meters, the Minutemen's deepest event, UMass boasts four runners capable of contending — Benjamin, along with sophomore Ronald Tauro and freshmen Scott Price and Michael Tessicini.

Distance runners that will be looked to for added scoring are headlined by Ethan Nedeau. The junior was hampered by a blister on his foot in the last scoring meet and will try and regain his early season form in the 800 and 1500 meter distances. Also returning from injury will be senior Rick Copley who will compete in the steeplechase.

Red Sox could contend for AL wild card berth

Around the Horn with Candice Flemming

How about that Red Sox lineup? I'll take the Sox' order of Alicea–Valentin–Canseco–Vaughn–Whiten–Greenwell–Macfarlane–Naehring–Tinsley over anybody else's. This team can hit and their first few games are examples of that.

But what will prove to be the key to a winning season for the Sox is pitching. This team will score around seven runs per game but it won't matter if the pitchers don't put up at their end.

Aaron Sele is not a problem, he should win 15–20 games. When Roger Clemens comes back, and if he is healthy, he too should win 15–20 games. From there, it's questionable. When Zane Smith comes back, he should help, but how much is unknown. Erik Hanson was a pleasant surprise in his opening start and he is capable of winning 15–20 games like when he won 18 for Seattle a couple of years ago. But after surgery, he is still a question mark. Rheal Cormier was another surprise, but the jury is still out on if the southpaw can continue it for a whole season.

A lot of people have high expectations for Frankie Rodriguez, and I am one of them. He has unbelievable potential. I saw him pitch in Pawtucket last year and he was awesome.

Tense relations of town, UMass topic of meeting

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The recent Amherst Town Meeting has brought forward issues that involve the University of Massachusetts, including one particular article that requires UMass to reimburse the community for all of the fringe benefits it supplies.

Many townspeople believe the tensions between the town and University arising in Town Meeting have existed for years and are the fault of the University.

The UMass community has voiced disagreement to this notion.

Amherst and UMass have been described by a state legislator representing Amherst as "normally good neighbors."

However, Democratic Rep. Ellen Story said that during current times, when finances in both commodities are strapped, it brings on hard feelings between the two.

"The town is feeling a pinch, and the University is feeling a pinch," Story said. "There's not plenty of money to go around. [The hard feeling] is predictable. Normally good neighbors find themselves in a difficult financial situation, and they start bickering with each other."

According to Hill Boss, Amherst Select Board member, the population of the town he represents is roughly 35,000. This breaks down as approximately 20,000 UMass students, and about 3,000 Hampshire College and Amherst College students, leaving the population of year–round residents around 12,000.

"The 20,000 students make Amherst the great place that it is," Boss said.

UMass' offerings to the town

According to Boss, positive aspects UMass adds to the town character other than the financial support for merchants include the "Into Amherst" project, and UMass volunteers manning the fire department near Sylvan Residential Area.

According to Ed J. Mientka, campus safety officer for Environmental Health and Safety, if the 16 volunteer students who operated an entire Amherst engine company in 1994 were paid a yearly salary of $18,000, the total contribution to the town, including benefits, would amount to approximately $288,000.

Town residents who are on campus and find themselves in need of medical assistance services are given free emergency coverage by Environmental Health and Safety staff, Mientka said.

UMass faculty direct an Internet bulletin board for 300 teachers and students in the Amherst school system, according to Morton M. Sternheim, professor of physics and astronomy. This amounts to $70,000 of accounts and services.

"Into Amherst," a clean–up project in which UMass volunteers partook two weeks ago, was estimated to have contributed $10,000 to Amherst, according to John Clobridge, a town employee.

Nine UMass engineering students plotted, cleared, and built a one–mile long trail in Amherst, according to Celina A. Conway, community relations assistant in the University Advancement Office. If each student was paid $5 for each hour worked, the amount would surpass $3,000 of services to the town.

The volunteer fire fighters are given parking passes granting exemption on all areas of campus, according to Lynn B. Braddock, manager of University parking services. This amounts to $2,700 worth of services to the town.

Landscape architecture and regional planning students formed an economic development plan that was approved by federal agencies for $5,000, instead of the going rate for such services, estimated to be between $15,000 and 20,000, according to John R. Mullin, professor of landscape architecture and regional planning.

Town residents are able to use equipment and facilities for free or discounted rates, according to Ashoke K. Ganguli, director of auxiliary services.

Instead of charging consulting fees, University faculty and staff volunteer expertise in their field on town boards and committees, Conway said.

UMass offerings to local community

The University employs thousands of Amherst residents and the total payroll is estimated at $103 million, according to Ted J. Los, payroll administrator in Human Resources. The estimation of the total payroll for the eight towns surrounding Amherst is $165 million.

At the Crossroads
a closer look at the major issues affecting the UMass campus

Amherst merchants amass more than $100 million in total student purchases, according to Jaymie Chernoff, director of economic development. According to Chernoff, jobs are provided for the town as a result of companies that derive from UMass.

Landlords owning real estate in Amherst that is rented to students collect an estimated approximation of $8.4 million dollars, Conway said. Many landlords have tendencies to neglect their property's degradation, and continue to collect rent.

UMass purchases $2 million worth of goods from local merchants, according to Jake E. Bishop, UMass director of procurement.

UMass organizations are active in volunteering community service, according to Lori McKinney, representing VIVA, the community service council. If groups were paid for all of their volunteer hours, the figure would approach $400,000 worth of energies to the town.

Clothing, food and blood drives organized and supported by campus groups benefit the town in many ways, McKinney said.

UMass employees donating to charitable agencies serving Amherst residents are active, according to Amy Porter, Hampshire Community United Way staff member. The total estimation that employees donate is $60,000.

Faculty members at UMass also become involved with town–run recreational activities, according to John H. Bracey, a professor of Afro American studies.

'Incredible amounts of services'

Boss insists that Amherst is due money from UMass for the "incredible amounts of services they're receiving from the town."

Boss cited services like the Jones Library in Amherst Center, where "27 percent of the registered cardholders are college–aged." He did not specify which campus' students were using the resources of the taxpayer supported facility.

He said that $90,000 is uncollected from UMass for the emergency medical services provided by the town.

The Town of Amherst has "complete fire service," he said, and 30 percent of the town's legitimate fire calls originate from campus. Sixty percent of the total amount of false alarms derive from campus.

"Fifty–seven percent of all arrests made by Amherst Police [during Fiscal Year 1994–95] involved college–aged people," Boss said. College–aged people were also arrested for 56 percent of the drunk driving, 80 percent of the larceny arrests, and 82 percent of the disorderly conduct, he said.

"Town services are dedicated to the college population, and they all involve college–aged people, who are UMass students," Boss said.

He said the money spent by the student population is "a great help" to business owners, bar owners, and restaurant owners, "but none finds its way into the town's budget."

"All we're asking is that the biggest consumer of town services pay a greater share of financing these services."

'A $200,000 windfall'

The town recently reactivated a lawsuit seeking $200,000 from the AMHERST — Not even the bouts of rain on Friday afternoon could dampen the success of this year's Taste of Amherst, an annual sidewalk showcase of the town's various restaurants and businesses.

As the local restaurants took to the sidewalks, the town was flooded for four days with hungry townspeople who were anxious to savor the diverse cuisine that the vendors displayed.

Although the rain on Friday forced most of the restaurants inside to drier ground, a few of the brave and the tarped eateries persevered.

According to Keith Fowler, chef at The Pub, who was cooking up some Fajitas and Quesadillas, the rain never stopped the people from coming, but only made the crowds a bit more sporadic.

The Taste of Amherst ran for the first time this year independently of the town fair because of complaints that the "Taste" was taking profits away from vendors who were selling food for non–profit organizations.

Tom Hidas, owner of Amber Waves, said that with or without the fair, it made no difference, "Taste" was a success.

With a harmonious blending of food, music, entertainment and a whole lot of planning the Taste of Amherst was able to attract hundreds to partake in the event.

Judie Terapulsky, owner of Judie's restaurant and one of the chief organizers of the event, said she was delighted with the changes in the event.

"I think that everything has just worked out great," Terapulsky said. "Blocking off the street and the meters was a great idea. People are setting up tables and chairs, and it isn't as congested on the sidewalks as it has been in the past."

Terapulsky credited the League of Women's annual book sale that coincided with "Taste" this year as a large crowd drawer. "The book sale is a four–day event, where the carnival only runs for three."

Besides the book sale, organizers of the event had other events planned to ensure that a good time was had by all.

Thursday afternoon Sweetser Park highlighted three bands. While the crowds swirled around the vendors and lazed on the grass, Onion Bob, Terrell, and Kuefzal, a Caribbean world music band, played in the newly renovated park.

Saturday, after the clouds had cleared, the streets sprung to life again at 11 a.m., when an accordion and steel drum player performed in Sweetser Park, and a tambourine player in a sombrero played in front of Antonio's. There was also, of course, the food.

Clowns, performing magicians, stilt walkers, balloon sculptors, and non–profit organizations that set up booths for everything from face–painting to vending, also added a fanciful spice to the weekend.

"It was a great weekend that not only showcased the local restaurants of Amherst, but also the retail and service groups that were here together to celebrate" Terapulsky said.

Prof discusses racism, identity at UM lecture

Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Staff

Lewis Gordon, a professor of philosophy at Purdue University, delivered his nationally recognized speech, "Racism, Violence and Urban Anonymity," Thursday night in Campus Center Room 905.

Gordon discussed a variety of issues encompassing race and racism, including its relationship to the individual, genetics and social policy.

"The spirits that guide racism ... is a spirit of evasion," said Gordon. "It is an evasion of the human–being," using hate as a means to "convince oneself of their racial superiority." Gordon referred to this as an act of "bad faith," one in which the individual is "hiding" from one's personal "responsibility."

"Many people want to talk about race, but few people want to talk about racism," Gordon said. This is very apparent when genetics comes into the picture, which can be used as a "code" to reaffirm a supposed black inferiority, he said.

Commenting on The Bell Curve, a publication which has sparked a tremendous amount of controversy on the issue of genetically pre–determined intelligence along racial lines and its correlation to socio–economic status, Gordon said the books findings testify to "how far you can get without saying the 'r' word."

"The way to do racism is not to mention racism at all," said Gordon. Instead, he said, it is more covertly expressed through interpretations of IQ testing, such as in The Bell Curve, which found that blacks on average have an IQ 15 points lower than that of the average white's score.

Although the book does not state outright that blacks comprise a race of lesser comparative intelligence, its results mean "blackness [will imply] inferiority," said Gordon.

Using this logic, white intelligence becomes "just right," balanced between a higher Asian average IQ and the aforementioned black average IQ, said Gordon.

"If blacks scored high on IQ tests, IQ tests would not be treated as methods to determine intelligence," Gordon said. "Racism then, is a fluid and adaptable system."

Although "we can never really know everything about another human being," said Gordon, "to see black ... is to see all," enabling the individual or society to make their judgements on a person of color

Civil rights are emphasized at pride march

By Wendy Darling

NORTHAMPTON — Marching under the theme "Put Pride In Your Stride," thousands of gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender people and their supporters took to the streets May 6 for the 14th annual Northampton LGBT Pride March.

Beginning with a lively gathering at Edmond J. Lampron Park, the march took off at 11:30 a.m. and continued down Main Street, where Northampton residents and visitors cheered on from the sidewalks.

The march culminated with a rally at Pulaski Park and continued on as an all–day event featuring speakers, music, information from community groups, and, above all, pride.

University of Massachusetts freshman Don Keizer marched with a group of approximately 20 students from the UMass Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance.

"I'm marching to have a great time, to be out in the sun, to be with a lot of other gay people, and to see what the Northampton pride parade is like," Keizer said.

Other UMass groups were the LBGA Alumni/ae Association, the Stonewall Center, the GLB Graduate Student Organization, and individuals from the Department of Linguistics.

Groups from outside UMass included the Amherst College LBGA, Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, and the Northampton High School Gay–Straight Alliance.

There was even a banner representing "Dogs and Their Babes."

The annual event is funded through the donations of local organizations and businesses and organized by a committee of private citizens.

Organizer Trystan Skeigh told the crowd at the rally that they needed to "build the self–confidence and self–love . . . to put out the message that you are wonderful every day of the year, not just on Pride Day."

Skeigh noted that for the first time in years, there were no representatives of the "Christian right" protesting in front of Northampton City Hall.

"We did it — we ran them out of town!" Skeigh proclaimed.

However, in the longest speech of the day, Arline Isaacson urged LBGT people to fight apathy and work to keep the "religious right" from deny-

1995 Commencement Schedule

This year's commencement will be held on May 28 in the Warren G. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. There will be no pre- commencement rehearsal

Tickets are not required for guests, and there is no assigned seating. There is also no limit on the number of guests for each student.

Caps, gowns, tassels and announcements can be picked up at the Textbook Annex weekdays between May 1 and May 26.

The Annex is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. daily. Student I.D. is required.

The regalia can be picked up at the Stadium on Commencement Day, as well. It will be available after 8:30 a.m.

Guests should be advised to allow for extra time for road travel. There is another commencement taking place in Amherst on May 28, so traffic could get heavy as early as 9 a.m.

Amherst radio stations WTTT (1430 AM) and WRNX (100.9 FM) will be broadcasting traffic advisories throughout the morning.

Guests will be directed to designated parking lots. Beginning at 8:30 a.m., free shuttle busses will circle campus every five or ten minutes.

Students should arrive at the Stadium no later than 9:30 a.m. carrying their caps and gowns. At 9:30, students will dress and receive instructions from Marshals about assembling and the processional onto the field.

The processional will begin at 10:10 a.m. The actual ceremony will begin at 10:30 a.m. and end at 11:45.

Upon arrival at the stadium, students should enter the main entrance gates on the east side, which is on the opposite side of the Press Box.

At that point there will be signs which will indicate which direction to turn. Each of the four gates will be at the end zone ends of the stadium, and Marshals will meet you there and help to assemble for the processional.

BDIC, Continuing Education, Education, Food and Natural Resources and University without walls majors will turn right and go to Gate One.

Engineering, Management, Nursing and public health and sciences majors will turn right and go to Gate Two.

The social and behavioral sciences majors will turn left and go to Gate Three.

The Humanities and Fine Arts and natural sciences and math majors will turn left and go to Gate Four.

There will be snacks, souvenirs and disposable cameras on sale at the stadium.

Following the commencement there will be a food court adjacent to the stadium, offering chicken picnic baskets, vegetarian baskets, burgers, fruit, coffee and gourmet desserts.

"Graduation Luncheons" will be featured at the Top of the Campus Restaurant (549-6000) and at the Faculty Club (545-2551). Both require reservations, and the Faculty Club does not accept credit cards.

Diplomas will be mailed after grades have been received, recorded and processed by the registrar's office, and the diplomas have been engraved.

Index orders must be placed by May 31 (545-0848), and commencement videotapes may be ordered by calling (545- 1283).

This information is also available at the Visitor's Center.

Look in tomorrow's edition for a map of the stadium and gate numbers for individual majors.

Speaker examines domestic violence

By Cheryl Lyons
Collegian Correspondent

According to Doria Bowman, a woman is beaten every 15 seconds, and domestic violence is the leading cause of injury to women ages 15 and 44. Bowman said people become desensitized by statistics such as these, but as unreal as they seem, there are even more that are unreported.

Bowman, an international women's rights activist and former president of Belize Women Against Violence (WAV), and Melissa Pomfred, an educator advocate at the Everywoman's Center, spoke Sunday, April 30 at a program presented by Alpha Chi Omega and Zeta Psi at the Alpha Chi Omega house.

"'Are you safe? Are you okay?' should be the questions asked [to a woman] after an act of violence, not subtle double questions like 'How did she let this happen to her? She should have left sooner,'" said Pomfred before introducing Bowman.

"It's just a cop-out to justify not doing anything...the public has fear of these issues," she said.

Bowman is presently Deputy mayor of Belize City in Belize, which is located on the eastern coast of Central America, and the only English-speaking country there.

Bowman has initiated programs and services to provide the public with information, support and protection, and has had an "uphill climb" lobbying for legal reform successfully.

"We focus on law. There were gender-based laws, not gender-neutral. Women need political power, but it's not easy because it's still a man's world." She said her aim was not to "kick men out of the House and Senate" but to acquire a "balanced view on issues."

Bowman works country-wide helping many people and their families earning WAV's first Human Rights Award, and has had an award named after her for her self-sacrificing ideals.

"I'm not a legal person. I motivate, mobilize and persuade people. We need women attorneys looking out for women to lobby for their rights and to make legislation," she said.

WAV's objectives include researching Belize's violence against women situation and collect data so legislation, public policies, and projects can be created to better help women.

based solely on one criteria. Racism, he said, may not be explicit or even voiced, but nevertheless present.

This brand of shadowed racism, said Gordon, unmasks itself in the current debate over affirmative action programs. At Purdue, a school with 38,000 students (1,500 blacks) and 2,000 professors (17 blacks), a columnist for the student newspaper recently complained that "blacks were taking over" the campus, according to Gordon.

Yet, Gordon cited the already disproportionate black/white student/faculty ratio, coupled with the fact that only one black faculty member was hired last year. He noted this as a trend consistent with the hiring practices in academia — a profession in which blacks make up only 2 percent of the total amount of college professors nationwide.

Blacks are left to a "superfluous existence," where, once again, "one represents all," said Gordon. Even if only one black professor is hired annually at Purdue, it nonetheless will be deemed as an "injustice" to the true ideal of equal opportunity, as each new black employed will seemingly have been given the job simply based on unfair and biased principles of affirmative action.

Furthermore, the University community, as witnessed in the student's column, will attack the administration for practicing racial preference hiring programs and question the very credentials of the desired black candidate, said Gordon.

Fair reveals health care options

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

The annual University of Massachusetts Employee Benefit Fair was held Wednesday, May 3 in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The fair is held each year to provide information on the various insurance and health care options available to UMass employees.

The fair was co-sponsored by the Massachusetts Group Insurance Commission and the UMass Division of Human Resources.

Most UMass employees are unaware of the extent of the benefits that they are entitled to, according to Dolores Mitchell, the Executive Director of the Group Insurance Commission.

"Most people get very involved in learning the details only at the point when they have to have the service or have a problem," she said.

Nine different health care providers set up tables and offered information and answered the questions of fair attendees.

Mitchell explained some of the reasons why recipients would choose one plan over another, including cost, physician selection, and ability to make independent choices.

"People choose one kind or another depending on their pocketbook, upon their doctor, what plan their doctor is in, and upon whether they want freedom of choice [of doctor] or whether that's a lesser value to them," she said.

Price of an insurance plan was cited as the main reason why people tend to change health care providers, according to Elinore King the Director of Membership for the American Federal State County Municipal Employee (AFSCME) Council 93.

King said price should not be the deciding factor when selecting a health plan.

"My advice to them is don't pick your health plan by the price. We try to advise them as best we can, but everyone knows their own pocket or pocketbook. I'd hate to see somebody dying because they've got the wrong plan," she said.

"Most people get very involved in learning the details only at the point when they have to have the service or have a problem."

Available insurance benefits also extend to retired UMass employees said Mitchell.

"Retirees are fully covered, more or less on the same basis as regular full-time employees," she said.

Mitchell went on to add that the major difference between retirees benefits and active employees benefits is whether or not the retirees are enrolled in Medicare.

If they are enrolled in Medicare, she said, then the Common-wealth's plan is to "pick up the pieces" that Medicare doesn't, said Mitchell.

Information was distributed to all attendees explaining the different plans, and the benefits and costs associated with each one. There were also stations set up to do cholesterol screening and check blood pressure.

The event ran from 10 a.m. until 4 p.m., and is held every year, according to the sponsors.

IBM discounts new program for students

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Warp into the future with the next generation of computer operating systems at a discount.

International Business Machines (IBM) is now offering OS/2 Warp, the most recent version of its operating system for Personal Computers, at a discount for college students, faculty and staff.

IBM calls the offer the Academic Edition Offering which not only includes the full operating system, but a value package of software which includes a wordprocessor and a spreadsheet.

The discount is about $20 off the suggested retail price according to Chris Pollice, computer department clerk at the University Store in the UMass Campus Center.

Pollice said despite the discount the University book store will not stock the academic version unless there is a demand for it. He said if people want it they can order it through the book store.

IBM expects the retail price of the academic version to be about $60 to $65 versus the common retail price of about $80 to $90.

IBM claims Warp can be operated on any Personal Computer which has an Intel 386SX or more advanced microprocessor, and at least four megabytes of memory.

Lars Marshall, spokesman for Personal Computing Support Services at the Office of Information Technologies, said he would recommend an Intel 486 microproccesor and eight megabytes of memory before even considering Warp.

"The main difference between Warp and Windows is multitasking, which Windows doesn't have," said Jeff Tieszen, spokesman for IBM.

Windows, a popular operating system found on most Personal Computers, is a competing operating system produced by Microsoft Corp, and is often considered the standard operating system for all Personal Computers.

Multitasking allows a computer user to use two or more applications simultaneously.

The example Tieszen used was one of a student who might be doing research on the Internet for a term paper. With a few key strokes, the student could switch between the wordprocessor and modem software.

Tieszen said he thinks multitasking makes Warp easier to use than Windows.

Marshall said IBM's technical support service is not very helpful, and there is not a lot of documentation on Warp. Marshall said he had to learn Warp on his own.

Both Warp and Windows are compatible, so a user could operate a software package designed for Windows on Warp.

ing them their civil rights.

"The [religious right] wants to take their narrow view and bigoted definition of family and have that rule national politics," Isaacson said. Isaacson chairs the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Caucus.

Northampton Mayor Mary Ford joined city council members Michael Bardsley and Mary Clare Higgins in affirming the city's commitment to "the civil rights of all."

Other speakers at the rally included openly gay Northampton police officer Vernon Horton and two lesbian teenagers.

The rally also offered music and entertainment, a demonstration by members of Valley Women's Martial Arts, and information tables by groups such as the Northampton Lesbian and Gay Business Guild, the LBG Political Alliance of Western Massachusetts, and Lesbian Education and Health.

■ Budget strains sour UMass/town rapport

University for ticket citations written by UMass Police during the '80s and the early '90s.

The revenue from the tickets that should have gone to the town inadvertently went to the University, Boss said.

The University put the money into a scholarship fund, which is now depleted because scholarships have been distributed, according to Keith A. Williams, associate vice chancellor for university advancement.

"The University accepted the money and spent it," Boss said. "If you had a $200,000 windfall, but had no idea how you acquired it, it would certainly be in your best interest to find out if it were legitimately yours or not."

Two conflicting laws are causing this misunderstanding between the town and UMass, Williams said. Chapter 75 of Massachusetts laws says fine money should be in part paid to the University, while chapter 90 says that fines should be paid to the town.

The case is set for trial sometime in 1996, Seewald said.

The Campus Center Hotel

Of the several hotels and motels in the area, only one is tax-exempt, and it is causing strife between the town and the University.

Boss said he does not understand why the Campus Center Hotel is not subject to the four percent tax applicable to other similar sites of accommodation.

"If non-students have to pay a meal tax for eating in campus eateries, why should there be exemptions for staying overnight in the campus hotel," Boss asked.

Two weeks ago, Amherst Town Meeting passed a motion to place an excise tax on residential lodging at educational philanthropic institutions in the town of Amherst, he said. In one year, this measure has the potential to raise $80,000 for the town.

"We have coexisted with our brothers in the hotel business for 25 years without any particular problem because of the exemption," said Bernard F. Wilkes, associate director of the Campus Center. "And now the town fathers, because of budget crunches, see this as a way to generate additional revenue for the town."

Wilkes said that in 1968, the attorney general for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts granted the Campus Center Hotel tax-exemption because students funded the building.

"It is also on a tax-exempt public institution grounds," Wilkes said. "It is basically here for the benefit of University students, alumni, families and visiting professors. Other than the Yellow Pages, because of the exemption, we never advertise."

Wilkes said that the town tried the same measures two years ago, but it "never got off the 'Great and General Court,'" or, in layman's terms — the Massachusetts legislature.

The decision on this issue is once again up to the legislature, Wilkes said, who "never considered it.

Student representation in the 'Amherstocracy'

According to Cornelia Como, Amherst town clerk, UMass students do not become involved in town politics unless the issue at hand is of concern to college-aged students.

"Generally, if it is something that affects them, students will make an effort," Como said.

Two instances she recalled when students have been active were when the town was considering a keg bylaw as well as a noise bylaw.

Ted Chambers, political advocate for the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), who also was an undergraduate student at UMass, said that the two aforementioned and unsuccessful attempts were "anti-student initiatives."

The keg bylaw was the town's efforts to come down on "raging parties," he said. Kegs of beer would be tagged so that identification would become easier.

The noise bylaw, Chambers said, would have enabled police to arrest homeowners if the noise emitted reached or surpassed certain decibel levels.

According to Como, students have a chance to be an integral part of town politics because several precincts overlap upon the UMass campus.

However, there are no polling places on the campus that hold "about 60 percent" of the town's population, and more than half of the town's voters, Chambers said. This, in his opinion, is the intentional effort of the 'Amherstocracy.'

"There's a silent majority that sits back and violates the civil rights of tens of thousands of students of the University," Chambers said.

"There's a segment in town that will never stoop as low to ask students for their vote," Chambers said.

Rob Wetherell, a UMass graduate student, was an undergraduate while also a member of town meeting, representing Precinct 4, from 1991 to 1992.

He said he was perceived as "controversial" because fellow members disrespected him and did not make him feel welcome.

"It seemed like a moral dilemma," Wetherell said. "Do students belong in town meeting? We were just passing through."

What he found surprising about the treatment he experienced was that it was people such as himself who financially support the town.

"They don't fully acknowledge how dependant Amherst is on UMass students," Wetherell said.

"Students spend $110 million a year, in addition to providing all the jobs and the rent to landlords in the area."

UMass education is a privilege

When I was a senior in high school, I partook in a ritual almost as standard as the prom: I applied to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

I went to an upper-middle class regional high school in the eastern part of the state that had first-rate teachers, liberal policies about leaving campus during the day, an athletic program of high caliber, and an emphasis on quality education. In my town, graduating from high school was not a question, and going to college was expected.

Emily Marino

College was, of course, the key to academic enlightenment and future success. It was also a status symbol. Where you got in confirmed how smart you were, how much dough mom and pop could shell out, and, in some cases, how high above sea level your connections were.

I applied to seven schools, determined to end up at a private liberal arts college not too far away. I also applied to UMass in response to my parents' badgering. "Well why not," I told myself, "Everyone else is." When I got accepted, visiting campus was inevitable.

"Okay Dad, I'm getting in this car with you and taking a ride to Amherst, but that's it, no promises," I said to my father, who was almost as excited to visit UMass as he was while playing golf.

"My entire high school goes there," I said. "I'd kinda like to meet some new people before I'm too old to have any fun. Besides, I did well in high school, I want to go somewhere academics are appreciated." My father probably nodded and let me whine a little more.

This is the big twist in the story, when I get on campus and fall in love with the place. The strange thing is, I had no idea why I liked UMass so much once I finally saw it. Of course the location is gorgeous, the campus is big, green and spread out, and Amherst is artsy and quaint, with an alluring boozy underside natural to any college town. But was I really considering UMass?

I still don't know what attracted me to this school, except that when I was here that first time, I felt it was the place I wanted to be. Four years later, as I type my last column for a newspaper which has, at times, been like a second home to me, I have no regrets about coming here.

My freshman year hearing gossip about people with whom I graduated seemed important. It was during these times I still wondered: was I really getting as good an education as my classmates who had gone off to private schools?

One of my first on-campus greetings was a strike by the Graduate Employee Organization. Was this what education was all about? The demonstrations on the Student Union steps, the taking over of the Collegian, the lectures from my Economics professor who had calculated how much each of his lectures cost, and how much money we wasted every time we blew them off — this was intellectual stimulation?

The thing I eventually realized about this campus is that it's a place filled with many voices, and it is your choice to join the chorus, sing solo, sit in the audience and listen or stay away from the auditorium altogether. Exposure to the issues is an education in itself.

Academics at UMass can be summed up by some cliche about getting out of education what you put into it. If you aggressively seek the courses you want and get to know your professors, you'll realize that the resources are there.

Not too long ago I was bent out of shape because a friend of a friend was named a Rhodes Scholar. He was a student at an Ivy League school who would probably never have to sit in a lecture hall with busted seats and poor lighting, nor want for any material thing in life. I wondered how feasible it was for a UMass student to win a Rhodes scholarship. I moped for two days when I came up with an answer, until my mother refused to put up with my self-pity and set me straight.

"The truth is," she snapped, "that higher education is a privilege. You should consider yourself lucky that you have access to it."

I thought about what she said for a long time. I have worked with some phenomenal professors in comparative literature, Italian and journalism at UMass, whose passion for what they teach has sparked a desire in me to keep learning. I have read things and had discussions that have altered the way I understand and move about the world.

I look around the campus — in classrooms, on the Concourse, on buses, by the pond — and I listen to what people say. I observe a lot of student apathy, and many students who are not proud to be at a state school about which so much negativity has recently been propelled by the media.

The thing I've learned after four years at UMass is that higher education is a privilege. Every one of you has access to ideas via equations, theories, formulas and stories that force you to think differently about our world and your relation to everything in it. To waste this opportunity constitutes true stupidity, regardless of what school you attend.

After graduation, I suspect few places will provide me the same means for critical thinking and self-discovery that I have had at UMass. Education is not about where you go and what kind of reputation that school has, but what you do there and what you take away from it.

Emily Marino is a Collegian columnist.

Who decides where you belong?

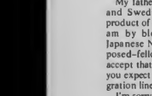
A recent conversation with my mother went something like this:

"Are you meeting any Japanese kids at UMass?" she asked.

"It's the same over here," I answered, with a tune of voice too familiar to my mother.

I am mad. I am so angry at how typical and predictable it's all been here concerning any interactions I've had with the Japanese people here. I am going through exactly the same thing over here, a million miles away, of which I thought I had left behind in Japan. What is the problem here?

My father is Japanese and my mother is Argentinian and Swedish. I am proud of being a product of three very different cultures. I am by blood and by citizenship, a Japanese National. So why do my supposed-fellow Japanese countrymen not accept that? By blood, you ask? What do you expect me to do, cut myself into thirds at the immigration line?



Yukari Shigeta

I'm sorry, but no. I am Japanese and always will be, and if Japanese people can't accept that, that is their problem, and not mine. I am just so sorry that I have to claim myself a person that comes from a place inhabited by ignorant, narrow-minded and very stubborn people. Unfortunately, it ends up as my problem.

My mother would walk into a traditional Japanese vegetable store, and the lady would have a hard time placing the cabbage on the measuring tray, as flawless Japanese poured out of my mother's mouth. At first, people may mistake this as pure fascination; however, it goes beyond that. It is a patronizing and condescending attitude that reflects on peoples' faces whenever they see my foreign mother, and the two clueless creatures behind her, my sister and me.

Neither my sister nor I look very Japanese; to them, we may as well be Spanish or Italian judging by our skin color. That's what makes simple, day to day activity that much of a drag. In Japan, anything from using the subway to ordering fries at McDonald's is a pain in the neck. First you have to wait for the McDonald's girl to figure out what planet you're from. Speaking Japanese to a Japanese person for me is an embarrassing, almost a shameful act because you are almost made to feel that you are not allowed to speak their language.

Let me tell you what happened during orientation at UMass. I approached a group of Japanese people standing around together, and, feeling homesick, I couldn't wait until I could go up to them and talk to them in Japanese.

I had to tackle this carefully, like teaching a baby to walk. I didn't want to give them cardiac arrest, so I introduced myself in English, and slowly gave it away to them that my father was Japanese, and all the rest of it. Instantly, I was interrogated. Did I like sushi, they demanded. Why did I have a Japanese name, looking the way I did? Upset, I left the crowd feeling far more homesick than before.

Let's reverse the scenario: an American student spots a crowd of Americans at a school in Japan. Now, would such a cross examination have resulted, to see if in fact, the student really knew what a Twinkie was? Would they really wonder if the student was actually from Iowa or not? I highly doubt it.

I wish that all the Japanese people I meet could be as understanding and open-minded as those who are actually friends of mine, and the few that actually give me the time of day. I'm realistic, I know that no Japanese person will off-hand see me as one of them.

The funny thing is, Japanese people are great towards foreigners, but the minute it comes to a "hafu" (the Japanese word for the word "half," quite self-explanatory) they become completely defensive, and cannot accept any Japanese person with foreign blood in them to call themselves a Japanese.

This, I'm sure, goes back to Japanese imperialism, where a person like me would probably have been considered an outcast.

Opinion/Editorial

When the trash falls down around us

Tim leaned on his stick and shook his head sadly as the two-ball rebounded off the bumper and rested peacefully in the middle of the table.

"For Christ's sakes Kent, I'm shooting like your mother."

Kent O'Brien nodded slowly, and remained with his back against the wall, cradling his cup against his chest. "She's getting better, you know," he said.

The skinny guy with the Offspring shirt slammed home an easy shot in the corner pocket.

"So, was the final car ride tough, man?" asked Tim.

The car has stopped at the departure gate, and outside the clutter of sounds and people rattled against the windows, assaulting the silence inside. Eustacia Fields has turned her view from her hands, and looked at him for a moment before a horn behind them shattered everything, and he lost his voice to a stuttered farewell, good luck.

"Yeah," Kent said, watching as the Offspring sat back down, mumbling to himself. "Guess it's my shot now."

He walked around the table, passing the crouched figures against the walls, all huddled on benches like dirty old men. It felt like they were all watching him, and could feel their eyes peer at his back as they pretended to talk to their friends. He imagined them jumping up and pinning him down to the pool table, their leering faces bowing over his form, waiting for the knife to come.

Kent cleared his throat and shook his head, trying to shake off the invisible hands he could feel on him. He leaned over the table, but as he lowered himself down the balls grew farther and farther away, as if they were rolling away down a tunnel and disappearing into a pinpoint of light.

A new song started playing on the jukebox. A few guys behind him started yelling along with it, while one kept shouting for them to all shut up. Kent looked down the length of the stick and knew he had been there before. In so many ways, just waiting for the empty crack and an echo of his victory cry within a barren hall. The distance kept falling away, until he could see the whole room around him, distorted like a bell jar, the twisted faces swaying and the voices jumbled and wrong. Shut the hell up! Shutupshutup! He snapped his arm forward and sent the cue ball ricocheting off the bumper and sailing over the edge of the table. As every muscle felt like it had shattered, he threw the stick down on the table. The silence suffocated all the gasps that were coming around him, and he feared that with their next inhale every piece of him would be torn apart by the vacuum. He felt himself lurch forward and saw only the stained floor and the shuffle of feet as he passed through the doorway, ignoring the restraining hand on his shoulder.

Into the crowd of the main bar, Kent could feel the air continue to leave him, melting in with all the stale words and the dirty smoke that hovered overall the ragged heads. Voices came fast and faded behind him like a train passing, until the glass door finally gave before his hands.

Outside the night was cool. There was a motion in the breeze, which slowly dissipated the noise and let it float up into the air with the clouds. Stone stretched out beneath him, solid and dead, and he stumbled upon its stoic face down the sidewalk. A group of students was approaching him, their uneasy strides and careless laughter making him fear they would mistakenly push him into the street.

Nathan Crick

He turned down the small alley, and came out behind a building where a dumpster sat, overflowing in greasy papers and soda cans. Across the lot, the lights of a restaurant glowed over peaceful faces and the rattle of ice cubes.

Kent collapsed against the wall beside the dumpster, and leaned his head on the stone, staring up into the hazy night sky. It was so empty and black, and what could be made out was dimmed by the clouds and his blurry eyes.

He remembered seeing Eustacia walking away through the electronic doors, her form dying amidst the crowds and the luggage carriers. He remembered feeling that all he had inside him was draining out and collecting about his feet, because it seemed he had nothing left to hold it in.

Now the trash surrounded him, and images of himself came out of the shadows. They skulked behind his illusions, and hid behind the grease and the wrinkled napkins. He could see them grinning at him, mocking all he felt and could not subdue. Then when they had all settled in for him to see, he lay his head against the brick and tasted the salty tears as they fell into his mouth. He looked up at the dull moon, but as he did not know what lay behind its face, he closed his eyes and revelled in his glorious ignorance.

Letters to the Editor

Responses to anti-Semitic letter

To the editor:

Due to the grossly perverse nature of Professor Helen Cullen's diatribe against the Jewish religion, I do not deem it necessary to refute her fallacious contentions. Instead I will merely say her conclusion that "...traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race," mirrors those sentiments found in Nazi ideology. The trouble will always exist, Professor Cullen, between Jews and that element of society which espouses such ideology.

It is a sad reality for people of my faith that we must contend with the onslaught of these repugnant, unscholarly, and quite frankly, pathetic views. The fact that these views are emanating from a faculty member at this university is even more disturbing.

Russ Levine
Sunderland

To the editor:

In response to Helen Cullen's verbal sewage I'm left with a feeling of total repulsion at the utter stupidity and misinformation of the writer, and more so at the irresponsibility of the editorial staff in allowing such garbage to enter your pages. It is quite clear that the author is totally ignorant of the Bible and of Jewish teachings, and more than likely cannot read one word of the Hebrew language, witnessed by her statement that the Talmud includes in it the Old Testament.

Maybe she's using the National Enquirer for her most accurate information?

Helen, give me a call and I'll be happy to give you basic lessons in Judaism.

The fact that some people have misused and manipulated certain passages for their own agendas has absolutely nothing to do with their validity and essential beauty.

The letter would better have been entitled: "Increasing campus tensions."

Rabbi Chaim Adelman
Jewish Chaplain — UMass

To the editor:

We would like to respond to the blatantly anti-Semitic letter by Helen F. Cullen published on May 2 entitled (or I would rather say mistitled) "History behind campus tensions."

We will not attempt to counter history — placing blame on some other religious or ethnic group in order to defend Judaism — since any attempt would be purely selective on my part and would merely repeat the same insidious rhetorical strategy used by Cullen.

It would be erroneous to say that any one group is blameless of crimes against humanity or that any philosophy has not been used to aid abuse of power.

But let us turn to some of the logical fallacies of Cullen's argument and the Collegian's representation of it.

First, the title is wrong since Cullen hardly gives a history behind campus tensions; she barely even addresses campus tensions.

Instead, she lists what is offensive in Jewish texts in an effort to pit Jews against women, Blacks, Arabs and finally the entire human race. To call this "history" is to legitimize the rhetoric of hate.

Cullen begins by claiming that tensions on campus between Blacks and Jews "have destroyed the peaceful atmosphere of academe."

Since when is an intellectual institution peaceful? If we want true diversity — if all opinions are to be heard — we can hardly expect peace to be a desirable goal. What follows is no more reasonable.

Cullen claims that Judaism is offensive to all women because the figure of Eve has been used to blame women for human suffering. Misogyny is pervasive in all cultures. It is equally true that American Judaism offers one of the most progressive religious atmospheres for women.

We need look no further than UMass Hillel or the Jewish Community of Amherst to see services which use egalitarian language, recognize matriarchs along with patriarchs, and which are led by women rabbis or women lay people.

Examples taken from the local Jewish community are just as, if not more relevant to issues on campus than Cullen's history of how an ancient story has been used by Jews and non-Jews. Indeed, non-Jews.

It is interesting to us that Cullen's examples show how other groups have used Jewish texts to perpetrate crimes.

Why not discuss how Jews have interpreted their own texts?

Yo La Tengo, 18th Dye highlight reviews

ELECTR-O-PURA
Yo La Tengo
Matador Records

The folks in Yo La Tengo love guitars. Shimmering guitars, squealing guitars, hushed guitars and loud guitars. On last year's much-herald album Painful the group used this six-string fixation to create a rich and textured body of songs, that seemed to almost float by unnoticed, until the buried pop hooks pricked up your ears and made you pay closer attention.

Sure the usual roster of influences such as Sonic Youth and My Bloody Valentine could be used as points of reference, but, unlike the aforementioned, Yo La Tengo isn't concerned with messing around with such things as song structure or melody. Their heads may be floating in clouds of feedback, but there feet are firmly rooted in the grounds of traditional pop.

On Electr-O-Pura, the band's latest effort and second for Matador, the group picks up right were Painful left off. Guitars still command the show — swirling, ebbing and flowing all over the place — but this time with a little more structure than usual. On the opener, "Decora," drummer Georgia Hubley croons in her best deadpan over a beautiful mess of reverb, backwards tape loops and feedback to come up with a haunting pop song that is as fascinating as it is catchy.

Although Electr-O-Pura is chalk-full of these blissful "sound collages" its most brilliant moments come when the band keeps it simple — finding a sort of beauty in between the cracks of guitar noise. "The Hour Grows Late" finds guitarist/singer Ira Kaplan delicately singing over sparse guitar and soft organ, drawing you in with a "ba da da" chorus when you least expect it. The Kinks-like "Tom Courtenay," soars over Hubley's delicious backing vocals and a pleasantly fuzzed-out guitar, to become the band's most infectious song since their semi-hit "Upside-Down."

Electr-O-Pura delivers on what Painful hinted at — a musical bridge between avant-garde sonics and pure pop sensibility. Although other bands have come close, none have done it as seamless as Yo La Tengo, proving that they are not only one of today's most exciting, as well as competent pop bands, but one of today's most criminally underrated groups — period. A (Matt Audette)

SLEEPER
Smart
Arista Records

Louise Wener has taken to wearing a t-shirt ironically agreeing her group Sleeper is "Just Another Female Fronted Band." The lady doth protest too much — despite her sarcasm, for this is indeed what Sleeper is, the latest British hype featuring three faceless pasty white boys and a lead singer who rants versus vegetarianism and pro-faced feminism, while mocking the "No Sex Please, We're British" mentality in order to titillate indie-saddo male journalists.

Trax On Trax Off

Wener dominates Smart, a generic guitar-oriented indie album enlightened by the lyrics of Louise. It opens with "Inbetweener," a Blur-like tale of middle-class suburban Britain, followed by "Delicious," featuring the somewhat infamous line, "We should both go to bed/Till we make each other sore."

In fact, the fourth track "Hunch" triumphs over the safety- first opening salvo of three British singles, another very English three-minute pop portrait of a middle-ageing couple. The 1993 debut single "Alice in Vain" preempted the melodic sense of Hole's Live Through This, but in the context of Smart sounds almost anachronistic, considering Sleeper's current Anglophilic affectations. Unfortunately, the feeling is that there is too much filler on Smart — notably the old B-side "Lady Love Your Countryside," a one-joke pun on a feminist punk paean by the very poor band S*M*A*S*H.

Yet there is enough evidence of talent on this erratic debut to justify some of the hype heaped on Sleeper, or specifically Ms. Wener. Maybe the sophomore sequel to Smart will be a little more — well, whip-smart. C+ (Martyn Bone)

Yo La Tengo have recently released one of their finest albums, Electr-O-Pura.

TRIBUTE TO A BUS
18th Dye
Matador Records

The fall of the Berlin Wall may finally be affecting the rock n' roll community as one of the most highly buzzed bands of Eastern Europe releases its newest album. 18th Dye hail from Berlin, but no one would ever know it based on the very English sounding vocals.

Last year American rockers Yo La Tengo "found" the band on their tour of Germany and influenced Matador to sign the band in this country. Over the past six months the hip record label has reissued two older recordings as well as the band's newest records, Tribute To A Bus.

Obviously much of American and British indie rock has saturated the ears of the these Eastern Europeans, but don't despair. Even though it is more than apparent that the band has been influenced by the same groups that every noisy-pop outfit cites today (Velvet Underground, Sonic Youth, My Bloody Valentine), 18th Dye have come up with a winning combination all their own.

The opening track, "Glass House Failure" is a killer instrumental which builds up in a Dambuilder-esque fashion — an absolute perfect way to kick off an album which continually weaves in and out of different musical styles. Tracks like "Only Bum" show off the group's keen pop sensibilities that won the hearts of Yo La Tengo — pop purists themselves.

While many bands, such as Helmet, make a career out of writing the same song for years, 18th Dye is afraid to write the same song even twice. All of the songs are distinct, which makes A Tribute To A Bus such a lasting and enjoyable pleasure. If this band is any representation of the Berlin music scene, don't be surprised if Berlin is hyped as the Seattle of Europe. Let's hope for Germany that will never happen. B+ (Michael Burke)

Cage talks on neuroses, 'Kiss of Death' character

By Rib Leyva
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In the movies, even when he's going bonkers, Nicolas Cage is smo-o-o-o-th. In person, even when he's just sitting down for a little lunch, it can be a rocky road.

The Hollywood journeyman, gaining renewed respect for his portrayal of mobster Little Junior Brown in Kiss of Death, is the first to admit he's no tough guy.

"It was nauseating to me," he says of how he wheezed life into the brutal asthmatic villain of director Barbet Schroeder's film noir.

"I concern myself with whether or not I need my neuroses to be able to do this," Cage says, shaking his head, his unique throaty voice reduced to a near whisper.

Thinning on top and ghostly pale, he's a far cry from the grotesque Little Junior, looking especially harmless in a dark blue suit and inch-wide tie. Nervous, almost jittery, he has no stomach for hot food.

His bodyguard hovering nearby, Cage orders sashimi and iced tea. He fiddles with his jewelry and eyes the dining room at the Four Seasons Hotel, checking to see if he's attracted any undue attention.

It turns out that the main thing bothering him is stage fright.

"I'm terrified about doing 'David Letterman,'" he says, antsy about his first appearance on the late-night show. "I'm not a funny guy."

Big movie star frightened by TV goofball?

"I really admire him," Cage says. "That's why I'm so nervous, because his wit is so sharp. He's a heavy dude."

Letterman heavy? Yeah, so is Mr. Rogers.

Cage, 31, relaxes somewhat when he finally gets down to talking, but his overall intensity remains largely undiminished. Smiles are nonexistent.

Dripping remorse, he tells about his shaky start making Kiss of Death. He got so deep into Little Junior during the film's violent opening scene that he split open a stuntman's head, sending him to the hospital for stitches.

"I started crying, thinking I had killed somebody on my first day of shooting," Cage says. "And Barbet Schroeder, he knew that we had only one take, one shot of it, and he said, 'Well, we're going to have to use it.'"

"He said, 'Unfortunately, but perhaps fortunately, it will have all the messiness of reality.'"

Slimmed down from the bulky physique he amassed for the role, Cage points out — without being asked — that he refused to take steroids to build muscle mass, relying on weight lifting and a high-calorie diet.

He's also self-conscious about his skin.

"By the way," he says, "the reason I've got makeup on my face is that I've been doing TV all day."

Not to worry Nicolas, you look mah-velous.

"I've done interviews with makeup before and the writer got the wrong idea," he explains.

Cage's early career featured edgy roles in Birdy, Moonstruck, Raising Arizona, Vampire's Kiss and Wild at Heart. He followed that string with nice-guy parts in Honeymoon in Vegas, Guarding Tess and It Could Happen to You.

Red Rock West started a round trip that revved full throttle in Kiss of Death.

"I wanted to try and go back to that darker corner of my mind, and come up with something," Cage says. "I liken it to a carbon clean-out, which is when you take a race car and blow the engine out, drive it over 100 mph. I felt that I was getting gummed up and I needed to return to explosive, wild behavior."

Recruits brighten UM future

By Candice Flemming and Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer program added two more recruits to its already talented 1995 class which included Amanda Thompson, Karen Johnson and Sara Hill.

Meghan Brennan and Michele Ferzan signed on to play for UMass starting in the 1995–96 academic year.

Brennan, who hails from Yorktown Heights, N.Y., can play at either the midfield or defense positions and was the team captain of the Yorktown High school squad which was ranked No. 20 in the nation last year. In her senior season, Brennan was named to the Hudson Valley Empire State Team and also received All–Hudson Valley honors.

Ferzan was a forward for Ridge High School in Basking Ridge, N.J. In her senior season, she displayed her outstanding offensive capabilities by scoring 31 goals while also notching nine assists for a total of 71 points. She was named to the New Jersey All–State team and received All–Somerset County as well as All–Mountain Valley Conference distinction in her final season.

Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy was pleased with his two newest signees.

"Meghan is a very hard–nosed, aggressive player," Rudy said. "She reads the game well, and is a true leader on the field.

"Michele plays with tenacity and power. She is a fighter, who has great speed, and has a knack for taking goals on half chances."

With the five new signees, and the loss of just two graduating seniors (Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell), the upcoming season for the Minutewomen looks promising as UMass will now have the much needed depth they did not have last year.

The Minutewomen finished 16–6 last year and were the Atlantic 10 Champions for the second year in a row. They advanced to the NCAA Regional Final Four where they were ousted by Hartford.

"Michele is a scoring machine, who's also very quick," Massachusetts assistant April Kater said.

"When you're used to scoring goals, you don't think about who you're going up against, you just want to put the rock in the net." (CF)

After a highly successful 1994–95 campaign, the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team is seeking improvement with the announcement of seven recruits to support the Minutemen cause for the 1995–96 season.

Massachusetts head coach Roy Johnson will be looking to sure up what holes will be left by the graduating senior class. The biggest problem for the team, even before graduation, was the lack of scoring punch on the pommel horse. That fact is magnified by the loss of Jay Santos to graduation, UMass' most consistent scorer on the event, nearly 9.3 a routine.

The signings include Brad LeClair, a Pawtucket, R.I. native and a pommel horse specialist. LeClair placed sixth at the U.S. Gymnastics Region VI Championships on the pommel horse, as well as 16th in the all–around during the competition.

Johnson, named ECAC coach of the year, had nothing but praise for LeClair.

"He already has a college routine," Johnson said. "We will try to add a couple for moves to his routine. His score on the pommel horse at the New England's would have been a 8.9 at the collegiate level and that's just great."

Another incoming freshman who could add scoring depth is Steven Frey of Tonawanda N.Y. Frey won the New York State high school title on the pommel horse. Johnson said Frey could contribute right away to the Minutemen cause.

"Steve has to learn more skills to be able to receive good scores at the college level," Johnson said. "If he is able to do that he will be very competitive next year."

An all–around specialist who trained at the New England Artistic School of Gymnastics, Michael Plorde of Amesbury, will also be showing his talents in Frank L. Boyden Gym this coming winter Plorde placed ninth at the Region VI Championships in the all around. His score would have been about a 50 in the collegiate scoring system.

Other athletes who could become future stars for the Minutemen are: Scott Champagne from Attleboro, who placed third at the Massachusetts state gymnastics championships, Brian Langan of Newton and Lloyd Alquist of Exeter, N.H.

Another place where depth is needed is on the horizontal bar. New Jersey product Phil Lieberman will bring his high flying routine to the bowels of Boyden. Lieberman competed in the Region VII Champion–ships on the high bar, as well as on the floor exercise. He will be a central figure for the Minutemen in those events.

As many as four others, including another top all arounder from Region VI, may be calling Amherst home for the next four years.

Johnson has reason to be happy with the recruiting class at this point.

"We have definitely added depth in the pommel horse and high bar, where we weren't as solid as the other four events," Johnson added. "With only losing three seniors and bringing in the talent we have, we will be very competitive."

More positive can be taken from the fact that freshman red shirt Chris Voght will also be available for action and has his full four years of eligibility ahead of him at UMass. Voght's main contribution will be in the parallel bars.

Overall, Johnson sees next year's outlook as bright.

"We are shooting to be in the top 10 in the country and competing at NCAA Regionals as a team," Johnson said. "That will be our goal and we can do that." (I.S.)

being thrown off the premises. Shortly after, another questionable call was made by Joseph, and the Rutgers cameraman was thrown out.

The rivalry that saw twists and turns in the previous two A–10 Championships received the same yesterday afternoon. Two judgement calls by a plate umpire that decides the fate of a couple of rivals were made, and padded the result.

So, the topic of discussion after the game centered around two controversial plays. Not that Daut avenged last season's loss in the A–10 final to win earn her 25th victory of the season. Not that Cardenas won the tournament's Most Outstanding Player award. Not that Sortino and Co. rode through the A–10 Championships without a loss.

The focus of attention was on Paul Joseph. And it's too bad, considering the achievements of the Massachusetts softball team, the 1995 Atlantic 10 champions.

Boston fans unsure of new park plan

By Jon Marcus
Associated Press

BOSTON — Few people complained when plans were unveiled to replace Boston Garden. Many were nostalgic, sure, but not all that sorry to see the decrepit old place go.

Now the Boston Red Sox say they may leave Fenway Park, which along with Detroit's Tiger Stadium are the nation's oldest major league stadiums, for a 49,000–capacity ballpark complex with no obstructed views, no cramped seating and no Green Monster. And this may be more of a jolt than the city can take.

"It's horrible," Bob Bunker said Friday while lunching at a watering hole in the shadow of the ballpark. "It's history." Fenway "is so much more distinctive than any other stadium," said Chris Siragusa, a transplant from New York. "People just don't want to see it go."

The lunch crowd waxed nostalgic about Fenway's distinctive manual scoreboard, the short right–field line and the familiar neon Citgo sign visible above the 37–foot left–field wall dubbed the Green Monster.

They praised the intimate feel of the 33,871 seats.

"It makes you feel more a part of the game," Siragusa said. Red Sox chief executive officer John Harrington said Fenway is charming and historic, but it's "economically obsolete."

Among other things, he said, there's too little room for luxury seats, a big source of revenue.

"We truly believe our fans will come to accept it," Harrington said.

Across town, fans of the Celtics and Bruins have spent this season bidding a bittersweet farewell to deteriorating Boston Garden, which will close at the end of the summer. Its replacement, just next door, is almost finished.

Now the Red Sox, too, say they want to move. They've got a plan for a new $150 million ballpark, hotel and retail complex to be built alongside a proposed convention center in downtown Boston.

Team officials say they'll pay for the construction if the city and state will cover the cost of land, roads and public transportation. A commission studying the convention center is scheduled to choose a site by June 1.

The Red Sox say their target for a new stadium is 2001, when they hope to host an All–Star game marking the 100th anniversary of the franchise.

The Red Sox are being mindful of fan sentiment. They say they won't enclose their ballpark, conceding Boston fans wouldn't stand for artificial grass replacing the Fenway sod once graced by the likes of Ted Williams and Carl Yastrzemski.

board for the entire second quarter.

Murphy took a thread–the–needle pass from sophomore Brendan Glass on an extra man opportunity to put UMass up by five. Then Grande, Mike Delpercio, sophomore Jim Kennedy, and finally Eric Bailey from his knees, rounded out the scoring as the Minutemen went to the half up 9–1.

The defense was also impressive. Seniors Vin Dellolacono and Jared Lanning and Greg Macdonald wouldn't let Army sharpshooters Manning and Dan Brostek get to close Tom LoPresti and when they did get by the defense, the he was there to hold the fort.

The second half started off with more of the same, as Hoffman and Murphy connected in the first two minutes of the period and the UMass lead was 11–1.

Tourney Notes: Only the first eight teams in the tournament are seeded. The order went Johns Hopkins (1), Virginia (2), Syracuse (3), Maryland (4), Duke (5), Princeton (6), Brown (7), and Loyola (8). The remaining teams were North Carolina, UMass, Cornell and Notre Dame.

Cardenas and advancing Mareina to third. Buckley then walked to load the bases for Gutridge who lined out into a double play.

The two controversial plays resulted in two ejections of Rutgers fans, one them being the Rutgers busdriver.

The victory erased from the minds of the Minutewomen their loss to the Lady Knights last year in the championship game when Rutgers halted UMass' five year championship run. The championship was the Minutewomen's eight tourney title, an A–10 record.

"I wasn't going to let this team take us over again," Cardenas said. "It wasn't going to happen. When we were down one run I was just like, there was no way we're losing. Our team is going to find a way to win, and we did."

Daut (25–8) went the distance allowing two hits while striking out seven but walking three. For her impressive showing throughout the tourney (3–0 record, 19 strikeouts), Daut was awarded the Most Outstanding Pitcher award. Cardenas, who ended up batting .583 (7–for–12) with two runs batted in and six runs scored during the tournament, was named the Most Outstanding Player.

"This is what we worked for all season long," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "Kelly went out and pitched a great game. Sam had [pitcher's] number from the beginning."

"I think this was the biggest win of the year," Daut said.

The Minutewomen (37–17) advance to the NCAA play–in series against Canisius on Thursday–Friday (May 11–12) at Totman Field. The play–in will be a best of three series and the winner will earn a sport in the NCAA tournament. The two teams will play a doubleheader on Thursday at 3 p.m. and if needed, a third game would be played at 2 p.m. on Friday.

Minutewomen pounce Rutgers to win the A–10

Massachusetts softball swept past Rutgers for a 5-1 victory

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Down 1–0 in the bottom of the fifth, the University of Massachusetts scored the game–tying run on a controversial play at the plate on its way to a 5–1 victory over Rutgers in the Atlantic 10 Conference Softball Championship yesterday at Totman Field.

With the bases loaded and one out, Kelly Buckley came up to the plate and hit a shallow fly to left field. Tracey Osier (1–for–3, one run scored), who was on third base, tagged up but bluffed and Stephanie Mareina (2–for–4), who was on second, started running to third, forcing Osier home. The throw to the plate was on time, but Osier eluded it to score the game–tying run. Rutgers coach Pat Willis was not happy.

"I felt she was tagged," she said. "I usually don't get wild about calls but that was a crucial play."

Kim Gutridge then hit a sinking liner to left which the left fielder made a nice catch on to prevent the Minutewomen from getting anymore runs.

UMass would break it open in the bottom of the sixth, though, with more controversy.

Michele Shaw (2–for–3) led off the inning with a single off the pitcher's hip and Jodi Sorenson was put in to pinch run for Shaw. Kelly Daut dropped a bunt down the third base line and reached on a bad throw while Sorenson moved to third. Willis was once again livid as she thought that Daut had ran three feet out of the baseline, but there was no call from the umpire Paul Joseph.

"The guy [Joseph] didn't know what the heck he was doing out there," Willis said.

With Heather Dorsey up, Daut stole second base to put runners at second and third. The Minutewomen then executed a perfect suicide squeeze to score Sorenson, the go–ahead run, while Daut reached third. Daut scored the second run of the inning after she came home on the overthrow of Dorsey's steal attempt and Dorsey advanced to third. After Osier grounded out to the pitcher, Sam Cardenas (2–for–3, one RBI, one run scored) smacked a base hit past the diving third baseman Karen Pelkey to drive in Dorsey.

Mareina then kept the inning going with a base hit to left putting runners on first and second for Chris Martens. Martens responded with a single up the middle scoring

Questionable calls lead to rocky game

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

It was the third consecutive Atlantic 10 Softball Championship pitting Massachusetts and Rutgers in the final game yesterday afternoon.

Rutgers lost the 1993 A–10 Championship to a Minutewomen suicide squeeze in the bottom of the eighth inning to win, 1–0. Massachusetts, losers of the 1994 A–10 Championship, won today 5–1.

Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said after the 8–1 semifinal victory on Saturday, "it didn't really matter who it was"— but the players had other thoughts, namely revenge.

"Oh yeah, definitely," Massachusetts third baseman Sam Cardenas said when asked if last year's result was on her mind. "I wasn't going to let this team take us over again. It wasn't going to happen."

"Yeah, pretty much the whole year, it was," Daut answered to the same question posed to Cardenas.

On a sunny day, with the fierce wind blowing against Totman Field, the final game sparked interest before the first pitch was even thrown, as the rivalry set the scene. But what occurred during the yesterday's contest, both on and off the field, spiced up the intense matchup even more.

The bats were quiet for the first four innings, either because the sound of the whirling wind circulating around the diamond was too overpowering, or because pitchers Daut and Lady Knight Kelly Riedel were silencing the opposing offenses. Whichever, the bats, and a couple of men close to the Rutgers team, awoke the next inning.

With runners on second and third, Kelly Buckley hit a shallow flyball to leftfield. Osier, who was forced to tag up because Mareina was sprinting to third, darted home. The throw came in, and Osier slid around catcher Tracy Pizzuti, tagging home plate a second later. Umpire Paul Joseph called the Minutewomen designated hitter safe.

That's where the fun started.

Rutgers coach Pam Willis ran onto the field, screaming at Joseph about the call. The Rutgers bus-driver, who continued to shout at Joseph while standing in the fenced area of the Lady Knights, called him a "sonuvabitch" several times, before

UMass earns bid to NCAAs

They got in.

After the loss to Brown, people left them for dead. It was widely believed that the Massachusetts lacrosse team's NCAA chances ended with the Brown game, but UMass' 16–8 pounding of Army, evidently caught the eye of the selection committee who gave Massachusetts a bid in the 12 team field. Mancses was still alive, and Princeton in New Jersey next Saturday.

It is Massachusetts first time in the tournament since 1993.

The chairman of the selection committee Joe Holiday pointed to Massachusetts' big wins (Hofstra and Notre Dame) as the reason for its inclusion.

The Minutemen ignored the doubters and believed going in that their playoff chances were still alive, depending on the outcome of Saturday's game, and played that way.

"We were coming off two losses, and we came back and rebounded against a great team," said UMass coach Greg Cannella. "We showed a lot of guts today.. We had something on the line and we played great."

Other than the first minute, the entire first half saw the Minutemen control the game from end line to end line. Rob Manning scored for Army to open the game and give the Cadets the early lead, but then the flood gates opened.

Army junior goalkeeper Travis Loving could have sued for lack of support from his defensive mates all afternoon, as stupid penalties and bad defense, led to wide open scoring chances and subsequent goals for the Minutemen.

First, junior co–captain Buddy Hoffman (4 goals, 2 assists) scored to tie the game at one, then senior Jeremy Murphy (5 goals) took a feed fro:n sophomore Chris Grande for a lead the Minutemen would never relinquish. Next, junior Jay Robbins won the ensuing face–off scooped up the ball and was left to run in uncontested on Loving and tally his first goal of the season. Hoffman's second goal came before five minutes had ticked off the Michie Stadium clock and UMass lead 4–1, and the score stayed that way for the remainder of the first quarter.

The Minutemen never let up, getting goals from five different players, while keeping the Cadets off the

Wild series for Minutemen, Bonnies

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts and St. Bonaventure were not known as baseball rivals heading into a weekend series last weekend. But after a heated, three–game war at Earl Lorden Field, one might have thought the Minutemen and the Bonnies were bitter enemies.

The Bonnies (21–21–1, 12–9 Atlantic 10) were playing for their playoff lives, battling St. Joseph's for the final berth in the A–10 tournament next weekend, and it showed as they won two of three from the Minutemen (31–12, 19–5 A–10).

Massachusetts, on the other hand, had already clinched the regular season title and the No. 1 seed in the post–season tourney, and took the time to rest some banged–up starters, including leftfielder Ryan Jette (hamstring) and third baseman Brad Gorrie (leg).

The fans who attended the double-header on Saturday alone saw six ejections, two questionable calls, two extra–inning affairs, the emptying of both benches, a win by both squads and a protest. Was this the making of a rivalry?

In the series opener, St. Bonaventure picked up an 11–8 victory in nine innings without its coach, Larry Sudbrook, who was thrown out by home plate umpire Frank Nevs in the second frame for arguing a call.

The Bonnies held an 8–6 lead until the bottom of the seventh inning, when junior leftfielder Nelson Ubaldo cranked a two–run homer to right field, sending the game to extras. The contest remained tied at 8–8 until the top of the ninth, when Nevs took center stage again.

With the bases full of Bonnies and two outs, Minuteman starter Jay Murphy was in his wind–up when the runner on third base, St. Bonaventure's Mike Bennett, broke for home. Murphy hurried the throw home to catcher Andy Pelis, who flipped off his helmet and prepared to apply the tag.

Instead, St. Bonaventure's Greg Mamula, who was the batter, swung and hit Pelis on the top of the head, allowing Bennett to score the go–ahead run for the Bonnies. Nevs ruled the play catcher's interference and permitted the run.

Massachusetts coach Mike Stone was livid at the call and was ejected by Nevs. "He hit Andy [Pelis] over the head. That wasn't a swing, nor was it catcher's interference," Stone said after the game. "Some umpires try to be the center of attention and get their egos involved in a game where they don't belong."

St. Bonaventure shortstop Jason Abreau followed with a single, scoring two more runs and putting the game out of reach, 11–8. Murphy (6–3) suffered the loss, his first in the A–10, despite holding the Bonnies hitless from the fourth inning until the ninth. Massachusetts filed a protest to the league office in reference to the play and the outcome of game one.

In the nightcap, St. Bonaventure led 5–3 until the bottom of the fifth. Sophomore Nate Murphy roped an RBI double, then scored on a single by rightfielder Bill Knight to knot the game at 5–5.

Knight blasted a 2–2 offering in the bottom of the eighth over the rightfield fence for his 16th homerun of the year to win the game for Massachusetts. Sophomore hurler Jason Bennett (7–0) threw five shutout innings of relief to notch the victory.

St. Bonaventure came back yesterday and trounced the Minutemen, 19–9, to assure itself a spot in next week's conference tournament. A grand slam by Mamula in the third was the crushing blow.

The Minutemen return to action tomorrow against New Hampshire for their final home game (3 p.m.).

National leaders sign olive leaves in ceremony

By Ron Kampeas
Associated Press

LONDON — Leaders of 54 nations that fought on both sides in World War II signed olive leaves on Sunday in a ceremony of reconciliation marking the 50th anniversary of the end of the war in Europe.

In Germany, commemoration of the Allied victory over the Nazis was underscored by the rumbles of right-wing extremism. A synagogue was set on fire and neo-Nazi disturbances left one youth dead. But V-E Day ceremonies across the continent brought a mingling of joy, sorrow and hope.

The ceremony in London began with the soaring bugle blasts of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," written by the Jewish American composer in 1942 as a rebuff to Nazi racist ideology.

Prince Charles, appearing with his estranged wife Princess Diana for the first time since Christmas, watched children lead the politicians to flagpoles in Hyde Park for the signing of the olive leaves.

The children then entered a model globe, which began to revolve, releasing hundreds of doves into the air.

The leaders included Vice President Al Gore, Helmut Kohl, chancellor of the now democratic Germany, and King Mswati III of tiny Swaziland — among the Commonwealth countries that rallied to Britain's aid.

Earlier, the leaders joined in thanksgiving and prayers for reconciliation at St. Paul's Cathedral, which still bears scars of the combat that ended half a century ago.

The royal family led by Queen Elizabeth II attended the service at the cathedral, the towering symbol of London's resistance to German bombing. Its bells pealed Sunday across the capital. In brilliant, unusual sunshine, Britons and tourists perspiring in T-shirts and shorts pressed against barriers to watch processions of limousines.

"All the other countries (in Europe) were taken by the Germans," said Paul Hastings, a 12-year-old scout visiting London with his troop from Cornwall in southwest England. "We were pretty lucky ours wasn't."

Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, who led the service at St. Paul's, asked for prayers "for the healing of memories, for those who suffer as a result of war, for communities where past wrongs and violence persist."

Catholic, Greek and Russian Orthodox and Methodist ministers each contributed to a litany of reconciliation.

At the Vatican, Pope John Paul II implored mankind to erase the "culture of war."

"A humane and just society is not built on violence and the force of arms," the pope told tens of thousands of people in St. Peter's Square.

In the eastern Dutch city of Apeldoorn, 200,000 people came out to thank their Canadian, British and American liberators.

Team's success sparks interest

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Two boys proudly wear University of Massachusetts men's basketball shirts at a bowling alley in Haverhill. One boasts the number 21, the other, 15 — the numbers worn by star players Marcus Camby and Lou Roe.

The television clicks on and the face of Coach John Calipari fills the screen with the ESPN logo.

The achievement and enthusiasm of the men's basketball team has spread throughout Massachusetts and beyond, increasing publicity and drawing more visitors to the University.

The team has caught people's eye, according to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson.

"My perception is probably the basketball team has been very helpful with out–of–state applications and even in–state," Robinson said. "The more UMass is in the public eye, with all our sports teams, it will only help us."

By the week of April 14 the number of undergraduate applications had risen 6 percent, and by the first week in May, the count was up to 9 percent, and "changes every day," according to Arlene Cash, director of admissions.

"You have to credit the exposure of men's basketball," said Ric Townes, vice chancellor for campus activities.

"The success has brought us into the national arena which always helps in terms of young people deciding where to go to school," Jo–Anne Vanin, dean of students, said.

In the past, UMass did not have such a great impact on the Eastern part of the state because of its distance from Boston, Townes said.

"Massachusetts is a sports orientated community — the Red Sox, Celtics, Bruins. There is a tradition of following sports," Townes said. "College basketball is one of the bigger sports in America and with its own state University in the limelight, there is extreme benefit in exposure."

"Most of the legislature had a distant view of the University, but the view of the campus has increased," Townes said. "Obviously the visibility to the school that the program brings has a positive effect."

According to James "Bruiser" Flint, assistant men's basketball coach, many legislators attend the games to support their state University.

"Being from Massachusetts, [the games] make them feel like a part of the University, even if they didn't go here," Flint said. "You get a feeling of the atmosphere, you feel really proud about what's going on. Every night [the games] are sold out, it is exciting."

The legislators' view is now closer and different due to the additional publicity of the University in general, Townes said. "Being more informed has an effect on the legislators."

Spotlight on academics

The publicity generated by the team is not always positive, according to Ron Story, vice chancellor for university advancement.

"It's irritating that so much press is given to sports rather than Pulitzer Prize winners and National Book award winners," Story said, "but that's just the way people are. People just tune into sports. To really get them and keep interest, they have to have good academics."

The basketball team only gives people a glimpse of the University, according to Flint.

"We always look at ourselves as the front porch, then you look at the rest of the house, that's the way we see the program," he said.

According to Flint, people then take a closer look at UMass and say, "I didn't know UMass had that program."

It says something about the school when ESPN and CNN flash the UMass logo on the screen, Townes said.

"We have one of the best sociology and sports management departments in the country. We had that before basketball, but now people look," Townes said.

The academic standards, not the athletic programs, are the backbone of the school, Townes said.

"UMass has rigid, high, tough academic standards and a level of excellence that is not going to change because of the basketball team," he said. "Academics is like a rock that can't move."

Minority numbers rising

"Minority applications are up, our whole application pool is up," Cash said. "A trend usually goes across the board. There are increases in all our sub–groups."

From the fall 1985 to fall 1994 the number of ALANA students almost doubled, 7.9 percent to 13.9 percent.

There is a 4 percent increase in transfer applications and ALANA applications have risen 7 percent from last year, according to Vanin. There is a 9 percent increase in African American applications and 17 percent rise for Hispanics, she said.

Native American applications have dropped by 10 percent and Asian applicants numbers remain the same, Vanin said.

"I know that admissions is doing everything they can to broaden the exposure of the University to ALANA students," Townes said. "Some people think that the University is not friendly and hostile, you would think that would drive applications down, but they are up. You wouldn't think they would be up."

Admissions is working on new programs in order to inform ALANA students of what UMass has to offer, Townes said.

"We keep trying different ideas, like outreach, intake, personalization ... looking at the admissions process, to get people to open their eyes," Cash said.

The way things are now, there is room for improvement, she said. "We have to look at changing, we can't keep doing the same thing and expect things to change."

Choosing UMass

A prospective student might see the team and the school on TV, demonstrating the spirit of the University. Because of the team, more people have been given an introduction to the University, according to Cash.

"People took the introduction and got more information which got them to apply," she said. "It's really in their hands. It's our job to make sure we

Second Southwest rape reported to UMass police

For the second time in two weeks, a rape in the Southwest Residential Area has been reported to the University of Massachusetts police department.

This past Saturday at approximately 1:12 p.m., police received a report of an alleged rape. The victim told police the rape happened in the early morning hours of April 5, outside a residence hall in Southwest, police said.

According to police, the victim is an 18–year–old student. The case is under investigation.

On April 21, the UMass police received a report of rape that occurred on April 14 in a Southwest residence hall, police said.

After investigation, police have identified the incident as an acquaintance type rape. UMass detectives are still in communication with the victim, but no charges have been filed, police said.

ARC campaigns against forced dissection

By Roderick Beltran
Collegian Staff

Upon a wall in room 306 of the Student Union hangs a poster with the words "Animals are not ours to eat, wear or experiment on" emblazoned on it.

It is not a simple statement according to the members of the Animal Rights Coalition (ARC), but an ideology they adhere to and one they hope others will adopt.

"Some of the students in my class are taking the biology class as a requirement for the University."

Currently this philosophy is running in conflict with University of Massachusetts policy.

The ARC, an organization which promotes animal rights, is in the process of organizing a campaign against forced dissection in UMass biology department introductory classes, according to Anastasia Ferrante, a freshman animal science major and ARC community outreach director.

They want the rule to be removed from the curriculum starting in the fall, or at least modified.

"Right now there are no alternatives. If you don't cut, you fail the class," said Ferrante.

"Some of the students in my class are taking the biology class as a requirement for the University," she said. "They ask themselves and me why they are doing this. It goes against their principles."

According to Ferrante, other schools in the Five College system, as well as various big name colleges and universities have non–dissection alternative programs.

"Our course book doesn't even address the issue," Ferrante said.

The ARC has met twice with the biology administrative heads since October of 1994, Ferrante said.

"In both of the meetings we discussed our concerns as students and what alternatives there could be," Ferrante said.

"They have recognized that it is something they should be paying attention to but they don't seem motivated to do it or be progressive."

If the biology department does not take the demands seriously, or make any moves to deal with the problem, the ARC is prepared to take legal action, Ferrante said.

Rebirth of a coalition

The ARC engages and approaches its goal of peaceful co– habitation of humans and animals in many different ways. They include setting up informational tables in the Campus Center concourse, at Earth Day and the March Meat Out.

"It's about getting people involved and educating them about the welfare of animals," said Mahri L. Lowinger, a junior Natural Resource major and secretary of the ARC.

The ARC was formed or rather revitalized in the fall of 1993 by Monica Shimamura, ARC president and a sophomore environmental science major.

Coming to school in her freshman year, she said she saw that the organization was defunct due to past internal problems. She decided to restart it and had its first meeting on December 8, 1993.

Since then she has seen the group's membership as well as its organization structure grow, Shimamura said.

"We have 60 people involved now, and this semester we created committee heads who have specific duties," she said

Hoping to help animals

In the future, the ARC will probably be looking at more specific campaigns, rather than spreading itself out in many different directions," Shimamura said.

"We are going to downsize on the number of campaigns," Shimamura said. "We aren't a huge organization that can do 15 things at once — we don't have the human resources to do all that."

According to Lowinger specific plans for the next school year include the continuation of weekly visits to the Greenfield Animal Shelter, where the ARC gives needed physical attention to the animals housed there, and a campaign to change upper level biology classes dissection rules if the current one currently in action succeeds.

The ARC gets money allocated from the Student Government Association and receives funds from private contributions and donations.

For all those interested in joining the ARC the group meets Thursday nights in room 306 of the Student Union and according to Shimamura no one is excluded.

"The motto of the club is that everyone is welcome. Some people have this preconceived notion that you have to be vegetarian or anti–leather. That isn't true," she said. "We just want people who believe in animal rights."

ARC multimedia presentation based on deep ecology ideas

On Wednesday the Animal Rights Coalition (ARC) will be sponsoring a multimedia presentation in Bowker Auditorium based upon deep ecology.

Deep ecology is a philosophy about human relations with the environment, where human beings are only another member of the living world and all species have an equal right to exist, said Monica Shimamura, president of the ARC and a sophomore environmental science major.

The advocates of deep ecology promote activism and believe that the human race has no right to exert a disproportionate impact on the earth, Shimamura said.

The ARC has chosen to focus and promote this event in a celebration of nature and to recognize the worthiness of animals in the biosphere, Mahri L. Lowinger, a junior natural resource major and secretary of the ARC, said.

The show will feature guest lecturers such as Keith Snow, of the environmentsl group Earthlands, who worked as an investigative reporter and photographer documenting an illegal wildlife smuggling operation in Tokyo.

Also featured will be Ed Moret, a local artist whose environmental art work has been featured in local media publications.

Doors open at 7:30 p.m. with a reception to follow after 10:30 p.m. Admission is free for students and two dollars for non–students. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center box office or at the door of Bowker Auditorium.

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Dr. Patricia Crosson, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following list of new members invited from the Junior and Senior classes as well as the Graduate School and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the bylaws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was originally founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was subsequently named The Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional Act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of the University of Maine, the University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letters of the Greek words forming its adopted motto: Philosophia Drateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Mankind."

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a CPA of 3.80 and Seniors a GPA of 3.70. Only two Graduate students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in the University Rhododendron Garden, below the Chancellor's Residence, at 11:00 a.m. on Sunday, May 21, 1995. Initiates are invited to bring family members and friends. (In case of rain the ceremony will be held in Bartlett Auditorium.)

Grad senate winners announced

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate (GSS) has released the results after the first count from last Thursday's election.

According to Andrew Wier, a member of the GSS election committee, the losing candidates have two days to contest the results and ask for a recount, so these are unofficial counts.

On the presidential ballot, Shan Manikkalingam beat incumbent Prasad Venugopal, 477 votes to 213.

Running for vice president on the same ballot as Venugopal, but not an incumbent, Wenping Jin lost to Hari Subramanian, 448 to 242.

Deepika Marya, also on Manikkalingam's ballot, won the treasurer's ticket 464 to 195 over Hussein Ibish, editor of the graduate student's newspaper, The Voice.

Rachel Broudy, siding with Manikkalingam, took the position of executive officer over Mike Tjivikua 507 votes to 178.

Also on the ballot where two questions. The first was a question concerning the support of a $5 waivable fee (a one dollar increase from last year) for the UMass chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG). The question was passed 493 to 188.

The second question asked graduate students if they supported Students Vote, a non–partisan organization that registers UMass students to vote, which also included a $5 waivable fee. The question passed 492 to 159.

Wier said the voting turnout of more than 700 graduate students is almost double from years past.

Speaker urges GLBs to fight for rights

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

In a speech at the 1995 Northampton Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Pride March rally, LBGT rights activist Arline Isaacson urged her audience to remember that "the personal is political."

Isaacson is the chair of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Caucus and a state lobbyist for the Massachusetts Teachers Association.

"Always remember," Isaacson said. "If we don't fight for our rights, who will?

"As long as gays and lesbians are discriminated under the law — and they are — we must be involved in politics," she said. "And as long as homophobes run for public office ... we must be political. And as long as Congress and the state underfund AIDS programs ... we must be political. And as long as our families are not granted the same rights and benefits as straight families, then, damn it all, we're going to be political."

Despite the absence of protestors in front of Northampton Roderick Beltram City Hall for the first time in years, Isaacson warned that forces of the "radical religious right" were organizing to "take their disease of hate and infect all the states of the nation."

Isaacson defined the "radical right," the "religious right," and/or the "Christian right" as individuals and groups working against LBGT and other rights in the name of religion.

"They want to take their narrow and bigoted definition of family and have that rule national politics," she said. "In the meantime, they want to ignore the reality of today's diverse families."

Isaacson spoke out strongly against the way she sees the right dominating national politics.

"Sometimes I think that the radical right folks are upside– down people, because they've got everything in reverse," Isaacson said.

Isaacson charged the right with pushing to "put prayer into the schools and take gay programs out" and "denying the right to choose and granting the corporations the right to pollute."

"That's not just upside–down, that's down–right crazy," Isaacson said.

The reason the right has been so successful is that it is much better organized than the forces that oppose them, the speaker said.

"While the right–wing talk show hosts try to convince us that we shouldn't be voting because there's no point in doing it ... what are they doing?" Isaacson asked. "They're aggressively organizing their own people ... to vote en masse to they can impose their views on us."

In Massachusetts, Isaacson warned, supporters of the right are "organizing state–wide to take [LGBT] rights away and to spread their fear and their misinformation and their hate" through elections, political lobbying, referendum questions and judicial appointments.

However, she noted, there is an ongoing battle to institute domestic partnership benefits on the state–wide level and strengthen hate–crimes legislation to punish homophobic violence.

"We won't rest until every gay–bashing victim is vindicated and every gay–basher is prosecuted for the hate crimes they've committed," Isaacson said.

The speaker denounced Gov. William F. Weld's plan to appoint his "pal" Charles Freed as a member of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. According to Isaacson, Freed is "no friend to women or gays" and has a bad record on employment discrimination issues, AIDS discrimination issues, and abortion.

"We just can't afford to have someone who thinks that way sitting on the highest court in Massachusetts," said Isaacson, who urged those at the rally to call and write Weld and Lieutenant Governor Paul Cellucci and speak against appointing Freed.

Isaacson told those at the rally that the best way to ensure their rights is to "get more involved as citizens" and "pay attention to local and state politics."

"Ironically, the right is on our side," she said.

Campus governments donate food

By Purva Pandey
Collegian Staff

Two segments of the University of Massachusetts residence area government will collaborate to make a donation to a local charity and a UMass snack bar.

Central and Orchard Hill residence area governments will donate leftover food from their annual "Springfest Bowl Day 1995" celebration, which took place on Saturday.

According to McDonald, a donation of food estimated at a value of $500 will go to The Amherst Survival Center and the Greenough Snack Bar, located in Central.

"Overall, the day was great," said Robert McDonald, president of the Central area government. "We received a lot of compliments."

The amount of leftover food was not unplanned, said Dan Larsen, president of the Orchard Hill residence area.

"We felt it was better to overestimate by a little bit than to run out," Larsen said.

"The donation includes hamburgers, hot dogs, veggie burgers and rolls," McDonald said.

The Amherst Survival Center will use the food as part of its community program, according to Vangie Westcott, director of the center.

Westcott calls the center a "self–help agency."

"We give out boxes of emergency food for local families and have daily meals for volunteers and anybody who needs a meal," Westcott said.

The Amherst Survival Center depends heavily on outside donations, Westcott said.

The center was founded in 1975 by Jane Holoppa, a UMass student who was also a welfare mother of five children, Westcott said.

Letter received by Boston scientist reminiscent of Unabomber efforts

BOSTON (AP) — The Unabomber or someone who is trying to imitate his style could be behind a threatening letter received by a Boston-area scientist 10 days ago, a Federal Bureau of Investigation spokesman said Sunday.

The letter, which was addressed to a scientist at New England Biolabs Inc. of Beverly, was written in the style of the Unabomber, who has killed three people and injured 23 others since 1978, the FBI's Peter Ginieres said.

But Ginieres cautioned that tests that could link the letter to the elusive mail-bomber were incomplete.

"It bears some similarities to the Unabomber," Ginieres said. "But at this early stage ... we're not prepared to say that it is, we're not prepared to say that it is not."

The Unabomber usually targets members of the scientific community. But there are reasons to doubt that he was the author of the letter, despite the similarities in style and content, Ginieres said.

The Unabomber has never sent a warning to an intended victim, for one thing. And excerpts from the bomber's letters have been published, for the first time, following his latest attack — an April 24 bombing that killed a Sacramento timber lobbyist. Could the letter have been written by an imitator?

"Copycats? Obviously," Ginieres said. "That's why I've indicated that, while there are similarities, we don't want to say that this is the work of the Unabomber."

UMass signs on with fiberoptic center

■ University chosen over other Massachusetts schools

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

STURBRIDGE — The University of Massachusetts recently agreed to help industry advance into the next century.

On April 26, University President Michael K. Hooker signed an agreement with the Center for Advanced Fiberoptic Applications, a consortium of five Massachusetts fiberoptic firms situated primarily in the Sturbridge area.

The agreement was not only sponsored by Hooker and the various executives of the firms, but by Congressman Richard E. Neal (D–Mass.).

"The University was the right institution to be a party to this agreement because UMass is dedicated to helping improve the state economy," Hooker said.

UMass was chosen over other institutions of higher learning in the state such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology because the University is obligated to keep the technology in the state, said Dr. Lynn Griesemer, deputy director of the Donahue Institute.

The Donahue Institute, an organization within the UMass system, is responsible for promoting economic development throughout the commonwealth.

The agreement is a culmination of a year–long dialogue between the center and the University, said Griesemer.

The companies will benefit by gaining knowledge from ongoing research at the five statewide UMass campuses.

"We see the potential of a very mutual long term relationship which means for faculty research," Griesemer said.

The companies which are members of the consortium are on the forefront of the fiberoptic industry because they are inventing new applications for fiberoptics every day, said Griesemer.

The agreement will speed the process of research, development and application which will allow not only Massachusetts firms to gain an edge over competitors in other states, but give the nation an edge over foreign competition, according to Griesemer.

"Foreign competition makes it mandatory that the government, universities and businesses work together," Hooker said. "We will have to blur the boundaries between government, industry and universities in order to be competitive."

UMass students will benefit through increased job opportunities and internships with member companies of the center.

Fiberoptics is an emerging technology with great potential for growth. Fiberoptics are used in cars, computers and communications equipment.

Fiberoptics, unlike conventional metallic wires which conduct electricity as signals for information on phone lines and in computers, transmits information through glass wires using light.

Fiberoptics are more efficient and faster than conventional metallic wires currently in use.

The pain of recuperation

Henry J. Brier

Never will I forget what happened exactly one year ago today, as I was riding my bike down Orchard Hill.

I will also never be allowed to ignore the repercussions of the collision with a pedestrian that occurred on May 9, 1994. That last time I rode my bike, my dominant wrist was left with four fractures, and, several days later, I had extensive surgery involving three metal pins that were eventually removed.

According to my orthopedic surgeon, "100 percent" recuperation takes up to a year's time. When he was done with his work, he passed me over to an occupational therapist, with whom I worked closely for the remaining months of last summer. The purpose of the therapy was to return my wrist to everyday use.

However, school started in the fall, and my visits with the occupational therapist ended. When the academic year began, I had no choice but to continue working on my own; to me it was imperative, my highest priority.

The barbells and the dumbbells that I have consistently used many a morning during gym classes in Boyden have been productive. The climb back has been strenuous, and I have often been left with a dull soreness in my wrist.

Later on this month is when I am scheduled to be fully recouped. In my best estimation, I would say that I have rebounded to about 85 percent. It does not seem feasible that after such an injury the site can be exactly as it was before.

I often find difficulty in such activities which at one time were routine or second-nature. The only objects I have thrown with my right hand are darts, some light pebbles, and, the other night, a crumpled Dunkin' Donuts bag which landed in the trash barrel. That told me my aim was back on-target.

At one time I played softball, tennis and I enjoyed throwing a Frisbee, along with several other activities; however, the gym is where I find my recreation. While the gym has truly worked wonders for my wrist, last spring a friend gave me a boomerang I have been itching to hurl at an open field on a brilliant blue day.

Jars with tighter lids cannot be opened with my right hand. I played pick-up basketball a few weeks ago, and afterward my wrist was more sore than ever before. Holding hands is painful, especially if mine is swung.

I am no meteorologist, but then again, Bob Dylan once sang: "It don't take a weatherman to know which way the wind blows." I can foretell when it is going to rain, as the dull ache indicates muggy weather is upon us.

Shaking hands often disorients me, because I never know when a power player will tightly grip or vigorously shake my wrist.

Writing and note-taking for long periods of time becomes weary, but oddly enough, this entire ordeal has brought about an interesting point.

Probably the best advice I have ever heard was the words of my dear mother, who once told me that when problems arise, the best way to solve them is to bombard with solutions.

Within an hour of my collision, I began to write with my left hand. I am now ambidextrous, and as a matter of fact, some may argue that writing with my traditionally weaker hand is more legible than my right.

I can read my own writing fine, so this does not worry me. I have often put down my pen during class and begun taking notes with my left hand.

My bike, enjoyable before I went down, has been sold, but not completely paid for, to my sister who keeps assuring her favorite and only brother another "check is in the mail."

And I listen then watch my mailbox, only to realize that I have been duped. Again.

Whenever I see a biker approaching, I have an instinctive tendency to protect my wrist and put it behind my back. Bikes are perilous, to the extent that my injury has turned me away from involvement. I even get the willies when seated behind my mother's exercycle.

So, to all you bikers out there, I hope cautionary measures are observed, and roads are shared with people, some of whom seem to aimlessly sleepwalk and sidewind into nowhere other than oblivion. People are shrewd, but there are some ways of dealing with unpredictable tendencies.

Famed musician Jerry Garcia once sang: "It goes to show you don't ever know. Watch each card you play and play it slow."

Seeing love through parent's eyes

Erin Barnes

Generally speaking, women are so emotional. I get soft- hearted at the credit card commercial about the father paying for his daughter's wedding ceremony; I even cried during St. Elmo's Fire. Most recently, I nearly started sobbing while selecting an anniversary card for my parents. I tell you, those Hallmark people can really pull at my heartstrings.

This coming May 23rd, my parents will celebrate their Silver Anniversary — an event that I am honored to witness, particularly in this day and age where one in two marriages ends in divorce. I look at my parents relationship and feel things that are indescribable. They have the type of timeless relationship that most couples aspire to achieve, and, more specifically, they give me something to look forward to.

The message in the card surprisingly and adequately conveys what my brother and I feel. It describes how an anniversary is "A day to look back over twenty-five years, recalling the good times, the laughter, the tears. The serious moments, the humorous parts, that make up the moments dear to your heart."

I started to think about the good times that we as a family have shared — too many, in fact, to list in one brief column. I do have my favorite memories: the upside-down ducks in our cabin at Yellowstone; my mother standing on fish that she had caught; watching "The Gong Show" and "The Muppet Show" together; Saturdays playing football at Observatory Park; cheeseburgers and fries at the Bonnie Brae; and my father pushing me in my silly hat on our backyard swingset.

My family has had its share of serious moments as well, for no family is without them. Together, we have managed to turn these events into positive milestones, learn from our mistakes, and acknowledge when we hurt one another's feelings. At times, this was difficult, especially when my brother and I reached that point where we thought we knew everything. I often wonder if my parents think he and I are still embedded in that stage.

As our family has matured, we have learned to disagree with one another without being too disagreeable. At times, I admit I was angry with my father for encouraging me to shoot free throws and layups at all hours of the day. Although, in six years, he attended all but one of my basketball games, and his presence was sure missed that evening. Similarly, my mother kept after me about my college applications, and, they were all completed by Halloween of my senior year.

Thankfully, my brother and I were lucky enough to have childhoods filled with happiness, healthfulness and fun. My parents successfully exposed us to diverse cultures and activities, and encouraged us to embrace different groups throughout our lifetimes.

Most importantly, my brother and I benefit from witnessing our parents together. The kissing and tickling that once embarrassed me now brings a smile to my face. I would much rather have my parents engage in acts of affection than be almost bored by one another. I have had friends whose parents have separated or divorced, and my parents have seen their friends do the same. Ultimately, this makes me appreciate their relationship even more. I love that they do a great deal together, although each of them are independently strong enough to stand on their own two feet.

This is an important time for me and my family. There is an urgency for us young adults to witness such strong love and caring, particularly when it seems as if the world's social fabric is quickly fading away. We can gain wisdom in our youth by observing relationships within our own families.

Of course, the last place most college students would think to look for answers to love's mysteries is their parents. This is not such a radical notion. I only hope that when I reach my Silver Anniversary that I am as happy, solid and carefree as my parents. As the Hallmark card continues to note, their anniversary "is a day to look forward with deep joy and pride, and faith that the future is sure to provide. A life of fulfillment, of warmth, love and care, throughout all the bright golden years they will share."

Doesn't that just bring a tear to your eye, or is it just me?

SGA unfairly cuts UPC budget

To the editor:

On May 3, the student senate met to vote on the budgets of student groups for the next fiscal year. In that meeting, our new trustee's qualities were revealed. We learned how he makes decisions, how he handles pressure, how he values student organizations, and how much he is interested in representing the whole student body. This was learned through an irresponsible act in which I cannot find any reason.

Trustee-elect Dan Rivera made a motion to arbitrarily cut $10,000 from University Productions and Concerts budget. Five thousand was to be transferred to help fund four respectable cultural groups and $5,000 was needed to pay a few groups with strong representation in senate to pass the motion.

"It was our fault to let that scum into the senate anyway," so now we had to pay them off to pass the motion, he explained to me after the motion was passed.

University Productions and Concerts (UPC) was accused of suffering too many losses, poor management, lack of coordination, and the unwillingness to work with ALANA groups. UPC was caught by surprise and was not given proper time to address these issues. Most of these accusations came after their debate time was over. There was already a recommended $5,000 cut from the Ways & Means Committee reflecting on any dissatisfaction with UPC. Voting for Rivera's motion tripled that cut to a $15,000 loss in operational expenses that UPC cannot absorb.

Dan Rivera based his motion on the personal squabble some of his friends have with UPC, not on any special knowledge about the group or what that sizeable cut means to its existence. When I asked him why he chose those numbers in particular he said, "I don't know, I just needed the numbers to add up. Some people came up to me saying they wanted more money so I did it. I only had a few seconds to think about it."

Only a few seconds of thought were enough to make the decision to move to ensure the discontinuation of Spring Concerts and affordable concert tickets in UMass. A few strong words from friends were satisfactory to lead the whole senate with misinformation. Rivera never addressed his problems to UPC and he does not have any clue as to how the organization runs. A one-sided story is sufficiently reliable for Rivera to make a motion to disable a student organization.

The RSOs that Dan Rivera was helping: AHORA, Concepto Latino, Casa Dominicana and Haitian Student Association, are well deserving of this funding. I'm happy they received this money but I'm repulsed by the $5,000 payoff that was not asked for. A deal was never made with groups which were paid, and $5,000 was quite a price! With a little bit more thought, Rivera could have seen that the extra funding could have come from elsewhere in the budget so one group would not have to carry such an excessive burden.

I'm not uncomfortable or unfamiliar with striking a deal for support, but never would I imagine that this would be on the tab of the functioning, and possibly the existence, of another student group. Furthermore, the importance of UPC in UMass was never taken into consideration.

Ex-Chair of the Ways & Means Committee

Open House a campus success

To the editor:

Every Friday during the months of March and April many students found themselves waiting in longer lines at the dining halls or have been delayed in their routine by the seemingly endless number of campus visitors. These guests were here to become acquainted with the campus and its facilities through one of our Spring Open House Programs. Over the course of these two months more than 2,200 prospective students and their parents came to see what UMass is all about.

This year's programs were an unprecedented success due in large part to you, the campus community. Your patience, kind words and positive contributions were apparent in the responses we received from both parents and students. The outcome of all this hard work is a freshman class qualified in academics and diversity. As you know our community here is one of the strengths of UMass. You are the people who make our job easier.

That is why we in the Admissions Office wish to thank you for your cooperation not only during the past two months but throughout the year.

A special thanks to the residents of Knowlton who on a daily basis endure tours through their building. We appreciate your patience in such a vital part of our work and look forward to working with you again!

Printing strengthens voices of hate

To the editor:

I would like to respond, like many others, to the openly anti-Semitic letter that was printed on May 2. I do not want to take up a debate regarding the validity of the letter.

There will probably be many others doing that. I want to focus on the poor judgement I believe was exercised by the Collegian in printing the article.

I fully understand that overall, the Collegian staff felt offended by the letter, but decided to print it to raise awareness of bigotry that exists here. I appreciate this sentiment, but I think it ignores several very real considerations.

1. Printing an opinion gives it more power, whether it is true or not. Many people will read the article, and will be swayed much more than if they heard the same ideas in conversation. Hence, you have become responsible for strengthening the voice of bigotry and prejudice in the UMass community.

2. You give the impression of sympathizing with the letter simply by printing it. Objectivity of the press is fine as a theoretical stance, but the great majority of readers are not mindful of these distinctions. You are sending out a strong signal, intentionally or not, that UMass' main newspaper is anti-Semitic.

3. Finally, the decisions the Collegian staff makes must be considered in context. We are going through a period in which a lot of negative sentiments have been directed against the Jewish community in the campus press. This includes articles that have appeared in The Graduate Student Voice, as well as articles in your own Multicultural Affairs page. The timing for printing this letter could not be worse. In the present situation, Jewish students will inevitably experience it as a generalized community expression of anti-Semitism.

In conclusion, I call upon the Collegian staff to think more carefully about the real impact they will have on people through what they print. It is not enough simply to formulate your stance in an abstract vacuum. You have a powerful influence on the UMass community, and you have the responsibility not to use it destructively.

David Cashdan

Anti–Semitism spans spectrum

To the editor:

Professor Helen Cullen's ignorant diatribe of a letter is symptomatic of a much larger problem: anti-Semitism in the radical left. This problem is not new to the campus.

Publications such as The Voice regularly feature thinly veiled anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist propaganda, and the past two years have seen not one, but two left-wing inflammatory anti-Jewish speakers at UMass, Louis Farrakhan and Tony Martin (both who were brought to the campus using student funds).

The administration has so far shown no real eagerness to address this type of bigotry for what it is, instead citing the need for "healing" and "further discussion." In a wishy-washy letter to the editor in Wednesdays' Collegian, Chancellor Scott refers to having appointed a new coordinator for Jewish affairs for UMass, and speaks of "the need to continue conversations" in order to "learn about each other."

While Scott is to be commended for appointing a coordinator for Jewish affairs, this does not excuse him from his responsibility to deal with the issue at hand. The time for discussion is over.

Anti–Semites of all political stripes must learn that their views will not be tolerated. Professor Cullen must be dismissed from the University. No other action will suffice.

¿Es Puerto Rico un País Latinoamericano?

Charles Venator Santiago

En una discusión reciente que tuve con el Coordinador del Centro Cultural Latinoamericano (CCL), este me mencionó que el Centro Cultural, en conjunto con La Junta, el grupo de estudiantes subgraduados y representativo de las diversas organizaciones subgraduadas estudiatiles latinas en la Universidad, habían llegado a un acuerdo sobre la constituencia del Congreso Latinoamericano que se encargara de supervisar las actividades del Centro Cultural comenzado el semistre entrante. Este Congreso, compuesto de "un representante de cada país latinoamericano" (Art.III, Sec. 1, A) será responsable de 1) aprobar el presupuesto semestral del CCL; 2) aprobar el plan de trabajo del CCL; 3) supervisar y aprobar los resultados de las decciones para puestos oficiales; 4) velar por el buen funcionamiento del centro; y 5) crear comites y una estructura interna para llevar acabo sus funciones (Art. III, Sec. 1, B). De esta manera, se garantizará que el CCL este bien supervisado, se lleven a cabo más actividades, que las actividades estudiantiles que el CCL produzca, tomen en consideración la diversidad del estudiantado Latinoamericano.

Lo irónico de este Congreso es que encabezando la lista de miembros se encuentra el "país" de Puerto Rico. Más problemático aun, es que el Coordinador actual, y uno de los arquitectos de dicho decreto, el futuro Licenciado, Diego Figueroa, a articulado una posición defendiendo la membresía de Puerto Rico en dicho Congreso, desde una perspectiva autonomista, y con el argumento de que si no se incluye a Puerto Rico la organización de Boricuas Unidos será excluida de dicho club. Estos argumentos traen al relieve dos contradiciones, que a mi entender, son ignoradas por muchos Porto Ricans aquí en las fauces del gran Ogro Del Norte.

En primera instancia, el discurso oficial de los Porto Ricans, es que nuestra gente, desde que migraron de las montañas de la isla a las bodegas de Nueva York, han sido sujetas a condiciones de exclusión y opresión. Sin duda alguna los puertorriqueños, como comunidad, han sido sujetos a una marginalización social, política y económica en esta tierra. Como resultado, las resistencias, han tomado otro curso, el Porto Rican radical, como todas las llamadas minorías étnicas y raciales de esta nación, busca más derechos civiles, sociales, políticos, económicos, y en cierta manera académicos. Estas son realidades de nuestros pueblos en territorios extranjeros. El problema entre de paso, las ideologías radicales de por sí continúan perpetuando las mismas estructuras sociales y políticas que justifican la opresión de los pértor-riqueños, y demas latinoamericanos que residen fuera del gran estilo del Norte. En efecto estas ideologías, son las que en cierta manera justifican que Puerto Rico se convierta en un miembro oficial de la unión ahora.

Por otro lado tenemos la ideología oficial de los Populares boricuas, que originalmente propusieron la posibilidad de pan, tierra, y libetad, que sostiene que el estatus de la isla constituye una opción política aceptable y en cierta manera superior a la de un país. Estos, esbirros coloniales, que han utilizado una tradición de hostigamiento, persecusión, carpetas, y asesinato, defienden que la situación en la que sencuentra Puerto Rico en estos momemntos, le da un poder de tener acceso a lo mejor de ambos mundos. Se amparan en un reconocimiento, internacional, que reconoce el sitema de gobierno de Puerto Rico como un sistema autónomo. El problema radica que estos ignoran la realidad de que le poder supremeo, bajo esta constitucion, no radica en el gobierno de la isla, sino en multiples instituciones extranjeras, que historicamente han tomado decisiones ignorando las necesidades de la isla y de su gente. En fin este es un discurso que mantiene el estatus quo.

Tomando esto en consideración, estos dos campos ideológicos, proponen que a Puerto Rico se le haga miembro, simbólico obvbiamente, de un Congreso que presumidamente represeta las realidades latinoamericanas. Estas son perspectivas arrogantes eignorantes. Estas dos gangas lo que hacen es ignorar la posibilidad de ser puertorriqueño con Puerto Rico. Para ellos, su identidad nacional,no esta vinculada a la posibilidad de un espacio territorial. Puerto Rico, se le llama país, por una definición cultural que ironicamente existe en cierta resistencia social al imperio Yanqui, pero que no intenta cuestionar la identidad política de la comunidad. Los Porto Ricans, Boricuas y vendios, ignoran su relación al resto de America latina, fuera de las fronteras ideológicas de Disneylandia.

¿Es la inclusión de Puerto Rico, en el Congreso latinoamericano de la Universidad de Massachusetts en Amherst,un acto de solidaridad con la posibilidad de que Puerto Rico sea país? De acuerdo a Diego Figuero, NO. De acuerdo a los Boricua, realmente no sé. Me sospecho que la identidad de muchos Porto Ricans no esta sujeta a la posibilidad de una la independiente, sino a las necesidades de un pueblo que existe a los márgenes de otra sociedad.

Enán creo que es hipócrita incluir a Puelo Rico como un miembro de un Congreso que se identifica con el resto de Latinoamerica, fuera de las verjas gringas, pero que reusa defender la posibilidad de que la isla de Puero Rico se convierta en un miembro político de dicha communidad. Más irónico aún es desarrollar un cuerpo político, como lo es el Congreso, y privilegiar la identidad cultural de una colonia eschyendo su realidad política, social y económica. En otras palabras, gente, lo político no se puede devincular de lo cultural y social, ya que la mera identificación de diversidad y diferencia, en el plano público, es un acto político. No olvidemos que nuestra presencia, e identificación con una cultura diferente y arraigada a un territorio, no justifica una enajenación de nuestros lazos con el resto de las comunidades y personas latinoamericanas, fuera de dicho territorio!

Searching for a new outcome: Un-Asians!

Cultural ignorance bulks Asians as one

Zaw Min Oo

How can one identify with others from a region that stretches from Turkey to Japan and from Russia to Papua, New Guinea? It is understandable that the purpose for the term "Asia" represents a vast continent and "Asian" refers to the inhabitants of the Asia continent. However, these terms may as well be considered obsolete today if there needs to be justice done for the sake of political correctness.

When "Asian" is mentioned, people associate toward East Asians, leaving behind the races from the former Eastern Soviet republics, the western pacific nations, the Middle East, and the sub-continent. A misled kind of representation like this denies people of being considered what they truly are: Asian.

Think for a moment and imagine thousands of years of rich culture being stripped by the prestige that the name entitles. Indians are Asians, Turkmenistanians are Asian, and many more along with their rich cultures contribute to being Asian so there is no point in identifying "Asian" by recognizing a few nations only.

The changing force behind the misrepresentation of a Asian is the growing popularity of a few specific cultures. China and Japan namely are a large influence around the world and often overshadow the entire continent in all aspects, omitting the other races.

The media utilizes the term Asian to describe these two countries with the subject of economics, hyping up United States vs. Japan trade wars and intellectual property rights along with the most favored nation policy toward China. Lifestyle-wise, Chinese food is a popular outlet and Japanese food is gaining a lot of recognition. Chinese art is appreciated for its long tradition and Japanese art is infamous for its pastoral likeness.

With the advent of China and Japan's popularity, people begin to stereotype Asians as either Chinese or Japanese. This stereotype rots the integrity of other cultures in the Asian continent who are forced either to be called Asian. Then what does one whose decent is from the continent label oneself when one is not considered Asian any longer? The question lingers unanswered in the minds of one-fourth the world's population forgotten to be called Asian but living in the Asian continent.

Undoubtedly, the term "Asian" has outlived its usefulness. It was once a word of respect for a continent and now it ends up to be a name assigned to a certain part of the diverse continent. Confucius, Lao-Tze, Mao-Tse Tung, Ho Chihto made Asia popular, but have we forgotten about Mahatma Gandhi, Lew Kuan Yu, Siddharta Guatama, Suharto and a myriad of others who have made their voices heard from the other side of the Asian continent?

Political correctness in the future may end up breaking apart Asians. There may then be no more models to emulate from Malaysia; a successful country in creating a unison among the diverse immigrant populations from the Middle- east, India and China.

Cultures today are becoming so protective that people search for identity. Asian is too vast a word but it still may not even cover the vastness of the continent.

Only large borders bind Asia these days; albeit gigantic trade groups within Asia separate rather than combine cultures. Is there any reason to continue to be grouped by the same name? It is not worth the pride for a person from any unrecognized Asian state to label oneself as Asian when no one else will view the way you should be viewed.

For identity purposes Asian is no manifest of the many colors that comprise the continent and is an unfair label to group such large differences. If cultures want their identity, Asia must be peeled apart to its most fragmented states and new identities firmly set in place to recognize everyone. The process is slowly happening in many parts of the continent, searching to open their cultures. In the end, the outcome will be a giant brew of nationalities creating a new generation of individuals who will be "Un-Asian."

¿Adónde está Ratón Pérez?

Está en la olla o hay una conspiración

Dominique Ratton Pérez, personificación del gran Ratón Pérez.

"El Ratón Pérez se cayó en la olla y la hormiguita lo llora y lo llora."
— Cuento para niños.

Sentada en la orilla de una gigantesca olla de hierro, María de Alarcón mira perpleja el dulce de caña hirviente. Unas horas antes, en la pequeña escuela del pueblo, leyó por primera vez la tradicional historia del Ratón Pérez.

"Papá, se habrá muerto el Ratón Pérez?," pregunta tranquila mientras Don Emilio mueve el dulce con una cuchara de cedro español.

"Se cayó en el arroz con leche hirviente pero la historia no dice si se murió o no . . ." agrega María melancólica.

"A quien le importa, si se murió se murió o no, da igual!" responde Don Emilio exasperado entre los vapores del dulce y el humo de la leña.

A Soledad de Cabello Oscuro le importa, y mucho. Desde hace 37 años Don Soledad busca apasionadamente el destino del Ratón Pérez desde su pequeña casa en Barbacoas, un pequeño pueblo rural en las montañas que rodean el Valle Central de San José de Costa Rica.

"Para mantener nuestra cultura viva, necesitamos hacernos muchas preguntas y el paradero de Ratón Pérez es una de ellas."

La Historia de Ratón Pérez

Inicialmente la historia de Ratón Pérez y la Hormiguita fue pasada de generación en generación gracias al esfuerzo del muy comun "abuelo cuentacuentos." Sin embargo, el cuento forma ahora parte del libro Paco y Lola. Este libro, dedicado a la enseñanza de niños que aprenden a leer, avanza gradualmente en la dificultad de su contenido.

En las primeras páginas se lee "Mamá amasa la masa" y "Papá lee el periódico." El grado de dificultad crece hasta culminar con El Ratón Pérez y la Hormiguita, lo cual significa que esta historia es para la gran mayoría de los niños, la primera historia que leen en todo sus vidas, y como tal tiene gran impacto en los infantes.

La historia cuenta como la Hormiguita despues de encontrarse una moneda de 5 céntimos al barrer, decide comprarse un vestido y un lazo para comenzar la búsqueda de un esposo. La Hormiguita rechaza las proposiciones de un buey, un perro, y otros animales, pero decide aceptar la del Ratón Pérez.

Cuando llega el Domingo, la Hormiguita decide ir a misa y deja al Ratón Pérez en la casa moviendo el arroz con leche no sin antes advertirle que debe moverlo con la cuchara grande y no la pequeñita. El Ratón Pérez desobedece: se acerca cada vez mas a la olla del aromático arroz con leche hasta finalmente caerse.

La Hormiguita regresa de misa y al encontrarse con tal escena se pone muy triste. A partir de este momento el rumor recorre por toda la sociedad, y cada miembro decide sacrificar algo querido en gesto de solidaridad con la Hormiguita. El pájaro por ejemplo se corta el piquito; el palomar por otra parte decide derrumbarse.

La muerte: una conspiración?

Una guerra ha explotado entre los que creen que el Ratón Pérez esta vivo y aquellos que dicen que pasó al más allá. El paradero del Ratón Pérez ha creado más controversia que lo que en su tiempo crearon Elvis Presley, John F. Kennedy, o el Ché Guevara.

"No puede estar muerto, yo no lo puedo aceptar," dice Don Soledad. Para sustentar sus afirmaciones Don Soledad de Cabello Oscuro señala como a través de la historia hay partes oscuras que no aclaran en nada la supuesta muerte de Ratón Pérez.

"Porque la Hormiguita no se casó con el buey? Porque escogió a Ratón Pérez? Porque lo dejó en la casa moviendo el arroz? Porque Ratón Pérez no fue a misa? Porque la historia no aclara si murió y si en realidad murió porque no lo enterraron? Hay muchas preguntas sin contestar."

Don Soledad está seguro que hay una conspiración entre los que escribieron la historia en el libro Paco y Lola para matar a Ratón Pérez. "Si Ratón Pérez se muere no se pueden escribir más historias sobre el asunto. Quieren tener un monopolio sobre uno de los cuentos mas importantes de nuestra cultura," agrega Don Soledad malhumorado. "No hay duda que existe una conspiración para acabar con Ratón Pérez!"

Asisimismo hay otros que afirman que la conspiración es la del señor de Cabello Oscuro para obtener publicidad y escribir su propia versión de Ratón Pérez y la Hormiguita.

"Ratón Pérez se cayó en la olla y punto final," dice Josimar Jaleos, representante de la Asociación de Desarrollo Comunal de Barbacoas. Asociandose una lógica a su afirmación agrega "Eso le pasa por curioso . . . si le hubiera hecho caso a la Hormiguita estaría comiendo arroz con leche frío — como debe ser — sentadote en la sala de la casa."

Los niños no parecen muy interesados en el debate y la controversia relacionados con el famoso cuento pero muchos de ellos admiten que les gustaría saber que le pasó al Ratón Pérez.

"Yo no sé si se murió de verdad porque muchos dicen que puede que lo regresen a la vida con ayuda de una nueva tecnología," dice William Guillermo, un niño de 8 años, vecino de la comunidad aledaña de La Legua.

Otros niños expresan su enojo ante lo que ellos creen son un montón de adultos metiéndose en un asunto de niños.

Guillén un niño de 10 años en el precursor de una campaña para reescribir el cuento de Ratón Pérez y la Hormiguita. Sin embargo esta vez el futuro de Ratón Pérez sera decidido por niños y no adultos.

"No tienen suficientes problemas con guerras y política. Siempre quieren más . . . ahora quieren hasta meterse con los cuentos de nosotros," dice en un discurso propagandístico en frente de 13 fieles seguidores.

El señor de Cabello Oscuro no parece molestarse con esta proposición y agrega que "si ellos no hubieran comenzado con esas mentiras nunca habríamos llegado a esto." Muy confiado Don Soledad dice que el sabe que "los niños saben muy bien que Ratón Pérez está vivo. Nadie lo quiere muerto.

La familia Ratton Pérez

En lo que parecía ser una batalla sin fin, existe finalmente una personificación de la importante historia: la familia Ratton Pérez. Producto del matrimonio de Don Jean-Pierre Ratton y de Dona Virginia Pérez, la familia Ratton Pérez parece ser la única respuesta entre un enigma que crece cada día.

"El Ratón Pérez sobrevivió porque es Super Ratón," dice Camille la hija menor puntualizando que Ratón Pérez "es lo mas lindo del mundo."

Refiriéndose a los creadores de Paco y Lola y las razones por las cuales Ratón Pérez se muere, Camille no escatima palabras: "Son unos asesinos en ese cuento!"

Aún así pareciera que hasta dentro de la familia Ratton Pérez hay opiniones divididas sobre el destino de Ratón Pérez. "Se murió, nadie lo tiene de goloso," susurra con una sonrisa Dominique, la hija mayor.

La familia es blanco de constantes de todo tipo sobre la combinación que trajo a la vida nuevamente a Rat(t)ón Pérez. "No hay nadie que no tenga que ver con el nombre pero a mi la verdad me gusta." Dominique adora mientras acaricia a su gato Africo.

Don Soledad de Cabello Oscuro planea llegar a conocer a la familia Ratton Pérez y especialmente a las dos hijas que son la personificación misma del personaje.

"Despues de tantos años hemos logrado un descubrimiento sin precedentes que pondrá por el suelo a los conspiradores que quieren asesinar al Ratón," Don Soledad explica con elocuencia. Al explicarle que la entre el famoso personaje y la familia existe una T de diferencia, Don Soledad rapidamente encuentra una respuesta: "ese T se la agregaron los franceses por eso de la pronunciación pero le traducción al español es con solo una T, o sea, igual que Ratón Pérez."

Sin embargo la controversia continua, aun dentro de la familia Ratton Pérez, y ningún lado parece dar tregua.

Aun así, Don Soledad ha creado un debate de algo que parecía perdido y le ha dado esperanzas de vida a un Ratón Pérez que se creía muerto entre los muertos. Camille una de las hijas podría convertirse en su Aa de espadas en su lucha para rescatar a Ratón Pérez. Racionalizando sobre el futuro Camille es muy clara: "Si se hubiera muerto, nosotros no estaríamos aquí!"

Triple bill pleases AC crowd

SMALL FACTORY
Campus Center Frontroom
Amherst College
May 7

Saturday night at Amherst College, Small Factory, along with Northampton upstarts Tizzy and the Amherst–based quintet Waif proved once again that the formula-ridden rock that has flooded the Valley the past few years is not the only game in town.

On one of the last few dates of their For If You Cannot Fly tour, Small Factory played for an hour in the intimate Campus Center Frontroom (possibly the best place in the Valley for a show), pulling most selections in the first half hour from their latest album. Toward the last half of their set, however, the band threw in some tunes from their debut album I Do Not Love You, and from some of their more limited release work.

Throughout the show, Dave Auchenbach's powerful yet jangly guitar and Alex Kemp's driving bass lines only served to enhance the inherently poppy but often intense songs that the band has continuously released in the past.

The mood was nothing if not jovial from the moment the Providence–based trio took the stage, joking with the audience, reading the fortunes from their Chinese food dinner and pulling an audience member up on stage to help sing the last song "Junkie's Prayer." The song exploded into an overwhelming wall of sound with Kemp screaming at the highest volume he could possibly muster, but looking like he wished it could be louder.

Some other highlights included their contribution to the Why Do You Think They Call It Pop? Pop Narcotic compilation, "Yeah," "Pretending It's Sunny," from I Do Not Love You and a cover of the Lois song, "Valentine," also on the same album.

Preceding Small Factory was the Northampton trio Tizzy, who proved just exactly why their first single spent several weeks on the Main St. Records local sales list with a set just as long but twice as blistering as Small Factory's.

Guitarist Joel Boultinghouse, drummer Teri Morris and lead singer/bassist Jen Gallahorn delivered about an hour of driving rock that could be described as analogous to a freight train screaming right at you. And then, just before it hits you head on, it stops, leaving you short of breath.

Songs like "Shopping Cart Joyride," "D is For Daddy" and the a–side from their 7" debut on Chunk Records, "New Jersey" kept the audience moving and will no doubt keep many fans anxiously awaiting their next single.

G. Love puts a groove into Pearl St.

G. LOVE AND SPECIAL SAUCE
Pearl Street
May 4

As they did last semester, G. Love and Special Sauce brought their blues style of hip–hop back to Pearl Street last Thursday night.

Pleasing the crowd at Pearl Street is a difficult task to accomplish, but the band was up to the challenge.

Playing with tons of soul, a free state of mind and a funkiness dictated by the blues, the Sauce picked up the audience with their upbeat show.

G. Love and Special Sauce consists of G. Love on guitar, harmonica and lead vocals, Jimmy Prescott on smooth string bass and Thunder House Clemens on drums. The music that they play is not technically difficult, but to pulling it off live is a tough feat. Relying heavily on the flow of the crowd, the band concentrates on making the audience move.

Their style of music cannot be pinned down into one category. Instead, the band blends roots of Delta blues and Philadelphia hip–hop along with their own cold glass of lemonade. At times the band would go off and jam with G. Love's lead and at other times they simply kept the rhythm while G. Love commanded the microphone. Either way, the sound created was cool and the beat funky.

Of course, the main reason why all had congregated was to witness G. Love. A very unique fellow, Love had a very likeable and poised stage presence which could be considered reminiscent of Elvis Presley.

With his long, wavy hair, sideburns and wide open collar, Love never missed a beat while pouring out his flow. His style was his own. He sort of rapped, but there was a little bit of singing mixed in also. When it was time for a solo, Love let loose, putting all funk and soul into it. On stage he happily jammed, adding a harmonica solo every song or two.

Overall, the show was entertaining. The crowd seemed very carefree. They danced to every song slowing down on when the groove became subdued and speeding up when the tempo changed.

The band stuck with that has made them successful thus far. Highlights of the show included the popular favorite "Cold Beverage" and a couple of new songs from their upcoming album. These new songs seemed to be just as solid as the ones on the first album and more upbeat. In the future, expect more of the same and a twist of lemon from G. Love.

Local artist debuts paintings in first show

Canvas, wood provide surfaces for exotic paintings at Durfee

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

When you first look at the 25 year–old artist's work a few descriptive adjectives come to mind: raw, simplified and primitive. Words that some people told the painting major were dangerous and not really a compliment.

Alex Magay didn't mind, and in fact took them as just the opposite.

"When my professor told me that those words were dangerous and not really a compliment, I didn't mind," said Magay. "I like to break things down in my drawings. I exaggerate features and do things that interest me."

Bare bones foundations, essence and raw qualities are things that attract Magay to his subjects. These are the things that caught viewers' eyes at his first show last weekend in the Durfee Conservatory.

"I don't really relate to any sort of style," said Magay. "I can appreciate all sorts of styles, but I don't really identify with one specifically."

The artist, who transferred to the University of Massachusetts after getting his associate in arts at Wachusett Community College, first became interested in painting when he met a group of Jamaican migrant workers in an apple orchard near his house in Sterling.

"It's really hard to find people to sit for you. I asked my brother once and after a few minutes he'd just get up and walk away. So about five years ago I met a group of migrant workers and for a few beers and a lift somewhere they would pose for me," said Magay.

Magay was later invited to Jamaica and stayed for a month drawing and painting. He also spent a year in the Caribbean soaking up the culture and finding subjects for his drawings.

"I've been drawing since I was a child. When I was a kid my parents never let me have any coloring books like the rest of my friends," said Magay laughing. "They'd give me a blank piece of paper and I'd have to draw my own lines."

The soon to be graduate didn't get serious about his art until 18 or 19. His mother went to art school and his father is an artist, but not a professional one, according to Magay.

"When I was little they used to take me to art museums all the time and I hated it," said Magay. "I would hide underneath the benches and crawl out when they said it was time to go."

Magay exhibited a few of his works in Gardner, and says he really doesn't have any sort of focus.

"I do a lot of drawings on campus. I like to emphasize lines and do mainly acrylic and graphite on gesso canvas," he said. "I do a lot on wood as well, but work mostly with

This weekend, UMass was a carnival for many local youngsters. Children from local shelters descended upon the campus, ready to enjoy face painters, pie throws, dunking booths, "moon walking" and other festivities.

The children, from Main Street Shelter, Brodrick Shelter, Jessie's House and the Amherst Survival Center, also indulged in traditional carnival fare, such as cotton candy, popcorn and candied apples.

The event was put on by the Volunteers Initiative Blending Education and Service (VIBES), a volunteer program in the School of Management. They were supported with free toys from Milton Bradley and free ice cream from Friendly's.

The carnival was also helped out by the volunteer services of the UMass football team, several sororities and fraternities and the Accounting Association.

Families don't trust state judgment

By Connie Cass
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In Congress, debate over the future of welfare and other programs for the poor is framed in bloodless abstractions. Block grants vs. entitlements. Federal power vs. state freedom.

But across the country, the hopes and fears pinned to the Republican welfare reform bill are as tangible as tears. Just ask state and local workers who feel they are toiling under the yoke of federal regulations.

Linda Williams is one. In Arizona, she helps poor single mothers qualify for low-cost child care while they work or go to school — in other words, to reach for the elusive goal of getting off welfare.

Williams knows what they are facing. Years ago, divorced, she nervously left her own preschool daughters home alone while she worked.

Now as a state employee in Phoenix, Williams often finds herself hamstrung by state and federal regulations. It breaks her heart to tell a former welfare mother, struggling in a low-wage job, that her subsidized child care is about to be cut off under federal rules.

"We sit there, and they cry," she said. "Sometimes I cry with them."

Williams thinks Arizona could help more low-income mothers if the federal rules and paperwork went away — as long as federal money keeps coming to Arizona. In other words, if Congress shifts welfare to the states as block grants.

The House has already passed legislation to do that, and it's now in the hands of the Senate.

If the measure becomes law, the U.S. government will turn the responsibility of caring for poor women and children over to the states.

Although the House bill imposes some controversial new rules — such as no cash welfare for teen-age mothers — the states get unprecedented freedom to decide how to help the needy.

And that frightens people who don't trust the states to do the job alone.

Among the latter is Elaine Blanton of Phoenix. After less than a year on welfare, Blanton took a $6-an-hour job in a nursing home, thanks in part to federal child care assistance.

have a good match. We want students to have a good match, personally and culturally."

Incoming first year student Kristin Bolow of Belchertown said she chose UMass because of the friendly environment, location and great academic options.

The basketball team brought more attention to the school and her family wanted her to attend UMass because the University was becoming more well known, she said.

"The team made you feel better that you are going to a school that is well known because it has more school spirit," Bolow said. "It makes UMass have a better atmosphere, it's more united."

Jaimye Krol of Easthampton said the team had "zero" influence on her decision. She chose UMass "because it is close, has so many options, and is affordable."

However, according to UMass tour guide Kristen Moriarty, many students and parents ask about the team during her tours.

"People ask about going to games, and if students can get tickets," Moriarty said. "A lot of times Lou Roe or Derek Kellogg will walk by when I'm doing a tour. It puts things into perspective. [The players] go to class and take exams. They are students just like us."

Someone might say that they heard about the University's great sports management program at UMass, because they heard Dick Vitale talk about it on ESPN, Townes said.

"I think when each individual sits down and tries to make a decision about where to go to school, they make the decision based on the academic programs they want to study and the ability to pay. The difference is we are on the list and we stay on the short list longer," he said.

Tour guide Jeff Chapdelaine said questions that reflect the basketball team are asked because students are enthusiastic about coming to a school that has a great athletic department and basketball team.

"Students see the team as a great feature of a great University," he said.

SAT scores

Some studies have claimed SATs are culturally biased and other studies report the opposite, Cash said. President Michael K. Hooker's quest to raise the average SAT score of the student body is taken into consideration when reviewing applicants.

"The President's office wants us to use SAT scores ... We look at the whole nine yards," the director said. "It is really all over the board. It is not fair to measure our student body by numbers. There are a lot of other factors in the folder. Ability to access opportunities, motivation, ... diverse economic backgrounds. We do a disservice when we measure quality by SATs."

There are 17,000 applications and each one has a different criteria, she said.

There may be a student who had a two hour bus ride to school each day, and her grades suffered. This is a factor Admissions would regard when making a decision, Cash said.

"We look at the special case. Primarily we look at what kinds of classes a student is taking, their grades and their ranking. We also canvas."

The opening of his exhibit included food and live music provided by Mentos, a steel drum player. According to Magay, the turn out was positive.

"Mentos was singing to people and there was good food which helped," said Magay. "There were a couple of other artists there as well. Ivan Tristan, son of the director [of Durfee Conservatory] did a few abstract pieces and there was also a ceramicist who did masks."

Out of all his paintings nestled between the green foliage of the conservatory, Magay pointed to "The Domino Game" as his favorite.

"The Domino Game" is my favorite piece. It's kind of what I started with, the guys in the orchard. It's like my life coming full circle," said the artist pointing to his work. Another painting that Magay pointed out was that of a Japanese woman standing by a river in full traditional court dress.

"This painting I did after the Japanese style which kind of contradicts what I said about styles earlier. But it's dedicated to Harunbu, a Japanese artist. I worked on line qualities and similarities of falling out the picture plane," he said.

"The Spanish Café" was another one of Magay's favorites and surprisingly enough almost never got shown.

"When I started drawing I chose very sour florescent colors and I was really excited. But when I finished I hated it and sort of flung it to the back of my studio for a few weeks — totally abandoning it, "said Magay. "Then I decided to give it one more try so I added more earth tone — like in the umbrella, and I toned it down and added some shadows, the poster of the bull fight and the bottles. Now it's one of my favorites and I'm glad I stuck with it."

After graduating from UMass with his BFA, Magay hopes to travel to Europe and then go back to grad school at UMass. In five years the artist sees himself either teaching or coaching basketball.

PBS airs new nature series for '90s

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Don't come looking for "Wild Kingdom's" Marlin Perkins. There's nary a safari jacket or insurance ad in sight.

And don't expect those Disney "True-Life Adventures" from the 1950s, which seemed bent on humanizing the wild kingdom, like editing footage of scorpions and setting it to music so they seemed to square dance.

No, "Eyewitness" is a nature show for the '90s.

While this weekly PBS series seldom loses sight of its primary mission — illuminating the world of animals — it does the job in a high-tech way that should even catch the eye of nature-phobes.

Sure, "Eyewitness," airing Mondays at 8:30 p.m. EDT in most cities, gets a little carried away calling itself "an entirely new concept in television."

But its production values are unquestionably state-of-the-art. Homing in on its topic — usually a particular animal — a half-hour "Eyewitness" segment blends live-action sequences and graphic images with macro- and micro-photography, animation and computer "morphing" to do what television does best: isolate and zero in.

The series employs what its producers call "the technology of white," which is a fancy way of saying things of interest are lifted from their usual surroundings, then placed, in combination with other things, against a background of pure white.

With visuals and accompanying words, "Eyewitness" becomes a dynamic fusion of biology, mythology, history and fantasy.

Although a bit uneven in its first five weeks, the series, at its best, is a pretty neat trip for all ages.

Tonight's "Eyewitness," about birds, certainly takes flight. Not only informative, it's an excellent example of the video razzmatazz that sets this series apart.

As it does every week, "Eyewitness" starts with a dazzling magical flight through the Eyewitness Museum, a computer-generated, multilayered hall of wonders filled with galleries and exhibits. This becomes viewers' virtual home base as the rest of the program carries them in and out of pertinent imagery, making narrative connections along the way.

The program abounds with fun facts, among them:

• The ostrich is the world's heaviest bird at 260 pounds, hence flightless. Yet it's able to run at 40 miles per hour, making it the fastest animal on two legs.

• Ravens once were believed able to report news from far away, which gave rise to the expression "a little bird told me."

• The association of the egg with rebirth persists in the Christian celebration of Easter, with the Easter egg symbolizing Christ's tomb from which he was resurrected.

• While a human's resting heart rate is 60 beats per minute, a robin's heart beats at 600 times per minute.

With its stylized approach, perhaps "Eyewitness" does denature nature a bit. And some may dismiss it as "McLearning," whether they're referring to McDonald's or an Apple Macintosh.

Even so, as an eye-opening crash course, "Eyewitness" is a natural.

Next week, look for "Elephant." And after that, there's "Shark," "Insect," "Amphibian," "Dinosaur," "Jungle," and, on June 26, one of the coolest of all, "Skeleton," for the series' conclusion.

Not scheduled to air, though it should, is "The Making of Eyewitness," which sheds light on the remarkable labors and expense (a half-million dollars per segment) behind this series.

"Eyewitness" is a co-production of BBC Lionheart Television, Dorling Kindersley Vision and PBS, in association with Oregon Public Broadcasting. It's inspired by Dorling Kindersley books, the London publisher of children's and family reference books.

Already, another batch of 13 "Eyewitness" segments is in production. That's good news.

And it's a good chance to fix the program's one major flaw: Martin Sheen as narrator.

His voice, seemingly heard on every film and commercial that James Earl Jones doesn't get, is far too routine for a series this distinctive. Someone with a more lyrical, exotic sound is called for.

Massachusetts captures Hanes–A–10 Cup

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The excellence continues at the University of Massachusetts.

For the first time ever, Massachusetts has been awarded the Hanes–Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup.

The Hanes–Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup is awarded for overall athletic excellence in the 18 championships sponsored by the conference: baseball, men's and women's basketball, men's and women's cross country, field hockey, men's golf, women's gymnastics, men's and women's soccer, softball, men's and women's swimming & diving, men's and women's tennis, men's and women's indoor track & field and women's volleyball.

Massachusetts had six championship teams during the 1994–95 campaign: women's soccer, men's soccer, field hockey, men's basketball, softball and baseball, as well as a second place finish in men's cross country.

Massachusetts captured a total of 98.0 points, the most ever by a Commissioner's Cup champion, and led the standings from start to finish. Rutgers finished in second place with 86.0 points while West Virginia was third with 79.0 points.

George Washington finished in fourth place (74.5 points), Temple was fifth (58.5), St. Joseph's was sixth (56.5), Rhode Island was seventh (53.0), St. Bonaventure was eighth (43.5) and Duquesne finished in last place with 33.0 points.

Points are awarded in descending order of finish, equal to the number of teams which participate in each championship.

This is the third year the award has been given out. West Virginia captured the inaugural Hanes–Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup in 1992–93 while George Washington earned last year's trophy.

DAILY COLLEGIAN/JOE MCNALLY

The Massachusetts women's crew team captured the Higgins Cup, awarded to the varsity winner in the New England Rowing Championships, for the eighth time in 20 years.

heat in their shell, the "Carmen Hooker Buell," with a time of 6:32. Placing second was Connecticut College (6:40.46), followed by Williams (6:45.93), MIT (6:46.37), Boston College (6:47.03), and Wellesley College (6:50.35).

The junior varsity crew also extended their winning streak into the postseason, capturing the Patricia A. Hassett Cup by placing first in a field of 14 crews. The Minutewomen crossed the tape in the "Kathleen L. Scott" with a time of 6:55.9. Finishing in the number two spot was MIT (7:01.8) followed by Holy Cross (7:12.7), MIT B (7:16.75), Connecticut College (7:27.05) and Williams (7:28.0).

With these victories, the varsity and junior varsity crews have qualified for the Champion International Regatta (May 14). UMass' biggest competition of the season. Seeds for the Champion Regatta are expected to be announced some time this week.

The Minutewomen novice boat was edged out by MIT and URI in a morning-qualifying heat. The UMass boat finished with a time of 6:56.18, qualifying for the regatta finals as well as the Champion International Regatta.

Overall, Massachusetts head coach Jim Dietz was pleased with the crews' results.

"It was a difficult day of racing. Conditions were very severe with strong winds and choppy water. Both varsity and junior varsity crews won their morning heats, but couldn't show their stuff in the afternoon. I think they had to row more defensively."

entire unit that worked towards consistency this season will have an opportunity to act upon it next season.

"We are all coming back next year, no one is leaving," McClellan said. "I think we have really worked on our passing, and our strength going into next year will be our collective power as a team."

For a total team wrap-up, here are the prime players at each position for this season's Minutewomen:

Attack: This season, freshman Joanna Dignazio exploded onto the scene, leading the team in both scoring, with 33 goals and 5 assists. The Strath Haven H.S. (Wallingford, Pa.) graduate's reputation as a intense competitor was fulfilled, as she brought a athletic spirit proper for both the team and Division I.

"I love having her on the team. She is from my same area, and our high school teams used to compete against each other," Bryan said. "What followed her coming in was that she had an attitude."

Sophomore Stephanie Walsh continued last season's success with her total of 19 goals and 2 assists, good for second on the Minutewomen. Off the bench, sophomore Robin Axelrod won the Effort Award from the team, because of her ongoing hard work and improvement on the field.

Midfield: Two-time first team high school All-American Vicky Nedomansky took her experience from Detroit County Day, and used it for her status as the team's third-leading scorer as a freshman (15 goals, 2 assists). With the return of the speedy Jenn Herker from a knee injury this season, and also Burke, MacNeil and freshman Cindy O'Brien, the incoming recruits should add to a unit that will be looking to upgrade its passing and speed next season.

Defense and Goalies: The Ridley High connection of Bryan (51 ground balls), Hocker (50) and Michelle Warrington (37) led the defense this season. For the last four games, Warrington was missed with a knee injury for two of them, and was unable to get back into the flow for the rest. Contributions from freshmen Amy Leder and Rhonda Landers helped freshman goalie Kate Brew to a impressive debut, with a .615 save percentage.

Both Bryan and Hocker had to adjust to new roles this year. Bryan, for example, had to switch from wing to line defense. But for both of them, there will be a need for their leadership on the field.

"The past two years, the coach has wanted us to take control of the defense, and tell everyone what is going on," Hocker said. "Next year, I am going to start to do that right from the beginning. I am not going to hold back, because we have nothing to lose."

in the 800 meters by edging out Springfield's Brian Walsh by .61 seconds.

In the field events, the Minutemen continued their scoring ways.

Senior Tom Galligani placed in two different events for the Minutemen as he garnered second in the triple jump (45' 4"), and grabbed fourth in the long jump with a leap of 21' 7 3/4". Landing right behind their captain in the triple jump were sophomore Ron Tauro (43' 9") and freshman Brandon Tutt (42' 5 1/4").

In javelin, junior Mike Masone (175' 11") and freshman Ryan Lambert (163' 9") threw for third and fourth place.

Junior Marc Lefebvre's extra work in the Invitationals over the passed two weeks worked to his teams' benefit as he muscled the shot put 48' 8 3/4", which was good enough for second place.

This coming weekend the Minutemen will try to continue their winning ways when they travel to the New England Championships on May 12.

soon.

• There is absolutely no truth to the rumor that the Kings are planning to hire Don Cherry as their next head coach, despite the fact that he might be the only one who would take the job.

• After last year's dramatic playoffs, the 1995 postseason is on track to be exciting as well. So far in the eight games played so far, six have been decided by one goal, with one game going to overtime.

• Nothing against the city of Winnipeg, but all we've heard is whining about the Jets being a small market team. But why would you go to Minnesota, a market that couldn't support the North Stars? The Devils should be disbanded before being allowed to move to Nashville.

• If Corey Hirsch keeps it up, he may be depicted in a whole series of stamps. The Canadian National goalie who is trying to block the Swedish government from using a picture of him getting beaten by Sweden in the Olympics on a postage stamp, was burnt once again by the Swedes in the World Hockey Championships.

• Can Martin Brodeur really have the lowest salary in the NHL? ... If someone told you 10 years ago that Gretzky could miss the playoffs yet not be missed, would you have believed them?

Matt Vautour is Collegian columnist.

of "putting the same old teams in," and he is right. But so was the committee: as in basketball, the lacrosse committee strives to establish a sense of continuity, a difficult barrier to clear with only 12 bids to award. Tradition has its merits, and UMass is rich in lacrosse tradition. Penn State has it only in football.

The Minutemen may be in, but few will pick them to beat the Tigers. But they are afraid of no one, and that brand of courage is a staple of this proud program. If they play as they did against Brown, they will be flattened. But the committee remembered those brave efforts at Virginia and Duke, and it knows UMass loves a challenge.

Sports Meeting Changed

The Collegian sports staff will now have the final meeting of the year on Wednesday, May 17, at 4 p.m. All sports staff members should attend, as well as those interested in joining the staff next fall. If you are unable to attend, please call Andrew Bryce, Matt Vautour, or next year's sports editor, Candice Flemming, at 545-1749.

The Fyi section of the Collegian is open to the community to advertise events in the area. Our deadline is 3 p.m. daily and we do not accept Fyis over the phone. Please mail or hand deliver your submissions as early as possible.

All submissions must be typewritten with a contact name and phone number to verify any questions.

The other night I was getting ready to kiss my girlfriend and her face was very close to mine. The lights were dim and she looked so beautiful. Her face was misty and fuzzy. She looked like a movie star being shot by a camera with a special lens.

Then I realized I needed to use my reading glasses for kissing.

She doesn't want me to wear them when I kiss her.

I think she's making a big mistake.

Baseball to host UNH today at Earl Lorden

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.

ROB BARNETT / COLLEGIAN
Senior Jeff Michaels and the Massachusetts baseball team will play in their regular season home finale in today's game against New Hampshire at Earl Lorden Field.

It is plain and simple for four seniors on the University of Massachusetts baseball team — win the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament or today could be your last game at Earl Lorden Field.

If the Minutemen (31–12) capture the post–season crown and the automatic bid to an NCAA play–in game, the contest may be held here in Amherst at Lorden Field. No. 1 Massachusetts' quest for the NCAA berth starts on Friday in Boyertown, Pa. against No. 4 Rutgers (26–27) at 4:05 p.m.

However, one thing's for sure — the final regular season home game for the Minutemen is this afternoon against New England foe New Hampshire (3 p.m.), and it could be their last on the season.

Andy Pelis, catcher — The captain this season for Massachusetts coach Mike Stone, Pelis has left everything he has on the field. Pelis' batting average has hovered over the .325 mark all season long, and his defense has been impeccable.

In a doubleheader split against St. Bonaventure last Saturday, Pelis took part in two collisions at home plate and another time was clubbed over the head with a bat. As a weary Pelis walked off the field after the Massachusetts victory in game two, Stone asked if he wanted a rest on Sunday. "Nope, I'm fine," Pelis said.

"Good, I need you anyway," Stone replied.

Jay Murphy, right handed pitcher — The ace of the Massachusetts pitching staff came to Amherst as a second baseman, and three seasons later, anchors one of the best rotations in the Atlantic 10 Conference. What Massachusetts will miss most is Murphy's rubber arm — the senior has hurled seven complete games thus far in 1995.

Murphy leads the Minutemen in strikeouts (41) and starts (9).

Bill Knight, right fielder — Knight will leave Amherst as the school's all–time home run and runs batted in king, but, more importantly, a true winner on and off the field. This season, the clean–up hitter has made opposing pitchers pay, especially at Lorden Field. In 1995, Knight has 16 HRs and 61 RBIs, good enough for the team lead in both categories.

Jeff Michaels, first baseman/ left handed pitcher — Michaels has only been in a Minuteman uniform for one season, but his impact has been felt in different areas.

Starting on the mound, the lefty has moved into the No. 3 slot in the starting rotation and given Stone much needed innings.

Common opponents for UMass–UNH — Vermont (UM won 19–6, UNH lost three of four by a combined score of 10–8), Central Connecticut State (UM won two by a combined score of 15–1, UNH lost two by 30–13).

Boston College (UM won 12–6, UNH lost 6–5), Northeastern (UM lost 8–3, UNH lost three of four) and Connecticut (UM won 6–2, UNH won 15–14).

Men's lacrosse earns bid through winning formula

Did you hear? I was named chairman of the NCAA men's lacrosse tournament selection committee for 1996.

Yeah, and Notre Dame really is the home opener for UMass football next season.

In actual news, the Minutemen were seeded 10th in the 12–team tournament, and they will play the defending national champion Princeton Tigers Saturday at 2 p.m., at Princeton's Palmer Stadium.

Ted Kotler

Hey, look, a fact I reported correctly. Rummage through your old Collegians and turn to the sports section of the May 4 edition. Under the headline "Brown takes NCAA bid from men's lacrosse," I wrote:

"The No. 9 Brown Bears whacked No. 10 University of Massachusetts ... eliminating the Minutemen from post– season consideration."

Maybe you don't have to be considered to earn a bid. There was a word missing from that lead that should have gone right before eliminating: virtually. I didn't see much of the best lacrosse UMass played this year, but the committee members obviously did. So now that my understanding of the selection process has been reduced to less than zero, I'm on a crash course in tournament history that's taught me UMass' bid is consistent with those chapters.

UMass coach Greg Cannella said his team had to win its last six games to get in, so he was wrong too. UMass closed the season with a 4–2 stretch in those games, bringing its overall record to 7–5.

The selection committee for the men's basketball tournament holds a considered team's power rating in high regard. A key component of that rating is the team's strength of schedule.

Apparently the lacrosse committee employs a similar formula, because UMass' schedule was tough as hell. Five of UMass' opponents are in the field. The Minutemen lost at second seed Virginia and at fifth seed Duke by three goals combined.

So it's only fitting that their next game matches them with the team that won it all last season. UMass earned its bid, now it must earn a spot in the second round.

I wasn't the only one shocked by UMass' selection. Penn State coach Glenn Thiel said "I don't know what it takes to get in." The Nittany Lions beat Delaware on the road and finished 11–2, while the Minutemen's least justifiable loss was to Delaware at home.

But the once–feared Blue Hens don't lay many golden eggs anymore. Penn State binged on cupcakes all year and that doesn't fool the committee.

"Strength of schedule is very important," Scroggs said. His committee's selections echoed the statement.

"It's better to play a strong schedule than to pile up a lot of wins," said Mike McComiskey, UMass media relations assistant and contact for men's lacrosse.

Thiel credits the basketball committee for "getting a new team in there," referring to Manhattan, and hoped the lacrosse committee would do the same for his team, which is rarely mentioned as an NCAA candidate. Instead, the committee favored UMass, which missed the tournament in two of the last three years, but made it in the previous five.

Thiels thought this was a case

Nordiques lead, Sharks scary foe

If Quebec does any real damage in the playoffs this year, you will be able to trace it directly back to the first game of the season.

Joe Sakic's goal with 38 seconds left in the game to give Quebec a 1–0 lead in its series with the Rangers was more than just a game winner. The Nordiques have no playoff experience. A loss in the first game in their home building, especially to a team as experienced as the Rangers would have been devastating to the Nordiques.

The top seed is a curse to the young Nords. They would have been better off with a three seed, and a chance to come from the middle of the pack. Instead, they are burdened with a target on their heads.

Against the defending Stanley Cup Champions, the Nordiques needed to at least win the first game to gain some momentum. Because, regular season aside, the Rangers know what it takes to win, and an upset victory may have started the ball rolling for the Rangers.

Matt Vautour on the NHL

- Another team with no playoff experience dodged a bullet Sunday. The second–seeded Flyers edged the Sabres in overtime, when Dominik Hasek made a horrible play allowing Karl Dykhuis's floater to get by him for the winner. The Lindros–less Flyers will get a boost when the MVP candidate eventually returns, but they will need Ron Hextall to be better than he is to keep the Flyers from having a drawn out series with Buffalo.
- Is there anything more frightning than playing the Sharks in the first round of the playoffs? Despite the fact that they were far less talented than the Red Wings last year, San Jose bounced them early. This year they are already one up on the Flames, who Glen Wesleyed an open net to let the Sharks escape with the upset win.
- Two things can come of a beating as bad as the Devils 5–0 slugging of the Bruins. Losing badly often has the same results as losing a close one.

The first is the Bruins' confidence gets shattered, and they fold, careening into a four or five game debacle.

The second is more common. The Bruins were embarrassed. The rivalry between the two teams is intense, and the Bruins have enough pride to rebound if their goaltending can recover.

Speaking of goaltending, just how much pressure is on a rookie goalie in the playoffs? Just ask Blaine Lacher and Jim Carey. The two freshman netminders, coming off exceptional seasons, were shaky in their playoff debuts. These two goalies both need to return to form for their teams to be successful.

- Imagine if Kirk McLean played on a real team.
- ESPN is so valuable to the NHL right now. In addition to the coverage of a multitude of games, the quality of coverage has been brilliant.

The in–the–net camera that was used in the Quebec–New York was one of the best angles ever used in a hockey game.

As good as Mike Milbury has been on camera, he has to be headed back behind the bench somewhere

Record fails to tell story about women's lax

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN
The young Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finished the season with a 3–10 record. One of the reasons was the play of attack Joanna Dignazio (19).

On the surface, the overall record of 3–10 this year for the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team does not comprise many distinct memorable qualities. But below the facade of numbers alone, this 1995 season could be an earmark, experience–wise, for a young team on the brink of future possiseason contention.

The comparison between last year's record of 3–11 and this year's does not tell the true story for the Minutewomen. Whereas last season was a tale of blowouts, this season was a tale of falling just short.

In six of UMass' 10 losses this year, the total goal differential only adds up to ten goals. For example, in their losses against powerhouses Brown, Yale and New Hampshire, the gap between goals scored and allowed between the two seasons was 38 (1994) to 12 this year.

To coach Francesca McClellan, and sophomore defenders Erica Bryan and Kristen Hocker, that concept has not been lost. But for all of them, this young team still needs to continue to improve at the Division I level.

"On the whole, I think it was a great year. In the respect that we had a lot of young players who both individually, and as a team, that made tremendous progress," McClellan said. "We really saw some things that we didn't expect to see until next season."

"We had high expectations coming into this year, but we did not come through. We did gain a lot of experience, and that should lift us up for next season," Bryan said. "Our record does not show our overall improvement as a team. Hopefully, this will all convert into W's for us next year."

You have to get used to playing Division I, no matter what sport," Hocker said. "You have to have that attitude, because you have playing the same amount of time as every other player. It is just a matter of building your confidence."

For the Minutewomen, in their second full season since being reinstated into Division I, "youth" has definitely been the buzzword. As 10 of the 18 players are freshmen, the only two upperclassmen are junior Elaine Burke and senior captain Diane MacNeil. The good news is that MacNeil was able to capitalize on her final year of eligibility, and the

Minutemen score in 18 of 20 events, outscoring URI by 11

The University of Rhode Island was looking to continue its reign as Eastern Conference Champions while holding off the undefeated Massachusetts mens' track and field squad. The Minutemen entered the championships hoping team depth would be a winning formula.

The defending champions took first place in four events, while the Minutemen grabbed only three. UMass, however, scored in 18 of the 20 events, as well as having multiple scorers in eight of them. It enabled the Minutemen to take home the championship by scoring 146 points, 11 better than Rhode Island.

Southern Connecticut State (105 points) and Springfield College (83) also had strong showings, but didn't have the overall talent of the Minutemen.

It was in the distance events where UMass got the biggest performances of the day. In the 3000 meter steeplechase, senior Rick Copley crossed the tape in a time of 9:44.9 as he led a charge of four Minutemen to finish in the top six in the event. Next came junior Mark Buffone in second (9:47.3), before sophomores Mike Ferrari (4th, 10:00.0) and Jon Way (sixth, 10:01.5) came across the finish line.

The 10,000 meters brought three more places for the Minutemen as sophomore Tim Boilard, freshman Ryan Carrara and senior Mike Sullivan finished second, third and fourth in the event.

While in the 5000, sophomore Matt Behl ran away from the pack, taking the title in a time of 15:33.49. Behl was followed by two other Minutemen point grabbers in the event, with Ted Towse taking fourth (16:03.10) and Pat Murphy placing sixth (16:09.88).

Sophomores Mike Maceiko and Walter Stock continued the trend, taking third and fifth in the 1500 with times of 4:07.72 and 4:10.90 respectively.

The varsity crew clinched the Higgins Cup, placing first in a field of 15 crews winning by a margin of eight seconds. The Higgins Cup has been awarded to the varsity winner of the New England Rowing Championships for the past 20 years. Ties between teaching, research key to future

By Robert Dunn and Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Research and teaching are the body and blood of the University of Massachusetts, and many believe that achieving a balance between the two is vital for the future of the institution.

Acquiring the millions needed to fund research, pay graduate student teachers and maintain the facilities needed to adequately house both is especially difficult given the financial straits the University finds itself in today.

In statements to the press and through the electronic media, President Michael Hooker has defended the University for its commitment to research.

He has supported existing programs rather than follow through with the cutbacks recommended in a recent report that hopes to change the academic direction of UMass.

Most faculty agree that research is vital not only to the communities that each department represents, but also to the University as a whole. But although it is beneficial to both undergraduate and graduate students, balancing research and teaching can be like walking a "tightrope."

Big money grants

The amount of research grant money at UMass can reach into the millions depending on your department, according to the Sponsored Activity Annual Reports issued by the Grant and Contracts Administration Office.

Physics and astronomy, computer science and polymer science departments, which make up three of the nine departments of the college of natural sciences and math, were granted over $95 million during a four year period.

Conversely, all 10 departments of the college of social and behavior sciences was granted a bit more than $14 million during the same four year period.

"Any individual faculty member, depending on circumstances, may be unbalanced on one aspect of the job," said Duane Cromack, dean of the college of engineering.

Fiscal year 1995 is proving to be a fruitful one for research grants. According to the January through March quarterly report, this fiscal year has earned approximately $20 million more in grant money then last year did at the same time.

"When there's big money out there it can influence people and not always for the best, said William McKnight, head of the polymer science and engineering department.

"The balancing act is to remember what the mission of the University is," he said. "It's kind of like a tightrope act in some way. I won't tell you that people don't sometimes fall off."

Even if professors succeed at balancing responsibilities, academic prejudice may keep that balance from being recognized.

"Somehow there's a feeling that if you're a good teacher then you're not a good researcher and vice versa," McKnight said. "Nothing could be further from the truth."

Report draws criticism

While research draws in millions in grant money, a recent report claims teaching is being overlooked by the University faculty.

A report co–authored by former University of Massachusetts President Robert Wood, has drawn disapproval from both faculty and President Hooker.

However, the sheer amount of grant money available and the difficulty of conducting both cutting edge research and quality teaching is a constant challenge to University professors.

The report, entitled "Turnabout Time," criticized the UMass system for its emphasis on research, recommending that teaching become the highest priority.

That's a move that John Nordin, the head of the biochemistry and molecular biology department, calls "a mistake."

The results from chemical engineering research done on this campus have significantly changed the undergraduate chemical engineering program, said Michael Doherty, head of the department.

According to Doherty, four required undergraduate chemical engineering classes are very different then they were 10 years ago due to on–campus research.

Professor James Douglas has written a best selling chemical engineering textbook for undergraduates based on research done at this university, Douglas said.

"If we didn't have the research facilities here, that book would have been written somewhere else," he said. "Our students get this information first."

Fergus Clydesdale, head of the food sciences department, said his students have a 100 percent placement rate in graduate school or in the job market after graduation. This is greatly due to the research done by his department.

The grant money provided by research allows the purchase of state of the art equipment and creates contacts in the business world through corporate speakers giving lectures, he said.

"I can't think of anything that isn't positive for our undergraduates," he said.

The validity of the report has also been questioned by UMass professors.

"I don't think you can grow and become a top 10 university without research and an undergraduate teaching program," Cromack said.

Hooker speaks

In an e–mail message sent to all five campuses, President Hooker promised to, "create an environment in which good research and good researchers can prosper."

These attitudes differ from those of the authors of the report, who recommend changes in the way that the UMass system is run.

"Change the mission, especially of the university campuses, away from the sole emphasis on the research university model," the report says.

Hooker disagrees with the reports findings, however.

"The study seems insufficiently sensitive to the importance of research in building a great university," he said.

The report did single out the Amherst campus for its graduate research program, noting that two recent Nobel prize winners conducted their research here.

UMass astrophysicist Joseph H. Taylor and his graduate assistant, Russel A. Hulse were jointly awarded the Nobel prize for physics in 1993 for work done studying binary pulsars in the 1970s. Working together, the two men discovered the first binary pulsar 21,000 light years from earth.

"Hulse was one of the best graduate students we ever had," said Frederick Byron, Vice Chancellor of Research, Graduate Studies and Economic Development. "It's especially gratifying to see a graduate student receiving credit for his work."

Every American university depends on the work performed by its graduate students, said Peter Lillya, the associate head of the chemistry department.

Undergraduate research

Graduate students are not the only ones conducting research. Many science programs on campus also stress undergraduate research.

"We have undergraduate research so the students can think independently and not just follow a book," Cromack said.

Earlier this semester, representatives from all four UMass campuses presented undergraduate research projects in a competition forum. President Hooker was on hand to present cash awards for the top projects.

25 out of approximately 131 projects were given awards. Of those students 10 conducted their research at the Amherst campus.

In a speech given at the award ceremony, Hooker declared his support for undergraduate research.

"As long as I am president of UMass, this is going to be a growing, annual event and I will always be here to participate," he said.

Nordin said that research in his department is conducted both by graduate and undergraduate students.

"Undergraduate majors are heavily involved in research. That's been a tradition in this department for 20 years," he said.

Basketball team to be honored in Boston for accomplishments

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will trek to the State House in Boston on Wednesday afternoon where they will be recognized for their accomplishments.

The team plans to visit the House and Senate chambers and take part in a reception that will be held in Nurse's Hall.

Chancellor David Scott will be on hand to make a short speech and introduce Coach John Calipari. Calipari is also scheduled to present team photos to Governor William Weld, Senate President William Bulger and House Speaker Thomas Flaherty.

UMass President Michael K. Hooker is scheduled to make comments following Calipari's presentation.

FBI looking into new lead in suspect search

By Sally Streff Buzbees
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — In a strange turn in the Oklahoma bombing, the FBI is investigating whether the person in the sketch of John Doe 2 is the husky 12–year-old son of a key figure in the case.

There has been no suggestion that the boy, Josh Nichols, had any part in the bombing. Rather, FBI agents want to know if he was with Timothy McVeigh in Junction City, Kan., when McVeigh rented the truck allegedly used in the attack two days later, a source close to his family told The Associated Press on Tuesday.

A law enforcement source in Washington confirmed that "some investigators think there is a fair chance that (Terry) Nichols' son Josh was at the rental office in Junction City when the truck was rented."

McVeigh is the only person charged in the bombing. Terry Nichols is being held in Kansas as a material witness and faces separate charges of conspiracy to make small bombs in Michigan.

One of his attorneys, David J. Phillips, said Tuesday he thinks his client is close to being charged in the federal building bombing. Phillips, chief public defender in Kansas, said he is unsure exactly what charges are being considered by federal prosecutors.

"It could be anything," said Phillips, who expects Terry Nichols to be moved to Oklahoma City on Wednesday to appear before a grand jury.

The FBI developed three sketches of John Doe 2, a man who was seen with McVeigh. They were based on accounts from a witness in the Ryder truck shop and others in Junction City.

They also were based on an account from a witness who spotted McVeigh and another person "appearing to be casing downtown Oklahoma City in the days leading up to April 19," the federal law enforcement source said.

The sketches depict a muscular, square–jawed man with dark, close–cropped hair. He is shown in a baseball cap in two of the sketches. He is also described as having a tattoo on his left upper arm.

The FBI has doubts about the accuracy of the sketches "as evidenced by the fact that there are three versions of it now," the Washington official said.

Jim Donahue, who hired Terry Nichols as a ranch hand at his Kansas farm last year, described Josh as "a pretty husky kid," strong for his age, with a flattop haircut. But Donahue said he doubted whether he could be the person depicted in the sketch.

The federal source in Washington said, "Nothing's resolved. Interviewing is still going on."

He added, "John Doe No. 2 was described as a man, and not many people mistake a 12–year–old for a man, so it would be a surprise if he turned out to be Doe No. 2."

As for the tattoo that John Doe 2 was said to have, the official said, "We've heard this was a kid who was into those temporary, stick–on tattoos."

Concerned students called their representatives and senators yesterday to ask support for student financial aid in a phone–a–thon sponsored by Student Government Association.

SCERA aims to save financial aid

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

In order to represent opposition to federal financial aid cuts the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), is holding a phone bank today and tomorrow outside the Student Union so students can inform their representatives that they discourage any elimination to these cuts.

"[Eliminating government subsidized loans] combined with the proposal to eliminate work study and eliminate Perkins loans would be the largest cut in financial aid in the history of the U.S." said Mare Kenen, director of SCERA. "That is very dramatic."

Presently, when students take out Stafford loans, the government pays interest while the student is in school, Kenen said.

If the cuts go through, students would face a higher monthly payment.

"The average UMass student has monthly loan payments of $130 after graduation," he said. "It will go up to about $178 per month, which is usually over ten years."

If a student received a $5,000 Stafford loan now, he/she would owe $5,000 upon graduation, Kenen said. If the cuts pass, the amount owed will increase $1,000.

The set–up, which began yesterday, consists of three phones, one for in–state students, out–of–state students and the last especially for Congressmen Peter Blute (D, Worcester) and Peter Torkelson (R, North Shore).

The two congressmen are republicans who are "borderline," and may support or oppose the cuts, according to Kelly Chamberlain, SCERA intern.

"We basically have a lock on ten democrats," Chamberlain said. "[Bloute and Torkleson] are borderline, they could go either way. We are trying get their support."

Kieran Riley, a first year student from Ipswich, called the office of Representative Peter Torkleson yesterday in support of his financial aid.

"I basically heard words floating about that work study for next year is in jeopardy," Riley said. "I feel even though calling representatives is not a direct solution, but it is an important way of opposing something that has such great magnitude."

If the University is a public institution then all people should have the opportunity to attend, Riley said.

"If work study is denied that in turn will mean that a huge portion of the general public will also be denied," he said.

At this time it is not the quality of the calls it is the quantity, according to Jay Bragg, SCERA intern.

"The response has been pretty good so far," he said. "We will have about 1,000 calls by today. It comes down to whether or not our aid will be here next year or not."

SCERA's phone–bank is part of a nationwide effort to contact since the issue is federal aid, Chamberlain said.

"We have a lot of support as far as Massachusetts goes," the said. "We are trying to get out of state students to come make phone calls. We sent a mailing to about 2,000 out–of– state students from Connecticut, New Jersey and New York."

The possible cuts in federal financial aid are the same for students across the country, according to Kenen.

"We are trying to influence as many senators and congressmen from around the country, and out–of–state students can do that," Kenen said. "Programs are the same for a student from Connecticut as they are for a student from Massachusetts," he said.

The elimination of work study will hurt the University in addition to the students, Kenen said.

"The University is very dependent on work study students to help the li run," he said. "If there is no work study, the University will have a hard time filling in that gap."

The Student Legal Services Office has recently filed it's first lawsuit in almost eight years since its litigation authority was revoked in August of 1987.

According to the legal services office, the lawsuit involves Lance Walsh, a University of Massachusetts undergraduate, and Tom Westort, his former landlord.

According to the complaint, Walsh warned Westort about a low–hanging electrical wire strung between his house and an adjacent barn, in January 1994.

On or around April 19, 1994, Walsh was riding his bike towards the front of his house when he hit the wire with his neck and was thrown to the ground. Walsh suffered neck and spine injuries and received an eight–inch scar on his neck.

Walsh was unavailable for comment.

The lawsuit filed alleges that by not removing the unsafe conditions on the property, namely the electrical wire, Weston violated the Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act, Massachusetts housing laws and was negligent.

Walsh is seeking compensatory damages, attorney's fees and any other relief that the court sees fit, according to the legal services office.

Weston was conacted, but could not give comment as he has not been served notice of the lawsuit yet.

"I didn't realize I was being sued," he said.

The Sheriff will be delivering papers to him on Wednesday, said Charles DiMare, the directing attorney for the legal services office.

The office's authority to litigate was originally revoked in August of 1987 when the legal services office was abolished and turned into the legal services center.

This center served in an advising capacity only with no power to sue anybody, said DiMare.

According to DiMare, the abolishing of the office was a result of the Legal Services Office being sued 13 times in 13 separate civil rights cases.

"They just got tired of being taken to court," he said.

The University's first step in restricting the office's power was to limit who they could bring suit against, specifically, the University.

"That was found to be unconstitutional," DiMare said. "They couldn't tell us who we could sue, so they just abolished the office entirely."

Four years of negotiations finally ended with the legal services office being granted authority to litigate on December 1, 1993.

This ability to litigate doesn't extend to state institutions, DiMare said.

"We can't sue the University or any other state agency, but we're trying to build up our caseload, we've still got cases pending," she said.

Two of those cases pending involve civil rights claims filed by two UMass students. Settlements are being sought in those claims and the legal services office intends to file lawsuits in both matters if settlements are not reached.

The first involves sexual harassment charges brought against a private business where a UMass student worked last summer. The second involves a foreign graduate student who was allegedly discriminated against and defrauded by a used car dealer.

Chancellor honors with awards

By Hernán Rozemberg
Collegian Staff

As part of the University's efforts to increase a multicultural aspect to the college atmosphere and in order to encourage and promote cross-cultural awareness, the Chancellor honors annually four outstanding individuals who have been involved in this awareness process.

The Chancellor's Award for Multiculturalism is given to one faculty member, one University staff member, one graduate student and one undergraduate student.

Requisites are that nominees be involved heavily in contributing to an amelioration of intercultural issues on campus and that they have achieved numerous feats working toward this goal, among other criteria.

This year in the undergraduate category the winner was Arnold Lizana, who in the past two years has served as the student member of the Board of Trustees of the University. Lizana has also been involved in student government and was on the Advisory Board of UMass Legal Services Office.

Shyamala Ivatury was the recipient for the graduate award. She has served on the W.E.B. Du Bois Petition Coalition, as well as having been President of the Graduate Student Senate.

The Curator for the Augusta Savage Gallery, Theresa Janoure, was given the staff member award. Janoure has greatly enhanced multicultural appreciation at UMass by coordinating the presentation of many art exhibitions and cultural demonstrations by artists as close as New York and as far away as Brazil, Vietnam and Burma.

Carmen Diana Deere was the honored faculty member. Deere has been director of UMass Latin American Studies Program since 1992, and was the first Latino woman to be elected as President of the Latin American Studies Association.

A luncheon was held last May 4 in honor of all awarded.

Former UMass director to receive award

By Rona Meyer
Collegian Staff

The former director of sports information at the University of Massachusetts has been announced as the recipient of the 1995 Arch Ward award.

Howard Davis is the first recipient from the University in the award's 37-year history.

"I was very pleasantly surprised and shocked because I'd been out of the business for two years," Davis said. This was a very humbling situation for me."

This award is given to one person a year for outstanding contributions and promotion of the sports information profession.

The recipient of the award is chosen by a committee of 21 sports information directors throughout the country, Davis said.

Davis is currently working as the assistant department head of external affairs and director of internships for the University's sports studies department.

"It is a real honor for Howie to receive this award and I'm not surprised that he was selected. He is highly regarded in the industry," said the Sports Studies department head, Glenn Wong.

"Howie is out of the sports information department, so people would tend to forget about him. But, they haven't so that just underlies his efforts as a sports information director," said Wong.

A lot of the positive things that Davis did for sports information, he's doing for the sports studies department now, Wong said.

Davis was nominated for this award by Ken Cerino, from Springfield College.

Cerino said he nominated Davis because of his long time contributions to the organization over the years, and because he was one of the best college sports publicists in the organization's history.

"I am so happy that Howie is being recognized for all he has done for UMass, because he is considered by many as a man of great integrity and honesty," Cerino said. "He did an outstanding job publicizing the athletics at UMass."

Cerino said that being a sports publicist isn't easy and that he handled the job with great integrity.

Davis will be receiving the award this June at the organization's annual convention in Denver.

Davis is a member of the College Sports Information Directors of America (COSIDA) Hall of Fame and was the director of sports information at UMass from 1980 to 1993. Davis was also the recipient of the UMass Alumni award, a few years ago.

Before he came to UMass, he was the director of sports information at Springfield College for 12 years and at Kenyon College in Gambier, Ohio for two years.

Davis also served on the board of directors of the College Sports Information Directors of America from 1979 to 1990 and was the organization's national president from 1982 to 1983.

Letter dismisses Jewish culture

Jay Berkovitz

What is so disturbing about the Helen Cullen letter? Having taught a course on "Anti-Semitism in Historical Perspective" for several years, and having been a member of the campus community long enough to have observed numerous allegations and attacks directed at Jews and the Jewish culture, I have found nothing in her comments that were particularly remarkable. Wittingly or unwittingly, she repeated what Wilhelm Marr, inventor of the term "anti- Semitism," and others whose writings were used to justify the Nazi genocide, had set out before the German public a century ago. When I first read the letter I felt that here was simply another crackpot who, despite her former status as a university professor, was not to be taken seriously. My initial reaction was to dismiss her. No one, I thought, could be blind to the transparency of her claims.

What, then, is the problem? My concern is that there are far too many people on this campus, from Whitmore to the Campus Center, who regard "innocent" anti-Semitism as good sport. I am not convinced that by printing the outrageous letter, the Collegian intended to advance the cause of constructive debate, to defeat ignorance through education, as the editor in chief insists. The decision to print the letter is rooted in a naive view of the world where nothing really matters, where responsibility is not considered when determining what one ought to do.

This mind-set assumes that groundless attacks levelled against a minority and its culture are inconsequential, because the only thing that matters is the quality of the discourse, or the public relations events which are organized after the fact. The decision to print the letter "in hopes of fostering a dialogue on campus," as the editorial editor claimed, is absolutely silly. There will be no dialogue on anti-Semitism. One does not debate hatred. Apparently, what the Collegian is really sating is: "As long as it pertains to the Jews and the African-Americans, the problem of hatred is contained, the damage will be limited, and it makes great viewing." Everyone ought to be outraged by this approach.

Although most are in agreement that anti-Semitism, like all forms of prejudice and hatred, is a pernicious disease that must be rooted out if we are to advance along the path toward our individual and societal objectives, one wonders how it persists so tenaciously.

I have reached the unfortunate conclusion that anti- Semitism — though not in the flagrant style of the Middle Ages — is still deeply embedded in our culture. It finds expression in the widely held view that Jewish culture is not worth very much, that it is an outworn system that ought to be discarded. Owing to historical foes in the last two centuries, many Jews have adopted the judgement of their critics: integration within the society at large demands a surrender of one's own cultural heritage. Far too many people hold the view that Jewish culture is, at best, to be dismissed as unimportant and irrelevant. At worst, it is "offensive" as the letter-writing asserts. I maintain that the distance between her and most others is not terribly great.

The problem is that we live in a world where people need to be reminded that tolerance and respect are not identical. I fear that the thrust of efforts on this campus is largely motivated by a reverence for toleration of others who are different, but evince very little interest in learning to respect them. Tolerance is rooted in a willingness to suffer another's existence, but does not require any familiarity with other's culture. In fact, tolerance can often be condescending. Respect presumes a healthy inquisitiveness about the rich varieties of interpretation and meaning that each culture brings to life. It is in the latter that we discover our common humanity.

I call on the administration and all members of the campus community to go beyond mere tolerance, for tolerance is not enough. We have educational challenge before us: we must teach and learn not only to avoid hatred, but also to discover what are the treasures of each of our diverse cultures. Regrettably, multiculturalism has become a political slogan. We need to restore it to what it really intended to do: to enhance an appreciation for cultural diversity through learning about each other.

I fear that the mistake we all make in seeing Helen Cullen as a crackpot who expresses unpopular ideas is that we free ourselves from any real responsibility to examine our own prejudices. There may very well be some Helen Cullen in us all. How many of us make judgements about other individuals or groups without striving to understand their cultures? The person who wrote the infamous letter is not deranged. She is an example of what goes wrong when native intelligence is not combined with a sincere effort to acquire and understanding of other people. Empathy develops from learning to identify with the experiences of others.

Finally, to Jewish students I would like to close with the following: Do not permit an evil letter, or the inadequacy of response to it, to discourage you. No defamation of this sort can detract from, or in any way compromise, the value of Jewish tradition and culture. Regrettably, you have been reminded that anti-Semitism still festers, as do other forms of hatred. At the same time, know that people of good will have demonstrated their opposition to this outrage. Take advantage of the opportunity presented by this unfortunate incident: Discover the richness within you own heritage, be strengthened by it, and work with members of all communities to promote the fellowship we all so desperately seek.

Jay Berkovitz is the Chair of the Department of Judaic and Near Eastern Studies.

The shock of reality at UMass

Geri Sahn

Nothing has ever shocked me at the University of Massachusetts. As I walked past Memorial Hall freshman year, students were hanging out of the windows protesting the celebration of Columbus day. UMass' mascot, the Minuteman, was being called racist, sexist and violent my sophomore year. And my junior year — well this year has been different. Two students were shot on campus.

I remember my cousin, who graduated a year before I came to the University, telling me that I should live in Southwest. "It's the place to be on campus when you are a freshman. You meet so many people. It is the party area. It is wild," she said.

So when I filled out the housing slip during orientation I marked Southwest. Excitement, loudness, parties, a dryer was thrown out of a tower in the past — what more could you ask for? Zoo-Mass at its best.

However, what happened in Southwest earlier last week was Zoo-Mass at its worst. A fight had caused a student to pull out a gun, which in turn shot and injured two innocent by-standers who happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

For my journalism 200 class last semester I had to read the Boston Globe everyday. Although it made me aware of both the national and local news, it would always depress me. On the region page, at least two out of every five articles were about killings that occurred in the Boston area, or in towns surrounding the city.

I remember one incident which was extremely upsetting. A man, who was dressed up in a Barney costume, was brutally beaten for no reason. Like the two students who got shot, he was an innocent victim. But unlike the man, the two students were shot less where I live. There are so many people who are surrounded by incidents like these everyday. I read about them, hear about them, and now I experienced one.

Reading the Globe everyday made me realize how sheltered I have been while attending college. I was living in my own little world on campus where I was — predominately safe. And to be honest, I liked that feeling of saturating myself in an academic life where you only read about the problems of the world, rather than experiencing it.

The shooting that occurred in Southwest has brought violence onto campus, and I'm scared now. Do I have to walk around campus fearing that at any moment someone will put out a gun? Not only am I upset with the situation, but I am disappointed in the response made by the administration. (It is more like — what response.)

The blame cannot be put on them — it can only be put on the person who had the gun — but the aftermath must be handled delicately, and it hasn't. What's going on up there in Whitmore. This isn't a takeover. This is a shooting that occurred right on campus in a living area where thousands of students live.

Several weeks ago my cousin came up to see UMass. He had decided to come to the University and wanted to know which living area on campus he should live in. At the time I said, "without a doubt, Southwest." Regardless to its loud, obnoxious reputation, I told him Southwest is a good time. However if he asked me this week, I doubt I would praise Southwest, or any other living area on campus.

I give great thanks that I don't live on campus anymore. I would probably be scared to leave my room.

Coordinator replies to letter

To the editor:

Although I knew in advance that Helen Cullen's letter would be published, I was appalled when I actually read it. Cullen's letter is profoundly anti-Semitic. I find it disheartening that such attitudes exist on this campus, and very disturbing that such hateful ideas have been articulated by a retired professor in the pages of the Collegian. It is even more troubling that Cullen's letter was sent to the editor during Holocaust Awareness Week.

Cullen's ideas remind us that the prejudice which gave rise to the Holocaust still exists, if only (in this instance) in the mind of one individual. One can only speculate as to how Cullen's bigotry has affected the lives of the students in her classes. Whether overt or subtle, the beliefs expressed in her letter must have colored the experience of many Jewish students.

I've already heard from one such student, and I'm sure there are many more of you who have suffered the humiliation of a professor treating you as less than human merely because of your religion, or skin color, or gender, or sexual preference, and my heart goes out to all of you.

Lisa Tannenbaum's courageously personal account of her encounter with Cullen (Collegian, May 3), can help us to better understand just how painful such experiences can be. But it is not merely enough to understand the effects of such bigotry. We must also condemn it. While Cullen has a right to her views — however repugnant they may be — we too have the right, and the obligation, to repudiate such hatred wherever it surfaces.

While it is tempting to dismiss the person who espouses these ideas as being "misguided," it would be a mistake to dismiss the ideas themselves, for Cullen is not the only person to voice such hatred of Jews. White supremacists such as the Ku Klux Klan, neo-Nazi skinheads and the John Birch society blame Jews (and Blacks and immigrants) for the world's ills, often quoting from the "Old" or New Testaments to support their hateful views. Their ideologies are deeply racist and anti-Semitic (and often anti-Catholic as well).

Fortunately these groups are not presently in the political mainstream, as was the case in Nazi Germany; but only by joining together and speaking out against such views can we ensure that the purveyors of anti-Semitism and similar forms of hatred remain on the fringes.

As Pastor Martin Niemoller wrote during the Holocaust: "In Germany, they first came for the Jews, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Jew. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I didn't speak up because I was a Protestant. Then they came for me — but by that time no one was left to speak up."

It is gratifying to see how many people — especially those of you who are not Jewish — have written to the Collegian to express your outrage at Cullen's letter. It gives me hope that we can come together, following the example of Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel, to engage in a respectful dialogue with those whose race or religion is different from ours, while repudiating the bigotry of the Helen Cullen's in our midst.

Student Senate explains decision

To the editor:

On Wednesday, May 3, 1995, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst Undergraduate Student Senate voted on and passed the Student Government Association's budget for Fiscal Year '96.

The budget process is extensive and complicated and started long before Wednesday night's meeting. The Senate's Ways and Means Committee met with each petitioning Registered Student Organization (RSO) and agency to discuss their financial needs for the upcoming fiscal year. The Ways and Means committee also looked at each RSO's and agencies financial records from previous fiscal years.

After this is done, the committee then determines the recommendation to the Senate for each RSO and agency. Some RSOs and agencies are recommended for decreases in their budgets due to lack of activity or frivolous spending of funds. Other groups who have traditionally received larger recommendations are cut due to the increase in number of groups requesting funding.

After deciding on the recommended budget, the proposal is brought before the Senate. The Senate then either votes on the proposed budget as it is, or makes amendments.

In making amendments, funding is increased for one particular RSO or agency by cutting from another. Finally, after all amendments have been made, the Senate votes on whether or not to pass the new proposed budget. This is what happened last Wednesday evening.

On Wednesday night, in order to allocate more money for a few of the smaller RSOs, University Productions and Concerts' (UPC) original proposed budget of $77,064 was cut by $10,000. This cut was not done to intentionally hurt UPC or bring an end to the Spring Concert.

The Senator who made the motion to take money away from UPC and give it to seven other RSOs did not single out UPC.

The major reason for the Senator's concern was UPC's inadequate financial fiscal responsibility. Fiscal responsibility is critical in times when the Ways and Means committee has to make a $30,000 cut in budgets. With this and only this in mind, he proposed the cut.

In addition to the $67,064 that UPC has been allotted for their 1996 budget, they are receiving $12,000 from the Spring Event fund. This gives them a total of $79,064 to put toward next year's Spring Concert. It has been said that UPC does not have the support of SGA. This statement is not true. In actuality, the SGA is currently working with UPC to find additional funding from as many avenues as possible. With this occurring, it can be safely said that next year's Spring Concert is not in danger and that it will occur unless UPC decides to cancel.

Chancellor offers congratulations

To the editor:

To the Class of 1995,

Within a few weeks, on May 28, the completion of your undergraduate years will be recognized.

While all graduations are a time of celebration, the graduation of the Class of 1995 is especially significant since it marks the 125th commencement of the University of Massachusetts.

The first class of the then Massachusetts Agricultural College graduated 27 individuals, all with bachelor of science degrees in a very limited number of majors. Many went on to distinguished careers in the commonwealth.

Their record of distinctive accomplishments helped to establish the notable reputation of what became, in 1947, the University of Massachusetts.

And now, 125 years later, more than 4,000 of you, in nearly 100 different majors will be graduating and making your marks not only in the commonwealth but also throughout the United States and indeed, around the world.

On behalf of the faculty and staff, I congratulate you for having successfully fulfilled the demanding course of study leading to your degree. I know it is the result of much hard work, and you have every right to be as proud of your achievement as we are of you.

I look forward to joining with you, your families, and friends on May 28 to celebrate your academic accomplishments.

Best wishes to you and best of luck in the future.

David K. Scott
Chancellor

First amendment column blasted

To the editor:

In his column "Amendments used by idiots" in the May 5 Collegian, Mark McGrath writes that "I think it's time to modify the free speech part [of the First Amendment] to say, '... or abridging the freedom of speech in cases where the speech makes any sense at all.'"

Yes, let's make all the crazy people who don't agree with us shut up. Only people who make sense should be allowed to express themselves.

Wait a moment, though. Who decides what makes sense? You? Me? The government? It's easy to suggest silencing "someone else" whom you think deserves to be censored, because of course YOU make perfect sense and YOU deserve to be heard.

But if we make censorship acceptable, how far away is the day when YOU are the target? How would you feel if the government decided that your column was unacceptable? Once the right of free speech is abridged, whoever is in power gets to make the rules.

The First Amendment protects the fundamental right of everyone to freedom of speech, regardless of whether anyone thinks that it makes sense or not.

If you think that freedom of speech wasn't meant to include what you happen to believe is wrong, consider what one of the founding fathers had to say about it: "I may disagree with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

Inspiring members of Black community move on

■ Graduates-to-be instrumental in many University activities

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

This year's crop of graduating Black seniors included among its ranks individuals whose talents ranged from varsity athletics to politics.

Service within the Black community at the University of Massachusetts and beyond was a common goal for many students in the class of 1995, with most individuals involving themselves in several RSOs and various other activities over the course of their education.

In addition, many students juggled simultaneous commitments to their organizations. Some ambitious individuals, such as Fabiola Narcisse and Kenley Obas, were even responsible for founding successful organizations on campus (the Black Student Union and Nuance, respectively).

Political controversy also accompanied the class during their studies at UMass: a takeover of New Africa House, the visit of Minister Louis Farrakhan, and protest over the handling of Black athletes' grades were some of the events which brought greater attention to the concerns of the black community.

Yet, despite the periodic racial turmoil which has been included in many seniors' experiences at UMass, academic accolade has also played a major part.

Senior Arnold Lizana, a triple major in Afro-American Studies, Political Science and Social Thought and Political Economy, has recently received multiple awards for his achievements, including the University Advancement Award and the Chancellor's Multiculturalism Award.

"Serving your community at school and serving the larger community go hand in hand," Lizana said. "Both are kind of meaningless without the other."

Theater Guild to present Simon play on family life

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

Neil Simon's award-winning play Brighton Beach Memoirs hits the Student Union Ballroom stage tonight, promising to provide an evening of both sentimental drama and lighthearted comedy.

Sponsored by the University of Massachusetts' Theater Guild, Brighton Beach chronicles the story of a Jewish family living in Brooklyn in 1937. With the nation on the brink of World War II, this family is struggling to cope with financial and family problems. Relationships between spouses, siblings, children and parents all have their strains, yet there exists family strength and unity, as well as a drive to resolve these conflicts.

The play centers around one of the young family members, Eugene, who is played by Benjamin Stanton. Neil Simon actually wrote the character of Eugene to represent himself, and Brighton Beach is actually his own memoir. This production of Brighton Beach is directed by Robert Settembro, a UMass freshman theater major. It is Settembro's fourth time directing but his first direction at UMass.

According to UMass Theater Guild publicist Kent Sahin, the cast has worked so closely together that their genuine interaction has made great difference in the quality of the play.

As for the acting, Sahin reports that "the actors have really become their characters," immersing themselves in the lives of the people of Brighton Beach.

Although the play has a serious side to it, generous doses of comedy will create a cheerful mood ideal to end the spring semester with.

Brighton Beach Memoirs will be performed in the Student Union Ballroom Wednesday through Saturday, May 10 – 13 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $4 students, $6 general public, and are available through Tix Unlimited or at the door.

Misanthrope mixes modern & classical themes

THE MISANTHROPE
Rand Theater
May 4

Originally a satirical play about Parisians during the 17th century, The Misanthrope has been recently adapted to portray the movers and shakers of Hollywood in the '90s. The original play was written by French writer Moliere with the new adaption written by British playwright, Neil Bartlett.

The play has recently been staged at the Rand Theater and will make once last string of performances May 12 to 13.

The Misanthrope was directed by Ron Spangler, who is a third year graduate student in MFA directing program and he is currently on the theater faculty at Keene State College.

"Ron was asked last year to do three plays and he really wanted to do this adaption, and it's going great. The play is very accessible to college students and when people hear that the play has been modernized, it's more well-received," said Lisa Danforth, the publicist for the theater department.

Spangler thought that this show would serve a purpose for the graduate costume designers and the actors.

"I also wanted to do this play because I love Moliere. It has been a very rewarding play to work on. I was blessed with a wonderful cast and a great design and lighting team as well," said Spangler.

The Misanthrope is a play about love, power and greed, and the characters have been turned into screenwriters. The basic plot surrounds the female lead, Celimene, who is an ambitious actress and the male lead, Alceste, who hates the phoniness of Hollywood. She represents everything that he hates, because she'll do anything to advance

New book looks at futuristic society

By Evan Ramstade
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Some people think Neal Stephenson knows more about what all this "information highway" babble is about than those who make computers or phones or software or laws.

He is one of a handful of science fiction writers, led by William Gibson (who coined the word "cyberspace") to get attention beyond the community of hardcore sci-fi fans.

It began with his 1992 book, Snow Crash, and climaxed recently with a short story he wrote for Time magazine's special issue devoted to technology. It was the only the third piece of fiction to appear in Time.

The bleak and amazing world portrayed in Snow Crash was plausible enough to become required reading in the executive suites of some technology companies. It is set 30 or so years from now in an economy reshaped by computer networks that the United States leads in only four things — music, movies, software and pizza delivery.

"I think the world divides into people who get it and don't get it," said Greg Beasley, a manager at Knowledge Adventure Worlds Inc., a developer of software that lets people create a visual representation of themself in cyberspace. "People who read Snow Crash definitely get it."

Now, Stephenson has written The Diamond Age, and this time the world is changed not just by computer networks but nanotechnology, microscopic machines measured in billionths of an inch. They allow ships to be made of diamonds, veils to change from clear to opaque and guns to be hidden in a person's forehead.

"Research is always a struggle given the facilities available, we could name lots of things that we wish we had," said Lillya.

One of those things, Lillya said, is more access to well ventilated spaces, noting that the Lederle Graduate Research Tower has less ventilated fume hoods than was originally intended.

"We're trying to do too much with the resources we've got," he said.

Nordin also stressed the importance of adequate facilities.

"It's critical for the next century that there be a new life sciences building," he said, adding that plans for such a building is in the preliminary stages.

Despite the difficulty involved in meeting the responsibilities as both researcher and educator, the professors at UMass continue to strive for excellence.

Games, prizes highlight FanFest

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

A double header of University of Massachusetts baseball, sunny skies, a slew of children — this was FanFest.

Saturday, the Minutemen collided with Atlantic 10 rival, the Bonnies of St. Bonaventure for a double-dip of action starting at noon; but the fun began before that.

Things kicked off at 10 a.m., with skills competition for kids. Kids from all surrounding towns arrived to show off their skills and win some prizes. Prizes were awarded in four categories.

First, contestants were able to test the strength of their throwing arm by firing fastballs at a target. Then hitting a baseball off a tee, kids were evaluated by their hitting technique and power of the hit off the bat.

To top those three categories off, a prize was awarded to the best overall performance. Prizes given out included hats for first place, tee-shirts for second place and batting gloves for the contestant finishing third.

Pizza and games for kids

Groups of kids were divided by age, with an eight and nine year old division, 10 and 11–year olds, and a 12-year old division.

"I thought it was cool," said nine–year–old Ben Wornia from Deerfield. "Pitching was the hardest."

As the Minutemen took the field against the Bonnies, the fun continued. Raffle tickets were sold for $1 each or an arms length for $5.

Returned foul balls enabled the fetching individual a chance at a pair of Red Sox tickets, and each UMass homerun returned by a fan was a gift certificate to the Ground Round.

At the end of the third inning in the first game, the mascots, Minuteman and Pittsfield Met, gave away free FanFest tee–shirts, and drew winners of UMass football and Hockey tickets.

Upon conclusion of the fifth inning, there was the Pittsfield Mets bat race. The winner of the race received six tickets to an upcoming Pittsfield Mets game. The loser received four. The object was for contestants to spin around a bat twenty times and under the influence of full dizziness, run to third base.

Between games, winners of skills competitions were announced, prizes awarded, and the Pizza Hut pop-up contest kicked off. Fly balls were hit to contestants, and prizes for caught baseballs were free breadsticks and pizza from Pizza Hut.

Success for sports management

FanFest was considered a success for all. The Minutemen were supported by the community, Amherst and Northampton little leagues received money raised, and the advanced sport marketing class received the experience they strived for.

FanFest was organized by the advanced sports marketing students from the Sports Management department at UMass, with the idea of targeting children eight to 12 years of age.

"FanFest provides our students with practical experience and the opportunity to apply their classroom knowledge to situations they may encounter in their professional career," said Associate Professor of sport studies William Sutton.

The sports marketing class consists of 19 students who worked with locals to gain sponsorship and donations to benefit the Amherst and Northampton little leagues. On top of local franchises helping out, the Minutemen helped their own cause, conducting instructional clinics at several local elementary schools.

"FanFest is great for the community and UMass baseball," UMass Coach Mike Stone said.

"We wanted to create awareness for UMass baseball," said Doug Reiss, a senior sports management major. "In doing that, we wanted to get hands on experience on how to promote an event."

Sponsors for the event included WHMP 99.3 FM, Pizza Hut, Saturn, Fleet Bank, Friendly's, the Ground Round and Champs sporting goods.

"We were looking for about 500 people to show up and we got about that at the peak of our day," Reiss said. "We're very happy with the turnout."

Discussion set to examine UM issues

By Purva Panday
Collegian Staff

An open forum discussion for students, faculty, staff and community members will be held on Thursday to explore different University of Massachusetts economic developments and hot–button issues, including privatization.

The event, entitled "Teach–In," is organized by the Alliance for Student Power (ASP), formerly known as the Radical Student Union.

The "Teach–In" will consist of an educational period where members of the ASP and others present will critically look at the issues on the agenda, followed by a question and answer period, said Wade Sanders, a member of the ASP.

"We are dedicated to educating and organizing student body towards political action," Sanders said.

The forum will address plans issued by Chancellor David Scott and Provost Patricia Crosson, as well as President Michael Hooker's "Plan for the year 2000" and other strategic plans for the future of the University, Sanders said.

An important issue that will be discussed at the "Teach–In" is privatization of the Campus Center Food Services, Sanders said.

"We have invited representatives of other RSOs, faculty and members of the AFSCME food service workers union to attend and talk about the issue," Sanders said.

The ASP does not have a definite position on privatization or any other issues, Sanders said.

The ASP stand is that the student and worker at the University should be involved at the highest levels of decision making, Sanders said.

"The first step toward political action is to educate ourselves," Sanders said.

'Penny' campaign comes to a close

By Stacy Barenberg
Collegian Correspondent

The Amherst Conservation Department collected $1,275.50 in pennies along with numerous foreign coins during their "Pennies for Trails" campaign in April.

The Conservation Department, an organization which enforces the Wetland Protection Laws for Massachusetts, has received numerous different ways of donating pennies. According to Ellen Knox, coordinator of the project, pennies poured in by means of socks, shoe boxes and even a 12–ounce coffee can filled, totaling $12.28.

The campaign is raising money in order to expand hiking trails throughout the Amherst area. The department's goal is to build a nine–town trail over a three year period beginning this summer, according to Ellen Knox, coordinator of the project.

"It's wonderful to have this fund well established so that during the summer months we can have workers who will work on trail maintenance and improve the whole trail system."

This campaign, held between April 6 and April 9 welcomed the public to drop off their pennies, Knox said. "Lots of people have pennies lying around in their cars, garages, etc. Why not donate them towards a good cause?"

Thousands of pennies poured into locations which held the penny deposits including the University of Massachusetts Campus Center, Hastings and Fleet Bank in Amherst center and Stop & Shop in Hadley.

Many volunteers worked throughout the busy weekend, according to Mary Donahue, a volunteer from the Conservation Department. Donahue said she was excited that her daughter has become so interested.

"It's nice to do something your child can become involved in." Her daughter has been helping out at numerous volunteer events since she was small.

The final number of pennies has not been finalized as of now. Donations can still be made at the Conservation Department.

Suspense lacking in Chamber

Grisham's latest fails to excite due to familiar characters

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

THE CHAMBER
John Grisham
Island/Dell

In his third best-seller, recently made available in paperback, John Grisham once again writes about a lawyer with a hopeless case and time tick, tick, ticking away. As with The Client, The Firm, The Pelican Brief and A Time to Kill Grisham writes about murder, mayhem and a nice solution wrapped up in 500 odd pages for your consuming pleasure.

With The Chamber, Grisham introduces Adam Hall, a 26-year-old lawyer fresh out of law school (are there any other kind?) who is snapped up by Krevitz & Banes a posh Chicago firm that pays him $53K a year.

Thousands of miles away in the sultry head of the deep South is Sam Cayhall, a death row inmate and Klu Klux Clan member convicted of killing two little Jewish boys in a historical bombing escapade. Cayhall has been sitting in Perchman for the past decade or slow just waiting to be gassed.

So where's the link? Well, there is two actually. The first is that Krevitz and Banes once represented Cayhall as a pro bono case until he fired them. And two is that Adam is really Sam's long lost grandson that disappeared with his family because of the shame Sam brought onto the family.

Adam of course travels to Mississippi and confronts not only his grandfather but his tremulous past as his (surprise?) lawyer. Throw in a suicide, an alcoholic aunt, an older wiser mentor, flashy governor and militant warden and you have the makings of a best-seller and yes, a possible motion picture.

Readers of the author are familiar with the Grisham formula, a lawyer yearning to do good who is either old and washed up or young and optimistic. Someone has a drinking problem, there is always a conspiracy and in the end the good guy always wins.

So why keep reading? 'Cause half way through Grisham waves his magic wand and sprinkles his fairy dust slowly making sense of everything he's been throwing out. You begin to pity Adam, yet admire his perseverance and slowly, very slowly you begin to shed a tear for poor Sam even when you know it was going to happen eventually.

The end is interesting and surprisingly not what you expected (re: no knight in shining armor here), but if Grisham ended it any other way you could sufficiently write him off as another Clancy. The key to writing a series of book on the same topic is to make the characters interesting and keep the plot different and moving. Grisham has to learn to change it before his readers get bored.

Fans of the novelist should look for the reference to his first book in the plot. If anything, you should read it form the education it gives you on death row procedures but expect a slow and bumpy ride.

her career, but all he wants is truth and honesty.

The rest of the plot was lost from the beginning, mainly because of the dialogue. The entire script was just like one extremely long poem. Every single line rhymed with the one that followed it. After a while, one became completely lost.

The play was rhyming so much that in order to understand what was going on, you had to sit there and concentrate on every single word that was being said, and that was not something that was very easy to do. Many people felt the same way because after intermission an entire row had left, as well as some people from the other rows.

A highlight of the production was the costumes and set design. The costumes were a mixture of 17th century costumes and period garb, and they were all designed in the costume shop on campus. The 17th century costumes were so authentic that a viewer never would have guessed that were just created. The set design was fantastic, especially because of the way that they transformed a room from the 17th century into a modern day Hollywood-style living room. The costumes were designed by Ulises Alcala, a third year graduate student in MFA costume design program and the sets were designed by Kyle Higgins, who is a graduate student in this field.

For anyone that is interested in seeing a rhyming play with great sets and costumes this is the play to see.

The Misanthrope will be playing this weekend May 12 to 13 at the Rand Theater in the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are $3.50 for students with I.D.; $6 general public.

What happened in Concord in 1775?
LET'S BE HONEST. YOU'RE ASKING ME ABOUT CONCORD? I RELY ON THE BUS DRIVER TO FIND MY OWN HOUSE FROM HERE... CONCORD COULD BE ON METEORE FOR ALL I KNOW
AND WHAT HAPPENED 226 YEARS AGO?? I'M A KID. I DON'T KNOW WHAT'S GOING ON NOW. I DON'T HAVE A SENSE OF CONTEXT FOR ANY OF THIS. IT'S HOPELESS. HISTORICALLY, HOPELESS.

My dad wants me to start reading the paper so that I can understand the world better and develop opinions.

So, I was reading that this handyman had his station wagon packed with tools. He stopped fast and this crowbar comes flying forward and goes right into his head and comes out the other side.

This really happened. I'm not kidding.

He drives himself to the hospital.....with a headache.... they take it out and he's alive and well.....

Still, in my opinion, I think there should be a 5 day waiting period and background check before you can buy a crowbar.

Four homeruns aid UMass to Senior Day victory

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Solid relief pitching from sophomore Jason Bennett and substantial production in key situations from the meat of the Minutemen order led the way as Massachusetts held on for a 12–11 win in its final home game of the regular season over New Hampshire.

Batters 3–6 in the UMass order were a combined 8–for–17 with four home runs and 11 RBIs to pace the Atlantic 10 champions.

In two straight at–bats, Mark Pileski cracked his fourth and fifth dingers of the year, the latter providing the winning margin in the game. After starting off slow at the plate, the shortstop feels his bat is coming around.

"I'm feeling a lot better at the plate," Pileski said. "I am more comfortable in the batter's box and I can see the ball better."

With the score 12–7 after seven innings, the Wildcats got three hits and took advantage of two errors by third baseman David Giglio. Junior reliever David Darr's wild pitch cut the lead to two with runners at first and second and nobody out.

Bring on Bennett.

New Hampshire used a sacrifice bunt and fly to get another run home, but couldn't manage another hit and failed to tie the game against Bennett.

Bennett then returned to the mound for the ninth and the Wildcats went 1–2–3, to preserve the victory. To the right– handed reliever, it was just another day at the office.

"I just wanted to give the team a chance to win," Bennett said about entering with the game–tying runs already on base. "I just tried to hit the corners with my pitches and leave those guys on."

In an action–filled first inning, senior Bill Knight took New Hampshire starter Eric Mayo deep over the Earl Lorden Field fence in left center for a three run homer to give the Minutemen the early lead.

The UMass defense was sharp early in the game. Pete Gautreau was credited with two assists in first, as he threw out leadoff–man Scott Ivens trying to stretch a single into a double.

Then, as Mark Spofford tried to score on a Bill Watson double, Pileski took the cutoff, and threw a bullet to catcher Andy Pelis for the out at home.

That was the end of the solid defense, as the two teams committed a total of five errors in the game.

The Wildcats' took the lead in the top of the third as they got four runs in the inning on five hits and a walk off starting pitcher, freshman Jeff Puleri.

The lead didn't last through the inning, as the home half saw Muchie Dagliere lay a perfect bunt down the third base line for a single.

Nate Murphy followed with a single, which sent Dagliere to third. After striking out Knight, Dagliere scored on a wild pitch from Mayo.

Pelis drove the next pitch over the 370 ft. mark In left center for his seventh home run of the year.

The contribution of Knight and Pelis on senior day was not lost on head coach Mike Stone.

"It was nice to see them hit those home runs today," Stone said. "It helped us win the ballgame, because it was a struggle today. Hopefully we will be playing for a while."

The Minutemen return to action today as they will conclude their regular season in Cambridge, as they take on Harvard. Game time is 3 p.m.

Seniors sparkle, crank Wildcats

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

If the top–seeded Minutemen can capture the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament this weekend, yesterday's game may not have been the four UMass seniors' final game at Earl Lorden Field. But if it was, the graduating Minutemen went out with a bang.

Seniors Bill Knight, Jeff Michaels, Andy Pelis and Jay Murphy were all honored in a pregame ceremony. While Murphy didn't pitch in the home regular season finale, the other three accounted for six hits, including two homeruns and six RBI, as the Massachusetts baseball team (32–12) escaped senior day, with a 12–11 win over New Hampshire.

Coach Mike Stone was hesitant about thinking of the seniors' departure, hoping to extend the season considerably before he really starts to reflect.

"We're really going to miss those guys," he said. "Hopefully we're still going to play for a while."

Knight entered the game in the midst of one of the best seasons ever for a Massachusetts slugger. He set UMass records for homers, RBI, and total bases for a single season and career.

It didn't take him long to build on those records yesterday afternoon, as the Holliston native launched a three–run blast over the 370 feet sign in left center field, his 17th of the season. He would add a double in the fourth to finish a 2–4 day.

Knight showed his arm strength as well, throwing a runner out at the plate in the third.

After the game, Knight reflected on his career at Massachusetts.

"It's been pretty memorable," Knight said. "I had a great career here, and I'm really happy I came here. I made a lot of friends and played with a lot of great players. I hope we come back after the tournament, because I want to keep on playing."

Andy Pelis only had one hit on the afternoon, but he made it count. The Northampton native smacked his seventh dinger of the season over the left field fence.

"It was nice to hit a homerun on my last day, but it was nice to win," said Pelis, who said that the team needs to take the attitude that they will be back for the play–in game. "I think we have to go in with that attitude. We have to have a positive attitude going into the tournament."

"Andy has improved tremendously since he came here," Stone said. "He's been the best catcher around for the last couple of years."

While Michaels didn't get in on the homerun parade, the designated hitter went 3–5 on the afternoon. The transfer from Florida International was nostalgic following the victory.

"It was sad to think my college career is coming to an end," he said.

"Jeff Michaels has provided a lot of pluses for us as a hitter and a pitcher, coming here form Florida International," Stone said.

Jordan made–for–TV, Spurs finals–bound

Jorma Kansanen on NBA Basketball

It was the start of the end–of–the–semester push for me at that time; and my English major's inherent need to look at the works of the past for inspiration got to me.

I thought the Celtics team of the long–ago '80s was back on the court, once again. Looking into my figurative crystal ball, I pictured the matchup of the crafty veteran center (Robert Parish) against up–and–coming superstar Shaquille O'Neal. The man from French Lick against ... well, whoever.

Then, the matchup of the series; McHale vs. Grant, ex– Golden Gopher against ex–Bull. The guards then take the court, as Danny Ainge and Nick Anderson light each other up contiguously. Penny Hardaway burns Dennis Johnson in Game Four, pulling a Jordan–esque 50 points out of his hat. But all to no avail, as the quest for the franchise's 17th banner continues in a 3–1 first–round win.

Finally, I wake up on the floor with my face in my English Anthology, the Celts bumrushed out the door and another mediocre season finished. The chance for a higher draft pick, with the opportunity to begin a new winning era, was lost with their late season push. And I am lost in the damnable complex called the "forever fan/homer."

So, better luck next year, hallowed Green and White.

• The major media moguls are wetting their ... pens right now, ready to sign those massive income checks from the sports world's No. 1 matchup of the year.

I have a dire confession to make.

A little over a week ago, after the Boston Celtics win on the road in Orlando, I actually had the nerve to think they had a chance to take the series.

Do not crucify me, though ... because I was the unknowing victim of a cruel flashback.

Agassi vs. Sampras.

No, no, no. Shaq vs. Jordan.

They play two completely different positions, two completely opposing styles. But the one thing that O'Neal and Jordan have in common is money–making potential. No matter how the series ends up, the higher–ups in the TV business are now praising the skies for MJ's return to his original karma state. Consequently, one of the two poster boys of the NBA will be in the Eastern Conference Finals.

For the game of basketball itself, it was totally unnatural seeing Jordan falter last Sunday, especially at a juncture of the game where he usually rises above the heathen masses.

Will Michael return to the form of old?

Will Michael take this setback and torch the Magic for fifty points, as he once did so long ago?

Tune in and watch. The TV gods will thank you kindly.

• 22's were firing off in the San Antonio air Monday night. No, it was not leftover Cinco de Mayo celebrants out in the streets, but David Robinson and Dennis Rodman inside the arena.

The stellar Spurs frontcourt seemed to be one with the number, as they both touched upon this figure in their final stats from their 97–90 OT win over the Lakers. Robinson scored 22, but on a hideous 6–26 shooting effort from the field. But don't worry David, Vlade Divac was just as bad, shooting 3–12 and missing two free throws with the game on the line.

As for Robinson's mate, Dennis Rodman scored 22 points and pulled down 22 rebounds, as well. I can see the totals in rebounds, since he is the modern prototype of the obnoxious son–of–a ... I mean, force off the glass. For the Worm, scoring over five points in one game is reason enough to mark the date on the calendar, but over 20?

Somebody better throw water on him, because if he starts to smoke, the Lakers are looking at a four–game sweep.

Better yet, do not throw water on him. You might accidently wash off his new hair color back to the original, and he is already ugly enough.

Sorry, Phoenix/Houston. The Spurs are Finals bound.

Team key for Devils' lead; Alexander going pro

By Tom Canavan
Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Shutting out the Boston Bruins in the first two games of the playoffs hasn't been a simple case of New Jersey Devils' goaltender Martin Brodeur stopping everything.

That kind of talk annoys Devils' coach Jacques Lemaire. As far as he's concerned, blanking the Bruins has been a team effort, something New Jersey has suddenly found after a season of searching.

The Devils will look to take a 3-0 lead in the best-of-7 series on Wednesday night when they return to the Meadowlands Arena for the first of two straight home games. Game 4 is scheduled Friday.

"I think the thing is we had 20 guys working the past two games and we didn't have that at times in the season," Lemaire said. "We could feel through the season our team was good, and that if 20 guys wanted to come out and play, we could achieve a lot."

What the Devils did in Boston Garden was stunning. In beating the Bruins 5-0 on Sunday and 3-0 on Monday, New Jersey dominated almost from start to finish.

Brodeur stopped all 46 Bruins shots in the two games and even more remarkably, he didn't have to face an odd-man Boston rush.

"I don't want to say Marty is 60 percent and the team is 40 percent of the shutout. I can't say that," Lemaire said. "I just feel that he gets a shutout because the guys are playing well and he is playing well."

Brodeur said the Bruins haven't had many great scoring chances, and the ones they have gotten, he's stopped.

"I feel good," said Brodeur, who did not skate in the Devils' optional workout Tuesday. "I'm lucky enough to have those shutouts. That's it. But it's a credit to the team the way we are playing. It's unbelievable."

Brodeur will have a chance to match a Stanley Cup record Wednesday if he records a third straight shutout. Clint Benedict of the Montreal Maroons did it in 1926 and Frank McCool matched that in 1945.

"Marty is staying really focused and controlling his rebounds, and he is getting a lot of help from people in front," Devils assistant coach Larry Robinson said. "But I'm an ex-defenseman. I've always believed that defense is six guys on the ice. You're only as good as the people in front of you."

Brodeur said the Devils gained a lot of confidence in dominating the Bruins Sunday, but he added the key will be to continue to work.

While the Bruins have their work cut out for them, they don't face an impossible task. The Devils trailed Boston 2-0 in the Eastern Conference semifinals last year after losing the first two games at home, but then won the next four.

"It's not the position we wanted to be in, 0-2 going into their building," Bruins defenseman Ray Bourque said. "But we've got to fight through it and dig ourselves out."

Alexander to test NBA waters

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (AP) — Corey Alexander, whose career at Virginia was marked first by promise and then by season-ending injuries, has applied for early entry to the NBA draft.

The 6-foot-1 junior point guard played only 11 minutes in the 1993-94 season opener before he broke his ankle. He returned as a redshirt last season and broke the same ankle Feb. 8 against North Carolina State.

Mike Colley, Virginia's assistant sports information director, said Alexander filed the early-entry papers Monday. He said Alexander's decision was no surprise to the Cavaliers.

"He said at our media day back in October that he was going to go pro, and he reiterated it the day he got injured," Colley said.

As a sophomore in 1992-93, Alexander averaged a team-high 18.8 points and 4.6 assists. He was voted to the all-Atlantic Coast Conference second team and was a first-team all-ACC tournament selection.

Unforgettable hoop season for University

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The season is more than a month completed, and the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is still the topic of many a conversation.

The head coach it has is highly sought after by other college basketball and NBA teams alike, regarded as one of the top young coaches in the collegiate game. An assistant coach is named coach at the University of Nevada Las Vegas, despite not having any head coaching experience thus far. A player is expected to be putting an NBA cap on come draft day, and the sports world is waiting for his sophomore teammate to make the decision as to if he will do the same.

With a team like the University of Massachusetts men's basketball squad, it does not have to be in season for the interest to be there. As for John Calipari, Bill Bayno, Lou Roe, Marcus Camby and the boys, they impressed many during the 1994-95 season.

As the team was collecting championship rings and embarking on NCAA Tournament trips, Lou Roe was piling up individual accomplishments. The 1994-95 season was the collegiate finale for Roe, and he responded with 16.5 ppg 8.1 rpg.

And as all the attention is given to Massachusetts and its ongoings in the off-season, the success that the program achieved over the course of last season is realized. When Calipari is mentioned in conversation, when Bayno was at the press conference to announce his position. When Lou shakes hands with NBA commissioner David Stern in June, when Marcus Camby makes publicly makes his long-awaited decision. The achievement of the Minutemen was obvious after the 1994-95 season.

A season that will forever be remembered.

And it won't be too hard to recall since the Minutemen etched their name into the record book in more than one instance over the five month period. Massachusetts, who finished with a 29-5 overall record (13-3 in A-10), became the first New England team to ever be ranked No. 1 after spending a week in the position (from Nov. 28 to Dec. 4) following its 104-80 victory over defending champion Arkansas in the Tip-Off Classic. In addition, the No. 1 ranking marked the first time any Massachusetts team had been ranked first nationally in any sport.

Later on in the season, the Minutemen spent four straight weeks at the top spot in the Associated Press and USA Today/CNN polls from Jan. 9 to Jan. 30. They remained as one of the top eight teams in the country throughout the entire season, and headed into postseason at No. 7.

The Minutemen advanced to the Elite Eight, something no other team in Massachusetts basketball history.

That came after the Minutemen wrapped up their fourth consecutive A-10 Tournament title, which was after their fourth consecutive regular season A-10 championship. In doing so, Massachusetts became only the second team in NCAA history to accomplish both conference feats for four straight years.

As the team was collecting championship rings and embarking on NCAA Tournament trips, Lou Roe was piling up individual accomplishments. The 1994-95 season was the collegiate finale for Roe, and he responded with 16.5 ppg 8.1 rpg.

The 6-foot 7-inch Atlantic City native was named to the second team All-America team by the Associated Press, the first Massachusetts player ever to be so honored. Roe was also a John Wooden Award finalist, given annually to the nation's best player. As for conference honors, he grabbed all of them — First Team All-Atlantic 10, A-10 Player of the Year, the A-10 Tournament Most Valuable Player. Roe became the first player in conference history to be named to four straight all-tournament teams.

In addition to multiple honors, Roe became Massachusetts' all-time leading rebounder, passing the previous mark held by Julius Erving.

All his accomplishments were acknowledged at the Minutemen's postseason banquet, as John Calipari tearfully announced Roe's No. 15 jersey will be put up high into the William D. Mullins Center.

Another jersey that could very well be retired in the near future may be No. 21, as in sophomore center Marcus Camby. The 6-foot 10-inch, 220 pounder from Hartford, CT was far from jinxed during his sophomore campaign, as his game improved a considerable amount from his award- winning freshman season. Camby averaged 13.9 ppg and 6.2 rpg, while swatting 103 shots on the defensive end.

When Roe arrived in Amherst back in the fall of 1991, so did Derek Kellogg (8.2 ppg, 128 assists, team-leading .825 FT. As Roe went from A-10 Rookie if the Year to All-America in four years, Kellogg went from playing sparingly in his freshmen year, to being the floor general for the latter of his collegiate career.

The 6-foot 2-inch Springfield native enjoyed his best season as a Minuteman, which was fitting since it was his senior year. Kellogg was named to the Third Team All Atlantic 10, as well as the conference's All-Academic Team for the third consecutive season.

Donia Bright had a solid junior season, averaging 9.2 ppg and 4.6 rpg, and was named to the Third Team All-A-10 along with Kellogg. Dana Dingle was the consummate role player for the Minutemen all season long, pulling down 5.5 rpg while averaging 7.0 ppg.

Edgar Padilla (7.1 ppg, 98 assists, 42 steals) and Carmelo Travieso (5.3 ppg, 38-113 .336 from three-point land) stepped up their play in the absence of Mike Williams (12.2 ppg, 66 assists in 20 games) over the final 12 contests of the season. Williams was suspended prior to the Feb. 16 game at Duquesne for violating team rules.

UMass teams reach new heights during winter

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

In a winter where the weather was unusually warm outside, the UMass athletic teams kept the heat on inside as well. Combined, the UMass winter squads compiled an impressive 106-69-4 record for a .592 winning percentage.

The men's and women's basketball teams were large contributors to that record as they combined for 48 of those 100+ wins (see related stories). The men reached the elite eight of the big dance, and were ranked 7th in the final polls, while the women placed fifth in the post-season N.I.T. and received their first votes in the national polls.

The hockey team, although accounting for 28 of the university's 69 losses, came up with two up the more memorable wins of the season. including Maine's first Hockey East loss of the year.

The hockey team, although accounting for 28 of the university's 69 losses, came up with two up the more memorable wins of the season. First they knocked off No. 1 ranked Maine, the Black Bears first Hockey East loss of the year, then won their first ever Hockey East playoff game over a tradition rich Boston College hockey program.

However there were also many others that contributed to the tremendous record established by the University's teams.

The up and coming women's gymnastics squad burst upon the national scene by shocking Top 20 ranked West Virginia in Morgantown.

The up and coming women's gymnastics squad burst upon the national scene by shocking Top 20 ranked West Virginia in Morgantown. The Lady Mountaineers had never lost in the the Atlantic 10 and had this one meet left before jumping ship to the Big East. Massachusetts gave them a not so sweet sendoff, as the Minutewomen recorded their season best point total in upsetting West Virginia 190.925-190.725.

As a team, they were 14-12 over the season while competing against several national powers, the likes of Georgia and Michigan. The team placed fourth at the NCAA Regionals and three of the team members competed for individual titles at the event. Junior J.J. Tolhurst won the women's all-around at Regionals receiving the automatic bid to the NCAA Championships.

The mens' gymnastics team enjoyed similar success. The start of the season was a bit slow for the Minutemen, but once they built up steam, they rolled up a record of 9-2 and were a major force at the end of the season.

The highlight of the season came as the Orangemen invaded Boyden gym and left with one more loss on their record then when they arrived, as they were disposed of 225.05-224.60 by the Minutemen. The momentum they took from that meet carried over to the New England Championships, where they captured their 7th straight title. The following week, Massachusetts hosted the ECAC Championships and won the event over defending champions William & Mary.

Individuals who excelled for the Minutemen were freshman Kevin Schwartz and sophomore Ruslan Shupak, who both qualified for NCAA Regionals. Schwartz's 9.80 on the still rings at regionals qualified him for the Championships, where he finished 9th. Shupak was making his second appearance at the regionals on the vault.

The women's indoor track team was also a success, running their record to 7-1. A second place finish at the Atlantic 10 Championships was a positive sign.

Stellar performances were turned in by senior Kelly Liljeblad, who qualified for the NCAA Championships by setting a school record in the 3000 meters with a time of 9:36.67, and freshman Rosie Bryan qualified for the ECAC Championships in two events, the long jump and the 55 meter hurdles. Keeping pace with the woman indoor tracksters were the men, with a record of 6-2-1. The team headed to Boston to compete in the New England Challenge Cup and came home with second place overall. The A-10 Championships brought a fourth place finish for the Minutemen.

Individuals who had tremendous personal success were junior middle distance runner Ethan Nedeau and senior captain, long and triple jumper, Tom Galligani. Both Nedeau and Galligani were named to the All Academic A- 10 Indoor Track team in their respective events.

Women's swimming was making waves this year as well, with their record of 7-4-1. The swimmin' Minutewomen took first place at the Rhode Island Invitational and placed fifth at the A-10 Championships.

Also at the A-10s, junior Sarah Baker was the first Minutewomen to win an individual title as she took the 800 meter freestyle.

Freshman Karen Sonnwald splashed onto the scene in a major way setting three separate school records this season as she now holds the 500 (5:01.17 at the ECAC Championships), 1000 (10:23.99 at Dartmouth), and 1650 (17:12.47 A-10's) meter freestyle times.

Mens' swimming didn't quite live up to expectations as their streak of eight straight New England Championships ended, but did win the Rhode Island Invitational and managed a record of 9-4.

Junior Keith McLardy set the school record in the 200m backstroke and the 400m individual medley and senior Tim Milbert set the record in the 100m breaststroke.

All Academic A-10 selections for both swim teams were Jeff Shearstone and John Luviano for the men, Baker and Toni Youngdahl for the women.

A step toward the national spotlight

The 1994-95 women's basketball season can be described in many words.

Groundbreaking. Unprecedented. Emerging. But maybe even a little disappointing.

The Minutewomen won a school record 19 games and finished second in the tough Atlantic 10 conference, their best finish ever. They also recieved their first-ever invitation to the National Women's Invitational Tournament, held in Amarillo, Texas.

"The tournament was just a great experience to come down and play three games against good competition."

Coach Joanie O'Brien was honored as the 1994-95 A-10 Coach of the Year. Melissa Gurile was named to the All A- 10 First Team, Octavia Thomas the All A-10 Second Team and Crystal Carroll the All A-10 Third Team.

The Minutewomen went into the Atlantic 10 Tournament as the No. 2 seed, a favorite to reach the championship game and possibly gain an NCAA bid. Yet, they were upset by No. 7 seed West Virginia in the first round. One win in the A-10 tournament would have likely given the Minutewomen an at-large bid. and a trip to Storrs, Conn., for the East Regionals.

Instead, the Minutewomen were headed to Amarillo for the NWIT as the No. 5 seed in the eight-team tournament. UMass won their first round game over Virginia Commonwealth to become the only Atlantic 10 team to ever advance into the championship round at the NWIT, but lost in the semi-finals to eventual champion Texas A&M, and in the third place game to Notre Dame.

Even with the poor showing in the final two games of the NWIT, the Minutewomen drew praise from Texas A&M coach Candi Harvey.

"I think they're a tough basketball team. They're hardnosed and they're physical," she said. "I think Joanie's done a tremendous job. She's just going to continue to take that program to a very, very high level."

That high level could come next season.

This year, junior stars Gurile and Thomas continued to emerge as two of the best players in the conference. Gurile averaged a team-high 15.6 points per game while Thomas was second on the team with 15.2 ppg and first on the team with 7.8 rebounds per game. Both Gurile and Thomas scored the 1,000 points of their careers this season.

Sophomores Carroll and Beth Kuzmeski also had solid years. Kuzmeski set the UMass all-time career three-point ers made record with 103 while averaging 9.2 ppg. Carroll backed up her outstanding freshman season with an equally- impressive sophomore campaign, finishing third on the team in scoring with a 10.9 average.

Junior Tricia Hopson had a solid year in becoming the starting point guard seven games into the season, while fellow junior Nicole Carter was a spark plug off the bench. In the Minutewomen's final game against Notre Dame, Carter saw 21 minutes of action and responded with six points and a team-high four assists.

Newcomers Sabriya Mitchell, Tez Krafi and Kara Tudman all showed signs of what's to come in the future. Krafi was especially impressive in the NWIT. In UMass' victory over VCU, she scored a team-high 24 points in leading the Minutewomen, while Mitchell and Tudman showed progress throughout the year.

"The tournament was just a great experience to come down and play three games against good competition," O'Brien said. "You don't normally get that chance. So this opportunity was great and we're happy we got a chance to play.

"I think we learned an awful lot. I told the kids I've learned probably more in the last 10 days about this team as individuals so I can have a good feeling going into next year about who I can really count on."

Second season memorable for UMass ice hockey

By Ted Kottler

The coaches of Hockey East shocked all in attendance at the league's annual Media Day by picking the University of Massachusetts ... last.

But if those eight men in charge of superior talent with far more experience think UMass made them look good by finishing a distant ninth, they're wrong. The Minutemen, with just two juniors and one senior on their roster, scored several victories that proved they were more than just a first- year team in the country's top conference.

The future looks bright for UMass, with only Corcoran gone from the roster.

January 28, 1995: UMass 4, Maine 2. In twenty years, this improbable outcome may be forgotten, but for the time being it serves as a constant reminder that anyone can beat anyone else. The Black Bears, ranked No. 1 at the time and two months away from a date with Hockey East rival Boston University for the national championship, chewed up and spit UMass out the night before, 7-2.

But the record crowd of 6,834 went home happy after witnessing a near-perfect performance by the underdog. Brian Regan paced the effort with 51 saves and Blair Wagar scored two goals. UMass coach Joe Mallen's office was flooded with congratulatory phone calls from colleagues, friends and media.

It was only UMass' fifth win of the season, and it actually came much easier than the first on December 31, 1994.

While others made plans to ring in the new year, UMass hoped it wouldn't begin 1995 winless. In its first 14 games, the Minutemen went 0-13-1. But at 4:12 of overtime, Warren Norris beat Irish goaltender Matt Eisler and the 4-3 victory spawned a fine stretch in which UMass went 5-4-1, including the Maine upset.

The following week UMass won its first ever Hockey East game, topping Boston College 5-3 at the Mullins Center January 7. BC transfer Sal Manganaro scored two goals and Dave Kilduff made 32 saves for his first win over a Division I team.

UMass demonstrated its resilience when it played for the second time in Providence's Schneider Arena on January 20. The first time broke the Minutemen's hearts: they squandered a pair of one-goal leads and surrendered a goal on a late 5-on-3 for the Friars in the 5-4 comeback.

But it was all Minutemen in the return, as they sped to a 4-0 lead and won handily 7-3, their only regular season road win in Hockey East.

UMass went on a tailspin to close the regular season, dropping ten consecutive contests, but there was one magical evening left, and again the Minutemen put the spell on the Eagles. In the Hockey East Tournament play-in game at Kelley Rink, UMass righted itself for a 5-4 upset over Mallen's former employer. Dale Hooper's goal late in regulation gave UMass its first lead of the game and ensured one more game on the schedule.

That was UMass' quarterfinal date at Maine's storied Alfond Arena, where UMass hung tough but couldn't prevail as the Black Bears advanced with a 7-4 win.

After the game it was learned that senior defenseman Brian Corcoran had been offered a contract by the NHL Mighty Ducks of Anaheim, which he recently signed. Corcoran will play with Anaheim's new top affiliate, as its IHL San Diego Gulls are re-locating.

The future looks bright for UMass, with only Corcoran gone from the roster. Mallen inked Cushing Academy star center Steve McKinnon for 1995-96 and more help on the blueline, where UMass needs it most, may be on the way.

Springfield's Rob Bonneau led UMass in scoring for the second straight year with 14 goals and 12 assists for 26 points. Tom Perry was second (7-18-25), Norris third (13-8- 21), Regan won three games, Kilduff won two and Rich Moriarty won one.

We win!

Water polo and crew emerge from title IX

By Chris Stamm and Teri Klein
Collegian Staff

"No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."
–Title IX

Women's collegiate athletic programs across the country are gaining increased support through the congressional law known as Title IX. This act requires colleges and universities who receive federal funds to give women an equal opportunity to participate in athletics.

To meet Title IX requirements, schools are obliged to expand athletic programs for women, accommodate the athletic interests and abilities of women, or provide equal representation in athletic programs based on gender enrollment in the school.

The University of Massachusetts is distinguishing itself as a school on the verge of meeting Title IX requirements. This past year, UMass has up-graded the women's crew and women's water polo teams to varsity status in order to expand the athletic interests of women.

Massachusetts women's water polo coach Bob Newcomb commended the University on its handling of the law.

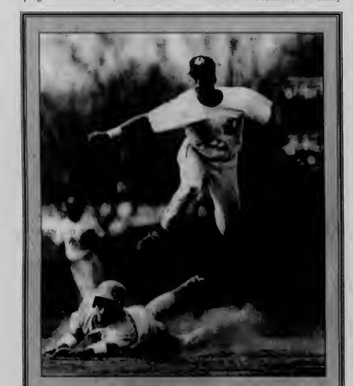
"This was something UMass needed to do and people should see the way that they approached Title IX," he said. "They attempted to increase support for women and did not attempt to comply to the rule by dropping men's programs."

With the institution of a varsity program comes the expanded budget which has contributed to the success of both teams. The extra financial assistance provided by the University offered benefits teams of the past could only dream of.

"By being raised to a varsity sport we get funding for everything we need. If you're funded you're looking at the possibility of getting recruits, paid coaches instead of volunteers, team uniforms and equipment," Massachusetts women's water polo assistant coach Dan McAuliffe said.

"We now have a budget to take care of transportation and purchasing equipment equal to other sports. It's much more than having a shingle over the office door saying varsity sport," Massachusetts women's crew coach Jim Dietz said.

While these teams may have been created in part to comply with the law, they have all ready proved their strength in competition. A quick glance at both teams' inaugural seasons proves that they have come a long way in a short period of time.



The UMass women's crew has made the most of their new–found varsity status. Both the varsity and junior varsity crews finished their regular seasons undefeated. In addition, the Minutewomen won both the Visitors and California Cups in the San Diego Crew Classics at the San Diego Crew Classics in San Diego, Calif. held in the beginning of April. These victories qualified UMass to compete in next April's prestigious Whittier Cup. The crew's victorious season has earned both the varsity and junior varsity No. 1 seeds in the New England Rowing Championships.

"By the last race of the fall, we started to see that we could go very fast in a short period of time. I think we made the jump well and were competitive right off the bat," Dietz said.

The women's water polo team had similar success this season. In its premier varsity debut, the team accomplished something never before attained in school history — a national ranking. The Minutewomen, who are currently ranked at No. 20, played an ambitious schedule against top teams in the east and west. In the Eastern Championship, UMass defeated No. 16 Princeton, their first vietory over a ranked team in the history of the program.

Newcomb said he was pleased with the way the season culminated.

"Having finished on a high note this season, I say it went well. The commitment that the players made to the program as opposed to being a club was terrific. They responded very well to the institution of the varsity program," Newcomb said.

The women's water polo and crew programs are on the rise and gaining exposure and interest. With the aid of Title IX, women's athletics at UMass and universities across the nation are slowly but surely gaining status.

Cannella and Donnelly return to site of glory days

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has made a concerted effort to become one of the top athletic programs in the nation. With the head coaching positions at the schools two of the programs with the most tradition vacant, the athletic department turned to alums to keep that tradition alive.

With Pam Hixon was named coach of the United States Field Hockey team for the 1996 Olympics, she had to take a two–year hiatus from her coaching position at UMass.

In her absence, the program needed to find someone maintain the programs level of excellence while Hixon was gone.

"I think there is a desire to be outstanding on a national level in all sports. When you're given the resources and the opportunity and the support to acheive at that level, the motivational level is sky high."

Donnelly was one of the most decorated collegiate field hockey players of all time. Under Hixon, she was a four– time All–American, amassing 41 goals and five assists in her career. She received the Broderick award, collegiate field hockey's highest honor after her senior year, and was named to the All–Decade team for the 1980.

After working as an assistant at several schools, Donnelly was named head coach at Rhode Island. She improved that program, helping it return to the Atlantic 10 tournament, but when Hixon was named national coach, Donnelly jumped at the opportunity to return home.

"It really is a great experience to be able to come back for a lot of reasons," Donnelly said. "One of the big reasons is that playing here was four of my best years. It's an honor to be able to give something back to a place that means so much to you. You just have such a strong feeling about the place."

Then UMass assistant Greg Cannella thought then head coach Ted Garber would be coaching at Massachusetts for thirty years. His father Richard Garber, had been at UMass for thirty five years, and and there was no reason to believe that Ted's tenure would be any shorter.

When Garber resigned shortly before the 1994–95 academic year, Cannella was named interim head coach. After an search process that had some high profile names interviewing for the vacancy, Cannella was elevated to full time head coach. At 29, he is the youngest head coach in Division I lacrosse.

"It's something I believed would never happen. It is a dream," he said. "I haven't actually settled down yet and thought about everything. It's definitely a dream. I'm still very excited. It's a great opportunity for me as an alum."

Cannella played two seasons (1986–87) under Dick Garber. He scored 33 goals and 31 assists.

Cannella said that coaching at his alma mater is a great source of pride.

"You come to work everday with a certain amount pride. I've dedicated myself the University and the program," he said. "You know what it means to play there, you know what the programs all about, you already love it. You can really feel sincere in talking about the traditions, because you've been part of it."

The duo joins Russ Yarworth as UMass alums coaching at their Alma matters.

Both coaches feel that there is a considerable change for the better in the athletic administration, since their playing days.

"I think there is a desire to be outstanding on a national level in all sports," Donnelly said. "That is the goal of the department. That is the difference. When you're given the resources and the opportunity and the support to acheive at that level, the motivational level is sky high."

Cannella points to Athletic Director Bob Marcum's hands–on approach as a key to the formula for success.

"The administration is outstanding right now. Bob Marcum is a great leader," Cannella said. "He really is a coach's athletic director. He'll support you with what you need to make your program successful. He has a great repoire with the coaches. He has made himself available for the athletes. When I was a player here, I didn't know who the athletic director was."

UMass makes return trip to NCAA water polo tourney

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

With the abundance of top 20 sports teams this year for the University of Massachusetts, the men's water polo team (30–9) might have been left in the others' considerable shadows. Its final ranking of No. 11 nationally capped off a season that had its own share of measurable moments on both individual and team bases.

Team–wise, the Minutemen set a new school record of thirty wins in a season, with no other water polo team in the country accomplishing that feat this past year. November 6th at the Smith Swimming Center on the historic campus of Brown University, they made their own history with their second straight Eastern Championship in a row, defeating Navy, 9–6. The resulting automatic bid to the NCAA Championships in Long Beach, Ca. brought them in as the best team on the East Coast, with their No. 6 seed proving that status.

"Making the NCAAs is the pinnacle of achievement for any college team," coach Russ Yarworth said. "We had 30 wins this year, and no one in the country had 30 wins.

"We made NCAAs, and were Eastern Champions for two years in a row. No one can take that away from us."

Individually, the four year run of their offensive catalyst, Javier Gonzalez, came to a close with him shattering single season and career school records left and right. The 1994 season brought his scoring tenure immense dividends, breaking the single season records in six categories by wide margins; including points (187), goals (117), assists (64) and steals (51).

With his career, the 1992 New England Most Valuable Player and 1993 first team All–Eastern Region selection set career records that could become untouchable. First in seven categories, marks in points (411), goals (289), and assists scored (106) outdistance his past UMass competitors, like former All–American Tasan Engin, by 100 points in certain instances.

"Making the NCAAs is the pinnacle of achievement for any college team," coach Russ Yarworth said. "We had 30 wins this year, and no one in the country had 30 wins. "We made NCAAs, and were Eastern Champions for two years in a row. No one can take that away from us."

"For me, it is incredible leaving here as a champion," Gonzalez said after their second straight Eastern Championship crown. "When I first started in this program, we lost in the first round of the Easterns. Now to win it the last two years, it feels great."

Juniors Luis Limardo and Alex Mujica took their own respective runs in the spotlight, backing up the senior standout with equally outstanding play. Limardo helped the team's one–two offensive punch, with the hole man right behind Gonzalez, compiling 126 goals and 44 assists for 172 points on the season.

Mujica's small package of 5–foot–7 did not phase him, as he proved to be one of the most athletic goalies in Division I. He ranked with some of the best in the nation, with a .553 save percentage and a 7.72 goals against average. The upcoming senior season should be the one to remember, as the mainstay on defense looks forward to the "three–peat" Eastern Championship opportunity.

About the team's 9–6 win, and his 17 save performance, over Navy in the Eastern finals, Mujica said, "We started out slow, then we managed to gain control of the ball game and take advantage of every play.

"The whole team backed me up, we all made it together and hopefully we can three–peat next year. I was feeling that it was one of the best days of my life. Feeling light, feeling awesome. I just saw every ball and felt like I could reach every one of them."

To Yarworth, the Collegio San Jose graduate has got his education, and now he is the defensive leader for the Minutemen going into next season.

"Alex as an athlete doesn't look like a great one, but he is. He has tremendous hand–eye coordination, really fast hands and can get out of the water as well as anyone," Yarworth said.

"Alex is the backbone of our team. He blocks the ball, and if our team defense does the right things and he knows where the shot is coming from, he is not going to make too many mistakes. No goalie is going to make the great save all the time, but he does."

Football suffers through a hard 1994

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

A disappointing loss to Connecticut in the final game ended the University of Massachusetts football team's season on a sour note. The 21–13 loss to the Huskies resulted in a losing season for the Minutemen, the first since 1991.

Yet, that one loss, and the one game below .500 record (5– 6) overshadowed some impressive wins. After a one–point loss to Richmond (14–13) in the season opener, the Minutemen won three consecutive games, outscoring opponents 74–26. A three–point loss to New Hampshire (14– 11) was then followed by the biggest win of the season.

The road win over YanCon leader and previously unbeaten William and Mary on Oct. 15 looked like a momentum booster at the time, yet consecutive losses at Delaware (52–14) and at home against Boston University, 28–24, squashed any postseason hopes.

Massachusetts finished out the season with four home games, including the BU game, and went 1–4 in that span with a victory over Northeastern, 27–24.

As the victories are overshadowed by the sub–.500 record, so were the accomplishments of several Massachusetts players.

Like Rene Ingoglia. The junior running sensation ran up, through, around, and by the opposing defenses en route to a Yankee Conference leading 1,505 yards, the third–best single season effort in Massachusetts history and fifth in the nation during the season. The co–captain Ingoglia also found the endzone 14 times. When the season ended, the YanCon first– teamer was at or near the top of every career rushing list in school history.

Ingoglia put on a show back on Homecoming Day (Oct. 1). Rhode Island was the opponent, and Ingoglia was unstoppable. Little did the 10,812 in attendance realize that 28 Ingoglia carries would result in an astonishing 313 yards (11.2 yards per carry).

Runs of 84 yards and 75 yards helped Ingoglia's cause, not to mention another one worth 55 yards.

Senior Brian Corcoran spearheaded the league's leading team defense, and captured the YanCon's Defensive Player of the Year in the process. The conference first team all star tied for the league lead with 13 sacks for minus–62 yards and also registered 17 tackles for loss in amassing 90 total tackles (64 solo). Corcoran's sack total was the second largest output in Massachusetts history.

Ingoglia and his mates, namely Frank Alessio (691 yards) and Ron Brockington (225 yards), ran behind the blocks and pulls of senior Joe Sabella and the offensive line. The line up front plowed the way for the conference's second– ranked rushing offense (2,558 yards), and Sabella was tabbed as a First Team All YanCon.

Senior co–captain Ben Albert rounded out the Minutemen first–teamers. The defensive tackle finished the season with 70 tackles and eight sacks (minus 22 yards).

The complimentary defensive backfield of junior Breon Parker and senior Tony Williams made the YanCon's second team All–Conference. Senior Roger Kotlarz was named to the third team defense.

Parker, who was honored along with Ingoglia and Corcoran as 1994 Division I–AA All–Americans, had 65 tackles (49 solo), including two tackles for a loss. The cornerback also picked off three passes for 51 yards, and deflected seven passes on the season.

Williams registered a team–leading six interceptions (123 yards) and had 10 pass deflections, both which led the Minutemen. Parker's opposite corner mate also made 50 tackles (37 solo).

Updating the record books: UMass' highlights

Compiled by Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The 1994–95 season has been an extremely successful for UMass athletics. From the first day of fall, right up to today, the Minutemen have excelled on the field this season. The following is a listing of the tremendous number of records set by UMass athletes this year.

Fall

Field Hockey:

• Senior Natalie Hart's nine goals and 18 points moved her into sixth and seventh place, respectively, on the team's all–time lists.

• Danielle Borges and Hart were named to the All– American team. UMass has had at least two All–Americans each year since 1987.

Women's Soccer:

• From the "you know you're good when ..." department: UMass' 16–6 record this season was historic. Six losses ties the most that the team has ever had in a season.

• Junior Nicole Roberts' 12 goals this season moved her into eighth place on the career all–time list, with 28 . She is also tied for seventh all–time with 73 points.

Men's Soccer:

• Regular season Atlantic–10 title is the first in the program's history.

• Sam Koch was the first coach in school history to be named Atlantic–10 coach of the year.

• The team's 47 goals ties the record for most goals in a single season

• Eight shutouts is one behind the team record of nine.

Volleyball:

• Appearing in the NIVC was UMass' first post–season action since 1980.

• UMass' 14 home wins eclipsed the old record of 10, which was shared by four teams.

• 27 wins is the team's most since 1986, and their 10 Atlantic 10 wins is the most ever.

• 25 consecutive games won set a school record.

• 14 consecutive matches won, and 14 consecutive matches won to open a season are both second on the all–time list.

• Lesley Nolan set both school and A–10 tournament records by collecting 33 digs against West Virginia.

Men's Water Polo:

• 1994 saw season team records fall in goals (546), assists (387), points (956), steals (410), fouls (238), fouls drawn (236), attempts (1059) and saves (354). While single game records were set with 20 assists against MIT, and 21 saves against Brown.

• Javier Gonzalez set single season records in assists (64), points (187), steals (55) and assists (227). He also holds career records in goals (297), assists (106), points (411), steals (141), quarters played (391) and attempts (563).

• Luis Limbardo set single season records in goals (127), fouls drawn (71), penalty shots drawn (8), a career record in shooting percenage (.567), and single game records in goals (10 vs. Redlands) and points (11 vs. Redlands and Brown).

• Goalie Paul Engin set a record with 21 saves against Brown, while teammate Alex Mujica set records for saves in a season (205) and career saves (531).

• Rob Gonen's five assists against Boston College tied a record, while Joe Willmek's eight saves set a record for blocks in a season. Adolfo Oliete set the career blocks record with 14.

Women's Cross Country:

• Melissa Langevin was the first Minutewoman to be named the Atlantic–10's runner of the year.

Football:

• Rene Ingoglia assaulted the UMass record book this year. His 313 yards against Rhode Island was both a school and Yankee Conference record. On the career record charts, Ingoglia is; first in yards per game (114), tied for first in rushing touchdowns (35), second in carries (643) and rushing yards (3,446), tied for second in touchdowns (36) and points (218). He had the third best rushing season this year with 1,505 yards, and his 84 yard touchdown against URI is tied for the third longest in school history.

• All–American Brian Corcoran is third in career sacks with 30.

• Justin Reimer's 72 yard punt was the fifth longest in school history.

• The 15,184 and 14,873 fans that packed McGuirk to see Boston University and Holy Cross respectively were UMass' largest home crowds since 1987's Holy Cross game.

Winter

Men's Basketball:

• Achieved team's first ever No. 1 ranking. Finished season at No. 7, the team's highest ever final ranking.

• Advanced to NCAA's Elite Eight for first time.

• Only second team in NCAA history to win their conference's regular season title outright, and tournament championship four consecutive seasons.

• Lou Roe became the first consensus All–American in UMass basketball history. Roe set career records for rebounds (1,070, 8.0 rpg), games played (134), free throws made (578), and free throws attempted (838). Roe is the school's second all–time leading scorer (1,905, 14.2 ppg), and is third in minutes (3,738), fourth in field goal percentage (.529), and fifth in blocked shots (121). Roe was also UMass' first ever finalist for the John Wooden Award.

• Co–captain Derek Kellogg is ranked third in all–time assists (453) and three–point field goals made (138). Kellogg is fourth in three–point attempts (362), and games played (120), while being ranked fifth in career three–point field goal percentage (.381).

• Marcus Camby is second in career blocks (208) in only his second season, and fifth in field goal percentage (.525).

• John Calipari was a Naismith National Coach of the Year finalist.

• UMass' 29 wins is the second most in school history, only behind the 1992 Sweet Sixteen team's 30.

• The Minutemen were first in the A–10 in scoring (80.9 ppg), scoring margin (15.1 ppg), offensive and defensive field goal percentage (.462 and .386 respectively), rebounding

Volleyball earns postseason bid in only its second year

Several UMass teams set new precedents this year, going places they had never been before. Perhaps lost in all the hoopla was the success of the Massachusetts volleyball team.

In only their second year of reinstatement, coach Bonnie Kenny's squad finished at 27–8 overall, and set a school record for wins In the Atlantic 10, finishing 10–4 in the league, good enough for third place. The team also shattered the old school mark by winning 14 contests at home.

Dionne Nash and Giza Rivera, a pair of sophomore outside hitters were named to the All–Atlantic 10 team. The squad also made history by receiving a bid to the National Invitational Volleyball Championship in Kansas City.

After returning only six players from the year before, nobody knew what to expect at the start of the season. However, a strong recruiting class proved itself early, and the Minutewomen began their season on a tear. They not only won their first eight matches, but won them easily, defeating each opponent in three straight games.

UMass suffered a minor setback on September 16 when Delaware came to the Curry Hicks Cage, and the Minutewomen fell for the first time in game two of the best of five match. This ended their streak of 25 straight games won, but UMass rebounded to win the match in four games, keeping their unbeaten streak alive.

The Minutewomen cruised to a 14–0 record, one shy of the school record for consecutive wins. The streak finally ended on October 4 when Rhode Island, who would be the thorn in UMass' side all season, came to Amherst and defeated the Minutewomen in a close four game match.

UMass fell again in Temple, then rebounded to best Rutgers and travelled down to George Washington for a battle with the league favorite and nationally ranked Colonial Women.

There in Washington D.C., UMass pulled off their biggest win of the season, upsetting GW three games to one. They fell one more time in Rhode Island, then strung together five more wins, including a big win over Temple in three straight, before losing in a rematch with the Colonial Women in Amherst.

With a regular season mark of 25–4, the Minutewomen entered the Atlantic 10 Tournament at Duquesne. They defeated West Virginia in five games in round one, then were eliminated by arch nemesis Rhode Island in the second round.

UMass' season did not end there, however, as the team received a bid to compete in the NIVC. This year marked the first time ever a UMass team was invited to compete in the tournament.

The Minutewomen were able to win their first game over Idaho State in three straight, and ended their season with a pair of losses to Arkansas and Iowa State.

In her first season with UMass, Rivera made a big impact, finishing near the top of the league in kills and kills per game. Joining Rivera on the All A–10 team was Dionne Nash, who made her second straight appearance on the team.

The lone senior on the team, Cass Anderson, served as the team's setter and floor general. Other returnees included defensive specialists Beth Cabral and Kim Mizner, who both provided solid play off the bench, and outside hitter Susan Maga.

The freshman class that came onto the scene with a bang included outside hitter Lesley Nolan, who became one of the best hitters in the A–10, and middle blockers Leigh Readey and Michelle Packerek, both of whom were among the team leaders in hitting percentage. Rounding out the squad was Maria Dueno, a freshman defensive specialist that provided acrobatic saves when on the floor.

Year produces some memorable victories

By Matt Vautour

In a year that saw the University of Massachusetts athletic department take even more steps toward becoming one of the nation's elite programs, there were several key games that highlighted the 1994-1995 year in sports. From the home office in the Campus Center Basement, here are the top ten.

Men's Basketball blows out No. 1 Arkenses – An announcement to the rest of the nation that Massachusetts basketball was for real. The win vaulted the Minutemen into the No. 1 spot for the first time in history. It has also helped the draft position of Lou Roe, who dominated pre-season All–American Corliss Williamson.

Volleyball beats George Washington – In only their second season since reinstatement, the Minutewomen made quite a splash finishing third in the Atlantic 10. The game that served the most notice was their upset of perennial powerhouse George Washington, who eventually went to the NCAAs. With only one senior on the squad, volleyball is on its way toward joining field hockey and women's soccer as Massachusetts powers in Atlantic 10 women's sports.

Field hockey upsets No 1. North Carolina in overtime – Perhaps one of the most exciting games of the year ... This win was more than just upsetting the top ranked team. After three ties that caused people to have questions about the team, the victory renewed interest in the Minutewomen. They proved it wasn't a fluke a week later when they beat No. 2 (eventual National Champion) James Madison.

Men's Soccer over Rutgers – After a disappointing 1993, few people expected much from the Sam Koch's squad, yet these overachievers upset powerhouse (and eventual Final Four participants) Rutgers en route to their first ever A-10 regular season title. With some talented young players, if they can avoid letdown, the Minutemen could soon become the class of the soon to be Rutgers–less A-10.

Men's Basketball beats Maryland – This win was big for many reasons:

1. Starting with the obvious, the Minutemen got a chance to avenge their tournament loss to the Terrapins and they did, beating the Terrapins in front of more than 13,000 hostile fans.

2. When the Terrapins beat the Minutemen last year, they did it on the strength of a second–half comeback. That Saturday it looked like Maryland might make another comeback, but this time the Minutemen dug deep and held on.

3. They won without heroics from Lou Roe. In UMass' first two games against good teams, they relied on monster performances from the senior co–captain. This time the entire team stepped up and pulled away from the Terrapins even though Roe fouled out.

Hockey upsets No. 1 Maine – Behind an incredible 51– save performance by freshman goalie Brian Regan, the Minutemen, in only their first season in Division I upset the No. 1 team in the nation.

"I think this is the biggest upset of the year in college hockey," said UMass coach Joe Mallen, whose squad was ranked last in the nation at one point. "Our guys deserve it."

Hockey upsets BC in Hockey East playoffs – The game was a culmination of the second half of the season, in which the Minutemen improved drastically after a tough first half.

Massachusetts topped its New England rivals 5–4 to advance to the second round of the Hockey East Playoffs.

Women's gym upsets nationally ranked West Virginia – Massachusetts compiled a school record 190.925 to narrowly edge the No. 21 Mountaineers at the Coliseum in Morgantown. Junior I.J. Tolhurst and sophomore Tara Swartz turned impressive performances.

"It is clearly the biggest win since I have been here, I mean it does not even compare," said UMass coach Dave Kuzara.

Women's soccer beats Vermont – The game that turned the season around. Although the Catamounts aren't known for their dominance in soccer, the Minutewomen were in the midst of a mid–season skid. The 5–0 victory brought back the confidence that usually defines women's soccer at Massachusetts.

Men's Basketball beats Tulsa to advance to Final Eight – Okay, maybe Tulsa wasn't the toughest opponent UMass faced all year, but it sent the program where it had never been before: to the NCAA Final Eight.

The five most devastating losses for UMass sports

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Despite many highlights during the year, there were some discouraging losses as well for UMass sports. Here are the five most devestating.

Football falls to UConn in finale – A sorry end to a sorry season. No passing, no fans and minimal spirit. UConn was a bad team, but UMass mailed it in and finished with a losing season. A lot of questions need to be addressed for this program if it has any real intentions of 1–A.

Field Hockey falls to Temple – The loss itself wasn't as significant, but its chain reaction was. The game included one of the scariest moments of the semester as star goalie Hilary Rose was carried from the field on a stretcher with a neck injury. She turned out to be okay, but there was horror yet to come.

Despite only losing three times (two to top ten teams), and beating the top two seeds, the Minutewomen were unfairly excluded from the NCAA Tournament. The team had a chance to win it all, but weak representation by the Northeast's region's representatives to the selection committee allowed Ohio State into the tourney, while UMass stayed home. Absolute injustice.

Women's hoop falls to West Virginia – The Minutewomen likely came within one win of making their first ever trip to the NCAA tournament, but Patrice Conwright's two free throws with 4.3 seconds left gave the Mountaineers a 62–61 lead, which essentially knocked UMass out of the tournament.

Men's hoop falls to George Washington at home – The streak that the University had so much pride in fell. Unbeaten at home dating back two seasons, and undefeated in the William D. Mullins Center, came crashing down at the hands of Mike Jarvis' George Washington Colonials, the same Colonials that stripped the Minutemen of their No. 1 ranking not long before.

Men's lacrosse falls to Brown in New England championship – For the second year in a row, the Minuemen's post season hopes hinged on the New England Championship with Brown, and for the second straight year, the Bears upended Massachusetts. The 18–8 loss was UMass' worst of the year.

A farwell from a graduating Collegian veteran

I can't tell whether this is the beginning of the end for me as a sports journalist, or the end of the beginning and these last few years were the first steps to a long and prosperous career.

I've seen a lot on this campus as far as the athletic department is concerned — some bad, mostly good. I went from nearly brawling with Derek Kellogg at a party freshman year on Sunset Avenue to praising him in these pages three seasons later.

I remember entering the Curry Hicks Cage for Midnight Madness in 1991, not really understanding the magnitude of what I was going to experience. Now, all I can say is, "Damn, you don't even know what Massachusetts basketball is all about."

I think back to when I painted my face as a men's hoop fanatic, chanting, "We want Temple," when it actually meant something, when a win over the Owls was unprecedented.

I had no worries two springs ago, laying out on the grassy hill at Totman Field, grasping a sport bottle filled with spiked Gatorade and sunflower seeds, cheering on the Massachusetts softball team and its crazy cheers. "Everybody hits, everybody runs, everybody scores."

Now, it's all coming to an end, and I have memories that will last a lifetime.

Athletes who made an impact

• For every critic who says all superstar athletes are cocky and confident, I'll tell you about Rene Ingoglia. The junior from the Minuteman football team is class personified.

I had the pleasure of interviewing Ingoglia once, and from then on, he's gone out of his way to be more than friendly to me at differing sports events, from Massachusetts hockey games to baseball doubleheaders at Earl Lorden Field.

Massachusetts football coach Mike Hodges once said, "He's a better person than he is a football player, and he's one heckuva football player."

My sentiments exactly. Thanks, Rene, for shattering the stereotype.

• For every critic who says all athletes come to school for sports only and don't care less about academics, I'll tell you about Carmelo Travieso. The sophomore guard from the Massachusetts men's basketball team is constantly walking around campus with books in his hand, heading to some class that he probably doesn't even need to go to.

Two seasons ago, after the Minutemen lost to Maryland in the NCAA tournament, I asked a dejected Travieso how much the loss truly hurt after all the hard work. He replied, "Well, one good thing about it is that I get to concentrate on my studies again, and that's why I'm here."

There was no sarcasm in Travieso's voice. Thanks, Carmelo, for shattering the stereotype.

• For every critic who says athletes just care about themselves and don't do anything for their teammates or their school, I'll tell you about Kyri Sparks. The senior from the Massachusetts field hockey team is self–less and has done work for children at the Shriner's Hospital, spoke on behalf of all University women's sports at the Statehouse, and, coincidentally, achieved Northeast Regional All–America honors.

Sparks never asked for anything in return. Well, actually, I remember when she was a freshman and begged one of our sportswriters for some press. Kyri, you deserve it now more than ever, and thanks for shattering the stereotype.

• For every critic who says athletes take things way too seriously and stay involved in their own little team cliques, not worrying about anyone but other athletes, I'll tell you about Heidi Kocher.

Kocher, a senior on the Massachusetts women's soccer team, was the brunt of a pretty bad joke in one of my columns and she never let me forget it. However, it didn't stop her from talking to me and laughing about it, whether it was at Rafter's or Lorden Field.

Thanks, Heidi, for shattering the stereotype.

Sorry, Coach

• Men's basketball coach John Calipari's catch phrases — "How 'bout [insert favorite player here]," "We play like, if we lose, we're going to the electric chair," "You better make him pee in the bottle after that one," "As Lou goes, we go," and, of course, "Refuse to Lose." Sorry, Coach, your personality gets a bit tiring after a long, grueling season.

• Football coach Mike Hodges' "He's a heckuva player," and, "We got a great bunch of guys." Sorry, Coach, but you're way too nice sometimes.

• Hockey coach Joe Mallen's refusal to leave the press room when his players are being interviewed. Sorry, Coach, but I wanted to know what they thought about the game.

• Men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella's refusal to let the orange thing die after the Syracuse game. Sorry, Coach, didn't know I had the power.

• Men's soccer coach Sam Koch making fun of me in an interview because I was wearing shorts in 30–degree weather. Sorry, Coach, but your players were, too.

• Softball coach Elaine Sortino's inability to remember my name, despite introducing myself several times. Sorry, Coach, but you deflated my ego.

• Media relations director Bill Strickland's patience when I ranted and raved about being put up in the hockey press box for the A–10 Championship. Sorry, Strick, but fair is fair.

• Women's gymnastics coach David Kuzara's persistence on how he would build the Minutewoman program into a national powerhouse. Sorry, Coach, but I didn't believe you.

• Baseball coach Mike Stone's lack of emotion and sarcasm after both wins and losses. Sorry, Coach, but four months of Calipari is a tough act to follow.

Parting Shots

I'll never forget ...

• There will never be anything more spectacular than an Anton Brown alley–oop pass to Will Herndon within the first five offensive sets of every given game.

• While riding the elevator with Strickland, Athletic Director Bob Marcum and Calipari, they brought up that little piece on ABC News I was interviewed for. Calipari told me thanks for sticking up for him. Geez, I didn't know the word was really in his vocabulary, but, you're welcome, Cal, even though I did it for me and not you.

• Matt "Cheese" Komer always provided a good laugh on basketball road trips, especially the ones like Cincinnati two years ago, when we were waiting for word on Mike Williams' collapse, and the Atlantic City debacle, when we patrolled the boardwalk looking for something to do. Thanks, Cheese, for not being too wrapped up in basketball so we could become friends.

• Go, go Mass. Heeeey, go Mass.

• I still say Thorr Bjorn is the nicest guy I've ever met, even though he can't give me free tickets.

• Attending this University has been the best four years of my life, and despite always bleeding maroon and white, I believe I did a fair job covering every sport the athletic department had to throw at me. And Teddy K., we've been through a lot together, and I'd have flipped if I couldn't do a feature on Dave Siljanovski, too. You are a man with class (most of the time) and, Ted, you taught me resiliency. Thanks.

I guess you don't know what you have until it's gone. I'm just realizing that now — maybe they'll figure it out someday soon when I'm outta here.

Four years of UM memories

Ted Kottler

I've seen a lot around here, and I'm actually going to see a little more, but these last four years form the bulk of my UMass experience.

What a long, strange trip it's been. I'll remember so much, yet I know there's a lot I never saw that I hope future students will. But I'll start with the good stuff.

• When I decided to come to UMass, sometime in the spring of 1991, I'm sure I was paying close attention to the NCAA basketball tournament, where the Minutemen hadn't been in 20 years. I resigned myself to the fact I was heading to a place with no basketball tradition. I remember all those times I checked the Atlantic 10 standings during the 1980s to see how bad Temple was beating up on everyone, and Massachusetts always got it worst.

The first time I set foot in the Curry Hicks Cage was October 14, 1991. Midnight Madness. This was my first look at the team that remains the most invigorating I saw at this school. Not the most talented, but the one that never mailed it in. The 1991–92 Minutemen went 30–5, and I caught every important juncture: the win over Oklahoma at the Springfield Civic Center, the first–ever win over Temple beneath chipping paint, and Harper Williams for three against Syracuse when the Big Dance came to Worcester.

When George Washington came to UMass that year, there were 4,059 (one more than capacity) on hand. I didn't have a ticket, but I convinced the guy at the gate that I was working for WMUA but had lost my pass.

From 1991 to 1995, the Minutemen went 111–24. They lost twice at home. I managed to miss the first loss, right after the win over the Sooners, when the Chris Leonard–led West Virginia Mountaineers nipped UMass. Alas, I was there for loss No. 2, when George Washington completed a sweep of UMass at the Mullins Center.

• That first year brought a couple of interesting moments in my journalism career pertaining to the basketball team. Sometime in November of 1991, I knocked on a door in John Quincy Adams and Lou Roe answered. Our interview turned into what I believe is the first of dozens of pieces written about Roe while he's been at UMass.

Lou, I'd love to do it again. I just hope my paycheck isn't too small a fraction of yours.

• Sometime in March of 1992, I sat patiently in John Calipari's crummy old Boyden office waiting to interview him. My editor said he'd give me ten or fifteen minutes, but Cal had more time for media in those days, and our long conversation went beyond basketball to other areas of Calipari's expertise, such as ties.

Cal, I'd love to do it again, and I won't ask you to talk about more motion in the offense.

• It's ironic that some suggest the team's success boosted enrollment. Now all the Southwest Towers are full and no one can sneak into the vacant one and write "Beat Temple" in the windows. *

• I remember sneaking into the Mullins Center during the final stages of construction, dreaming of what it would be. I do wish it were a little bigger, and it would be nice if it had a suspended scoreboard (which is impossible), but I'll always love it.

• While sitting in the WMUA booth of the McGuirk Stadium press box, Calipari sat in during our broadcast and referred to me as Dave Scott. The media relations one, not the chancellor. I told him I was the chancellor. Actually I told him it was my fault he didn't remember me, as if that makes sense. Ah, the power of Coach Cal.

• I'd like to take this space to make a formal apology to a man who taught me a lot: Thorr Bjorn. Last year I wrote a column blasting Bjorn for his ticket distribution policies. I said he took satisfaction in making people suffer. But there was really no way for me to know that, because I didn't know Bjorn, and he taught me not to write about someone without knowing something about them. I saw a lot of Bjorn this year, and he treated me as kindly as anyone I've ever known. That's incredible, considering he had every right to hate my guts. He even went out of his way to get me some tickets. Thorr, you're a world–class act, and I should have known that, since you've always been tight with my senior compadre, Arty the One Man Party.

• Now I'll take this space to blast three football players who still owe my friend an apology after they crashed his party last year. I won't name them, because obviously they'd have to come looking for me and prove their toughness like they did that night, but they know who they are. Hey, pathetic, that members of a mediocre team playing on a mediocre level let their heads get so wide. I consider one of these three fools one of the weakest, ever seen at his position, but hey, he's a UMass football player, he deserves special treatment. If only Mike Hodges could have seen their display, he'd have finally found someone he'd be willing to trade.

• I'd like to see a basketball home game against a team ranked equal or above UMass. It's said they played that Oklahoma game in Springfield because Billy Tubbs was afraid to play in the Cage, but that excuse no longer works.

• I'd like to see football get serious and make the jump to Division I–A. It's a long, tedious process that may have too many loopholes for the program to cover, but it really shapes the whole athletic department.

• I'd like to see the fencing team just stop it. If you could really fence, you'd be at a school that takes the sport for real. No one dabbles in fencing: either do it on a scholarship or do something else.

• I'd like to see if Will Herndon can still make change on the top of a backboard. He was the most exciting player I ever saw in the maroon and white.

• I'd like to see if the Collegian sports page can hold up next year after the loss of one its most esteemed graduates, Arthur Stapleton. We don't always agree, the road between us was once rocky, but all is forgiven. Except his NHL picks. Art, the Devils in 7? C'mon! (And away we go...)

Women's soccer continues tradition

A delicate balancing act

"I thought this was a very good season. We didn't play as well in the middle as we did in the beginning or the end but we had some circumstances that helped create that. But I just admire this team tremendously for coming back, and that was very hard to do because this team was just about down and out. I respect them incredibly for coming back."
- Massachusetts Coach Jim Rudy

The date was Oct. 22 and the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team was at the lowest point they could get. They had just lost to Connecticut 2–1 and hopes for the postseason were dampened. Many players thought it was all over. The team was 10–5, losers of five of its last eight games.

Before they had made the trip to UConn the two captains, Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell, had held a players only meeting to discuss the problems that the team was having. It resulted in positive feelings among the players. They entered the UConn game loose and confident, excited and ready to play. But they left Storrs with the loss and a bad feeling.

Instead of giving up and just playing out the rest of the season, the Minutewomen dug deep within themselves and ran off six straight victories to climb back into the NCAA picture.

They beat a very tough George Washington team twice by 1–0 and 2–1 scores. The second win came in the Atlantic 10 Tournament Championship game, which they won for the second year in a row. They beat a good Cornell team 2–1, who had beaten Hartford 2–0, earlier in the year.

They received a NCAA wildcard bid and hosted Harvard at Richard F. Garber Field. They beat the Crimson 3–0 and advanced to the Regional semifinals against the University of Hartford.

Even with the 2–0 season ending loss to Hartford, positives can be taken from the season. They finished 16–6 and were A–10 Champions.

"They were as low as you can get and they did well to come back," Rudy said. "This is a good group."

Positives can also be taken from the great individual years had by many of the players.

Sophomore defender Erin Lynch was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year for her tremendous play all season. She was arguably the most steady player for the Minutewomen during its midseason slump. She consistently made huge defensive stops to prevent goals and performed on the offensive side as well, getting 12 points on five goals and two assists.

Junior Nicole Roberts scored a team–high 12 goals for the second straight year and also had four assists for 28 total points. Of those 12 goals, six were game–winners. When UMass needed the big goal, Roberts came through. Roberts' 12 goals moved her into eighth place on the all–time goals list (27) and all–time points list (72).

Sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers once again had a stellar year. She tallied 11 goals and seven assists for a team high 29 points. She scored two hat tricks during the year, against Rhode Island and Vermont, and was named the Outstanding Player in the A–10 Tournament.

Sophomore midfielder Julie Magid was also steady all year. She had two goals and five assists for nine points while playing the last few games with a broken nose.

The two seniors, Kocher and Mitchell, also performed well. Kocher scored two goals and dished out a team high nine assists for 13 points while Mitchell had one goal and seven assists for nine points.

Junior Rachel LeDuc finished third on the team in total points with 16 (five goals, six assists).

Freshman goalkeeper Danielle Dion was impressive all year in the net, giving up only 14 goals in her 21 games started. She made a lot of unbelievable saves and showed great poise all year.

Nikki Ahrenholz, Erica Iverson, Nancy Kieser, Tina Lightning, Amy Powell, Elizabeth Rutherford and Sandy Shimogaki all had solid years.

Dion, Kocher, Lynch, Myers and Roberts were all named to the All A–10 First team.

Fall season set precedent for a successful 1994-95

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts fall season had many triumphs. The fall sports season's overall winning percentage was 64.6 percent. This incuded eight teams out of ten with winning seasons for the UMass program.

Football ended their season 5–6 overall and 4–4 in the Yankee Conference. The Minutemen won their 150th Yankee Conference game, the most of any team in the league. They closed out their 1994 season with a 21–13 loss to Connecticut. Junior running back Rene Ingoglia finished fifth in the 1994 Walter Payton Award contest, given anually to the top player in the NCAA Division I–AA. Ingoglia and senior defensive end Brian Corcoran, the 1994 Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Year were named to the Sports Network All–America second team and the Associated Press All–America third team. Junior cornerback Breon Parker was selected to the American Football Coaches Association All–America first team and also received an All–America honorable mention.

Field hockey (12–3–3) ended with an A–10 record of (3–0– 1) and were A–10 Regular Season Champions for their third straight year. Seniors Natalie Hart and Danielle Borges were All–American selections. Sophomore Hilary Rose was named A–10 Player of the Year. The Minutewomen's biggest accomplishment was the defeat of the No. 1 North Carolina Tarheels (2–1) in overtime.

Women's soccer (16–6) had a successful season, ending with the Atlantic 10 Conference record of 5–0 and advancing to the final four of the NCAA Tournament by winning their first round game against Harvard (4–1), then losing in the Regional finals to Hartford 2–0. Senior Heidi Kocher was a Division I first team All–American and an Atlantic–10 All Conference first team selection, junior Nicole Roberts was also an A–10 All conference selection as well as a Northeast Regional All–American. Sophomore Erin Lynch was the A– 10 Conference Player of the Year for 1994.

Men's soccer (13–6–1) ended with an A–10 record of 6–1 and advanced to the A–10 Conference Championship Final, defeating West Virginia in the semi–finals 5–1 but losing to Rutgers 4–3. Freshman Karstin Bremke was named A–10 Conference Rookie of the Year. He was joined by senior Mike Doyle and sophomore Dave Siljanovski as All A–10 first team selections. Junior Colin Johnson and senior Mark Wolf received honorable mentions. Head coach Sam Koch was name A–10 Conference Coach of the Year.

Volleyball (27–8) had an impressive A–10 record of 10–4, advancing to the A–10 Championship semi–finals but losing to URI. Sophomores Dionne Nash and Giza Rivera were named to the All A–10 team. The Minutewomen were invited to the NIT Volleyball Tournament where they had one win over Idaho St. University.

Men's water polo (30–9) had a tremendous season, with an EWPA record and ranking No.11 in the nation. The team captured the EWPA Championship for the second year in a row by defeating Navy in the finals. Senior Javier Gonzalez was the NCAA Championship Tournament All–America honorable mention and an EWPA selection. Juniors Luis Linardo, John Luviano, Alex Mujica and sophomore Greg Menton were also EWPA selections.

Men's cross country finished with an overall record of 8– 2 and finished second place at the A–10 Championships. The team finished in eighth place at the New England Championships. Sophomores Matt Behl and Michael Maceiko were named to the A–10 All Conference Team.

Women's cross country (3–2) finished in third place at the A–10 Championships and second place at the New England Championships. Sophomore Melissa Langevin was named A–10 Runner of the Year and was also the winner of the individual A–10 Championship. Langevin and sophomore Rebecca Donaghue were named to the All A–10 Conference team.

In men's tennis, senior Tim Lipsky participated in the Rolex Regional Chammen's tennis,pionships, falling in the first round and finishing the fall season with a 5–2 overall record. The team ended with an overall dual match record of 3–4.

In women's tennis, junior Liesl Sitton captured the New England Championships title and advanced to the third round of the Rolex Regional Championships. The team finished with an overall dual match record of 7–5 and captured second place at the New England Championships.

• The Minutewomen made their first post–season appearance since 1981 appearance, at the NWIT in Amarillo, Texas, where UMass placed fourth. UMass is the first A–10 team to advance in the tournament's championship bracket.

• For the first time ever UMass received a vote in the USA Today/CNN Top 25 Coaches' Poll. The Minutewomen appeared in the "Also Receiving Votes" category in the February 28th poll.

• UMass had first nationally televised game from Mullins against Rhode Island, and set a home attendance record, when 2,280 showed up for the Minutewomen's showdown with No. 19 George Washington.

• Octavia Thomas and Melissa Gurile each eclipsed the 1,000 point plateau this season and are currently fourth (1,272) and fifth (1,233) respectively on the all–time chart. Only eight Minutewomen have scored over 1,000 points in their careers. Thomas and Gurile are second (702), and fifth (620), in rebounds, and fourth (480) and seventh (442) in field goals made. Gurile is second in career blocks (131) as well, while Thomas has 29 career double–doubles.

• Sophomore Beth Kuzmeski became the school's all–time leader in both career three–pointers made (103) and attempted (307).

• Joanie O'Brien became the first UMass coach to be named the Atlantic–10's coach of the year. She moved into second on the all–time victory list this season.

Hockey:

• Set team attendance record when 6,834 saw UMass defeat No. 1 Maine at Mullins.

• Brian Regan became the first Minuteman to be named to a post–season Hockey East team, when he made the All– Rookie team. His 51 saves against both Maine and BU are Division I school records. The 619 saves that Regan made this season puts him fifth on the single season and eighth on the career charts. The 25 saves made in the third period of the Maine upset is also believed to be a school record.

• Dave Kilduff set what was then a Hockey East record by making 50 saves against eventual national champion Boston University. With an additional 403 saves this season, Kilduff is now fifth on the career saves list with 737.

• Brad Norton shattered the school penalty minute record, by spending 89 minutes in the box this season.

• Rob Bonneau's 14 goals and 12 assists moved him into seventh on the career goals list (40), and tenth on the career points list (73).

Women's Gymnastics:

• Tied record set last year with 14 wins.

• Lianne Liang set a school record with her 9.95 in the vault at the Atlantic–10 Championships.

• Tara Swartz set a school record with her 9.95 in the uneven bars, and had the school's second highest score in the All–Around with her 38.875 at the Lady Bulldog Invitational.

• A school record 190.925 team all–around score defeated No. 21 West Virginia in Morgantown, in a stunning upset. The team set another school record with 48.75 score in the vault in that win.

Men's Gymnastics:

• Won ECAC Championship for first time ever, and New England Championship for seventh straight year.

• Freshman Kevin Schwartz, who finished ranked ninth in the nation In rings, set a school record with a 9.95 in the event.

• Gabe Columbus set a pair of records with his 9.6 in the parallel bars against Syracuse and a 55.65 all–around score against Army. His 9.75 in the floor exercise at the Army meet is the second best in school history.

• Ruslan Shupak broke a school record with his 9.775 in the vault at Navy.

Women's Swimming:

• Karen Sonnwald had a solid freshman year. Her 500 meter freestyle (5:01.17), 1000 meter freestyle (10:23.99), and 1650 meter freestyle (17:12.47) times were all school records.

• Sarah Baker became the first Minutewoman to win an Atlantic–10 championship, when she took the 800 meter freestyle.

• Jessica Farley's 2:10.06 in the 200 meter individual medley also is a school record.

Men's Swimming:

• Keith McLarty set school records in the 200 meter backstroke and the 400 meter individual medley at the Atlantic 10 Championships.

• Tim Milbert also broke a school record at the Atlantic–10 championships with a 57.58 second time in the 100 meter breaststroke.

Men's Indoor/Outdoor Track:

• Indoors, Tom Galligani qualified for the IC4A Championships with the third longest triple jump (47' 11–1/4") in UMass history.

• Ethan Nadeau ran the fifth fastest 1000 meters in UMass indoor history (2:27.16) to qualify for the IC4As.

Women's Indoor/Outdoor Track:

• Kelly Liljeblad set a three school records outdoors, and qualified for the NCAAs in each event. The 1 mile (4:50.22) 300 meter (9:35.67) and 500 meter (16:44.73) times run by Liljeblad are all–time lows for a Minutewoman. Liljeblad continued her torrid pace outdoors where she set another school record with her 35:17.63 in the 10,000 meters.

• Janey Meeks has set three school records this year, with a 5' 6" high jump and a 40' 4" triple jump indoors, to accompany her school record 39 11–1/4" outdoor triple jump.

• Heather Brown shattered the school's javelin record with her 161' 3" throw.

• Anya Forrest set school marks indoors in the 55 meter hurdles (8.16) and outdoors in the 100 meter hurdles (14.38).

• Pentathelete Megan O'Neill set a school record with a score of 3236.

Spring

(* denotes that season is still in progress at press time)

Softball*:

• Kelly Daut became the first pitcher to win the Atlantic– 10's Pitcher of the Week honors five consecutive weeks. She has tied the school record with 22 wins in this season and will likely pass the record. Currently, her 154 strikeouts places her 15 shy of the single season record. Daut is second in career strikeouts, innings pitched and games pitched, third in wins, fourth in shutouts and complete games, and eighth in ERA.

• Kim Guttridge, the A–10s rookie of the year, had the school's second longest hitting streak at 25 games. Sam Cardenas had the third longest streak, earlier this season with a 21 game streak. Guttridge's .405 is the highest ever for a UMass freshman.

• Tracy Osier set the school record for stolen bases in a season with 19 on her freshman campaign.

• Chris Martens' 37 RBIs are a school record. With two more homeruns this season, she will tie the school mark for homeruns in a single season.

Baseball*:

• Can break the conference record for wins In a season. The Minutemen set the mark with 19 last year, and have 18 at press time.

• Bill Knight has holds career records in homeruns, RBIs and total bases, all set this season. He has broken the single season homerun record and has a chance to eclipse the single season record in RBIs and total bases as well. This accompanies a .374 batting average.

• Coach Mike Stone passed Earl Lorden and moved into second place on the UMass career win list with 209 in his eight years at the helm of the Minutemen.

Men's Lacrosse*:

• With one game remaining, Mike Valente is seventh on UMass' career assist chart (84), and fifteenth in points (131). Valente should pass Fred Menna and move into fourteenth place in the season finale at Army.

Freshmen made an instant impact at Massachusetts

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Seldom are freshmen called upon to lead a team. While watching the senior that is usually ahead of them, the freshman season is generally a learning experience, but not at UMass this season. From cross–country to hockey, freshmen not only excelled in the maroon and white, but quite often carried a team to great accomplishments. While often coaches might find their recruits spending their first season on a bench, nothing could be farther from the truth this season.

So from one freshman to 13 others, it is time to recognize some greats from the class of 1998.

Kersten Bremke (men's soccer–midfielder)–When coach Sam Koch recruited the defender from Marienfeld, Germany he didn't know what he was getting himself into. After a shift to midfield. Bremke went on a tear, leading the team with eight goals. Bremke's scoring was instrumental in the men's soccer team winning their first ever regular season Atlantic–10 championship, and was rewarded by being named the conference's Rookie of the Year.

Kete Brew (women's lacrosse–goaltender)–The Annapolis, Maryland native turned in a spectacular performance this season in the Minutewoman net. Brew's .613 save percentage placed her 10th in the national rankings, where she had been ranked as high as fourth. Brew started every game for UMass, and posted a solid 10.89 goals against average. With the assistance of the great defensive play from the Ridley Girls (Erica Bryan, Kristen Hocker, and Michele Warrington), the Minutewoman defense is set for the next few seasons.

Joanna Digrazio (women's lacrosse–attack)–Finished her freshman campaign with 33 goals (on 74 shots), five assists and 38 points, leading UMass in all four categories. Dignazio led UMass with four goals and a pair of assists in their big victory at Vermont, and five goals in the heartbreaking loss to Hofstra.

Danielle Dion (women's soccer–goaltender)–No goalie has ever had bigger shoes to fill at UMass. After an illustrious career, Briana Scurry graduated, and the freshman from Atlanta had to fill one enormous pair of Adidas. All questions were quickly answered though, as Dion posted shutouts in each of her first four games, and finished eighth in the nation in goals against average, second among freshmen. Dion was named to the All Atlantic–10 first team for her fine work.

Rebecca Donaghue (women's cross country and track)–The freshman from Stow, Mass. came out of nowhere this season to power the Minutewomen to one of their best cross country seasons ever. Donaghue placed eighth at the Atlantic–10 Championships and was named to the All A–10 team.

She continued her scorching pace by qualifying for the ECAC Championships in the 800 meters in indoor track, and running everything from the 1500 meters down to the 200 meters outdoors, with great success.

Kim Gutridge (softball–first base)–The Atlantic 10's Rookie of the Year and an All–Conference selection, Gutridge has posted some incredible numbers this season for coach Elaine Sortino's squad. Starting all 51 games for UMass (as of May 4), Gutridge is second on the team with a .405 batting average, has a pair of homeruns, and 31 RBIs. Leading the team with 16 doubles, and slugging a solid .570, Gutridge is

Alex Aller

Freshman • Men's Tennis

The Rye, N.Y. native burst onto the men's tennis scene opening with a 6–0 singles match record and finishing the season with an 8–1 record leading the Minutemen to a 6–5 regular season record.

Sarah Baker

Junior • Women's Swimming

After an outstanding junior season, Sarah will be the women's swimming team's top swimmer for Coach Bob Newcomb next season.

Vicky Bamond

Sophomore • Women's Water Polo

Was team's leading scorer in its inaugural experience. The Pembroke Pines, Fla. native is the only member of the squad with high school experience. Will be a cornerstone as the program grows.

Rob Bonneau

Sophomore Forward • Ice Hockey

The Springfield native led Massachusetts in scoring for the second straight season. Hockey East opponents showed their respect for Bonneau's talents, as they covered him tightly all season, but Bonneau was still able to break-out, with 14 goals 12 assists and 26 points.

Danielle Borges

Senior Forward • Field Hockey
All–American

Emerged as Massachusetts top forward in her final season. As captain, she was an intense leader on and off the field. Started year off quickly with a hat trick against Boston College.

Karsten Bremke

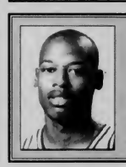
Freshman Midfielder • Men's Soccer

A great scoring star from a great soccer nation (Germany), the tall threat wasn't expected to produce offense, yet he led the team in goals, scoring many with precise headers. Bremke began the year as a defender and his marking skills never suffered. His two–way play could carry Sam Koch's Minutemen to great heights in the Atlantic 10 next season.

Kate Brew

Freshman Goaltender • Women's Lacrosse

For her first collegiate season, Brew has already made a name for herself nationally, ranking among the top ten goaltenders in the country for save percentage with her season end average of 0.613. Brew started in all 13 games, making an impressive 196 saves with a 10.89 goals against average.



Marcus Camby

Sophomore Center • Men's Basketball

The Hartford Conn. native took his game to new levels, helping the Minutemen get to the NCAA Final Eight. The shot–blocking specialist has kept the basketball–watching population in suspense over whether or not he will return to UMass or take his talents to the NBA.

Sam Cardenas

Sophomore Third Baseman • Softball

Has followed up her outstanding freshman season with an equally impressive sophomore campaign. Is currently the team's fourth leading hitter (.364) and had a 21–game hitting streak while stopping nearly everything at the hot corner.

Brian Corcoran

Senior Defensive End • Football
All–American
Senior Defensemen • Ice Hockey

Finished an impressive four–year career in football, as arguably UMass' top defensive player. Returned to the ice for his second season, and became one Joe Mallen's most reliable

Kelly Daut

Senior Pitcher • Softball
All–America Candidate

Will leave UMass as one of its best pitchers ever. Was UMass' ace this year and will be crucial if the Minutewomen are to advance in post-season play this year. Compiled four career no–hitters and was named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year the past two years.

Vin Dello–Iacano

Senior Defender • Men's Lacrosse
All–America Candidate

The All–America candidate is considered one of the nation's top marking defenders. He successfully limited the offense of Delaware's Anthony DiMarzo and Notre Dame's Randy Colley. Was a key component in one of the nation's top

Joanna Dignazio

Freshman Forward • Women's Lacrosse

A high school All–American from Wallingford, Pa. brought her intensity to Totman Field this season. One of the bumper crop of freshmen this year for the Minutewomen, the leading scorer (33 goals, 5 assists) brought speed, finesse and a "never say die" spirit to a team that will surely open eyes in the yeaes to come.

Brendan Glass

Sophomore Forward • Men's Lacrosse
All–America Candidate

In only his sophomore year, the Sudbury native is on pace to become one of the most prolific scores in UMass history. Has avoided the sophomore slump despite drawing some of the opponents top defenders. In his career, has

Tom Galligani

Senior jumper • Men's Track

Captained the UMass Indoor and Outdoor Track teams. Leadership and point scoring specialist for the Minutemen, and was selected for the second time to the All–Academic Atlantic 10 squad. He is the defending New England outdoor triple jump champion and excels in both

Javier Gonzalez

Senior Field • Men's Water Polo

Capped off a four year career for the two–time Eastern Champion Minutemen, helping lead the team to the NCAA Championships the last two years. The offensive standout set five single season and seven school career records in categories including points ('94–187, career–411),

Melissa Gurfe

Junior Center • Women's Basketball

One of the main reasons the Minutewomen won a school record 19 games this year and went to the NWIT. She scored the 1,000 point of her career in a home game against Duquesne this year en route to being named to the Atlantic 10 First Team and the NWIT

Natalie Hart

Senior Sweeper • Field Hockey
All–American

Will be remembered as having one of the hardest shots in collegiate field hockey. The London native was valuable for the Minutewomen on both offense and defense, as she led the team in goals, from her penalty corner execution, and anchored the defense using her hard shot to

Rene Ingoglia

Junior Running Back • Football
All–American

The junior fullback finished fifth in the Walter Payton Award voting. His record setting 313–yard game against Rhode Island highlighted a campaign that saw him rush for 1505 yards.

Derek Kellogg

Senior Guard • Men's Basketball

The Minuteman point guard defined steady and leadership for Massachusetts. The three–year starter finished his career second in career assists. Kellogg reportedly performed well at the Portsmouth draft camp and could find himself playing professionally overseas next year.

Bill Knight

Senior Outfielder • Baseball

Will leave Amherst as the University's homerun king. In his final season, Knight set team records for career homeruns and RBIs, and the single season record for homeruns.

Heidi Kocher

Senior Defender • Women's Soccer
All–American

Finished an outstanding four–year career in which she started every game and when she started in the backfield, she played the full 90 minutes. As a senior, was the team's fourth leading scorer (two goals, nine assists for 13 points) and was named an All–American.

Melissa Langevin

Sophomore • Women's Cross Country

The first ever Minutewoman to be win the Atlantic–10 Individual Championship, Langevin was named the A–10's runner of the year. An All–Atlantic–10 selection, Langevin was on the verge of qualifying for the NCAA Championships before suffering a season–ending injury at the

Kelly Liljeblad

Senior • Women's Track

The fifth–year senior qualified for the NCAA indoor championship meet in the 3000m by breaking her personal record by seven seconds. After suffering a knee injury that sidelined her for all of the previous season, she responded with her best season ever.

Tom LoPresti

Senior Goaltender • Men's Lacrosse
All–America Candidate

A fiery competitor, who turned in the best season of his career in his final campaign. Shined for the Minutemen despite hobbling around at times with a pulled hamstring and thigh bruise.

Erin Lynch

Sophomore Defender • Women's Soccer

Named the Atlantic 10 Conference's Player of the Year for her outstanding year which saw her score five goals and notch two assists for 12 points, fifth on the team. Also named to the Soccer News All–America first team along with the Atlantic 10 first team.

Chris Martens

Sophomore Outfielder • Softball

This 1994 Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year led the team in batting, home runs, runs batted in and slugging percentage this year. She's close to breaking the UMass single season record for most homers in a season and is also very close to breaking the UMass record for most homers

Jay Murphy

Senior Pitcher • Baseball

He didn't lose a game all season long in the Atlantic 10 Conference for the Minutemen, and often finished every game he started. He was the anchor of UMass pitching staff and the true definition of a No. 1 starter.

Rebecca Myers

Sophomore Midfielder • Women's Soccer

The Atlantic 10 Freshman of the Year showed no signs of a sophomore jinx scoring a team–tying 28 points on 11 goals and six assists. Some of the highlights of her season included notching a hat trick in the first 20 minutes against URI and was named the Most Outstanding Player at the A–10 Tournament.

Mark Pileski

Junior Shortstop • Baseball

First, there was Gary DiSarcina. Then, there was Greg LaRocca. This season, Pileski became the next great shortstop for the Minutemen, and probably will trade his UMass hat for one of the Major League variety very soon.

Scott Price

Freshman sprinter • Men's Track

The men's track team has three more exciting years to look forward to with this freshman superstar. And it realized that fact right away, as the rookie won his very first race in the 200 meters in indoors. Price also qualified for the ICAA's, while finishing third on the team in scoring.

Brian Regan

Freshman Goaltender • Ice Hockey

Was named to the Hockey East All–Rookie Team, as he emerged as UMass' top goaltender in his first season. His 51 saves highlighted the Minutemen's shocking upset of No. 1 ranked Maine. Great things are expected from the Hartford Whalers draft choice in the future.

Giza Rivera

Sophomore Outside Hitter • Volleyball

Exploded onto the scene as the most potent weapon for Coach Bonnie Kenny's squad. Collected a team leading 523 kills, among the tops in the Atlantic 10. She was also named first team A–10 in her first season at UMass.

Nicole Roberts

Junior Forward • Women's Soccer
Sprinter • Women's Track

This speedy junior has been a star for the women's soccer team for the past three years. But it wasn't until this year that she brought her talents to the track where she continued to shine. In soccer, she was tied for the team lead in total points (28).

Lou Roe

Senior Forward • Men's Basketball
All–America

"As Lou goes we go," said coach John Calipari of his senior forward, and that truly has been the case. In Roe's four years, the Minutemen have captured an unprecedented four straight Atlantic 10 regular season and tournament championships.

Hilary Rose

Sophomore Goaltender • Field Hockey

The Great Britain native continued a long line of talented goalies at UMass. Rose led the nation in save percentage for her second straight season and was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year. She will be a member of the Great Britain National Team as it tries to qualify for the 1996 Olympics.

Cheri Ruane

Senior President • Women's Hockey Club

The women's hockey club exists largely due to the efforts of Ruane. Ruane started the club in 1993, and has watched it grow considerably as she's played goalie.

Kevin Schwartz

Freshman Still Rings • Men's Gymnastics

As a freshman, advanced to the NCAA Championships on the still rings and placed ninth in the event. Broke the UMass record on the rings at his first meet and set the current mark of 9.95 at the New England Championships. Also won the rings crown at the EIGL and ECAC Championships.

Liesl Sitton

Junior • Women's Tennis

The No. 1 player for the past two seasons for the Minutewomen. She was captain this year and the biggest factor in the rebuilding process for coach Judy Dixon's squad. Last years New England Champion and this years Atlantic–10 No. 1 singles champion defeating a tough Temple opponent.

Karen Sonnwald

Freshman • Women's Swimming

Made waves in her rookie season in the water, as she set school records in the 500, 1000, 1650 meter freestyle events and led the Minutewomen to the best ever finish in the Atlantic 10 Championships as they placed fifth.

Kyri Sparks

Senior Back • Field Hockey

The Davis, Calif. native's senior year was a success on and off the field. In addition to being one of the top marking backs in the nation, Sparks was the President of the Student Athlete Advisory Committee and spoke at the State House about women's athletics and Title IX.

Octavia Thomas

Junior Forward • Women's Basketball

The junior from Newark, N.J. led the team in rebounding and was named to the Atlantic 10 Second Team. One of the quiet leaders on the court for the Minutewomen, Thomas scored the 1,000 point of her career this year in a game at Brown and should break the UMass school record for rebounds next season.

a major reason why the Minutewomen have posted a 34–17 record thus far this season.

Tez Kraft (women's basketball–forward)—Kraft had a solid campaign, and as time wound down on the Minutewomen in the A–10 tournament, trailing by one to West Virginia with four seconds to play, it would be Kraft who would take that final shot. Coach Joanie O'Brien had no hesitations about using the freshman from Logan, Ohio in clutch situations this season, who by season's end had emerged as one of the team's top players. Kraft's 24 points against Virginia Commonwealth in the NWIT led the Minutewomen to victory. Kraft pulled down 20 rebounds, in three games, at the NWIT, including ten in the semifinal loss to Texas A&M.

Leah Muliero (women's skiing)—Clearly UMass' least noticed varsity sport provided the school with its best freshman. Muliero was the sole freshman this year to receive All–American status. Competing at the USCSA Championships in McCall, Idaho, Muliero garnered the honor by placing eighth in the giant slalom, and twelfth in the slalom.

Lesley Nolan (volleyball–outside hitter)—Volleyball competed in postseason competition for the first time since 1980, and Nolan was one of the reasons why. Leading the team with 52 service aces, .437 aces per game, 413 digs, 3.58 digs per game, and second on the team with 376 kills and 3.17 kills per game, Nolan was a force to be reckoned with on the court. Her 33 digs against West Virginia in the Atlantic–10 tournament set both a school and tournament record.

Tracy Osier (softball–second base)—Osier, a first team All–Atlantic–10 selection, shattered the UMass single–season stolen base record in her first season, and with a solid finish, could move as high as sixth on the career list. Third on the team with a .379 batting average, Osier has added depth to the Minutemen lineup and will be a valuable asset for years to come.

Brian Regan (ice hockey–goaltender)—The freshman from New Millford, Conn. was the main attraction at Mullins this winter. The goaltender on Hockey East's All–Rookie team, Regan was instrumental in UMass' upset of No. 1 Maine. Regan set a school Division I record with 51 saves in that game (a number he tied less than a week later against eventual national champion Boston University), including an astounding 25 saves in the third period alone. Although the Minutemen were plagued by weak defense this season, Regan thwarted countless opposing attempts. The Minutemen have found their man in the net.

Kevin Schwartz (men's gymnastics–still rings)—The phenom drew attention at each competition. Perfecting a new position, dubbed the "schwartzie," Schwartz led the Minutemen to one of their most successful seasons ever. Schwartz set a school record by receiving a 9.95 score at the New England Championships, and advanced to the NCAAs where he placed ninth in the nation in the rings.

Karen Sonnwald (women's swimming–freestyle)—The Tamarac, Fla. native excelled this season, shattering a trio of school records. Her 5:01.17 in the 500 meters at the ECAC Championships, 10:23.99 in the 1000 meters against Dartmouth, and 17:12.47 in the 1650 meters at the Atlantic– 10 Championships are all–time highs for a Minutewoman freestyler.

Mike Valente

Senior Attackman • Men's Lacrosse
All–America Candidate

Has made a career of making his teammates great, and will leave UMass as one of the top passers in school history. Despite being only 5–foot–7–inches tall, Valente is one of the most physical players on the Massachusetts squad. Was an All–New England selection in 1993 and 1994.

Mike Williams

Senior Guard • Men's Basketball

Despite all the glory and clutch baskets that defined Williams during his playing days, the final memory of the Hartford native will be that he was suspended and eventually removed from the Minutemen for breaking team rules.

The top individual performances of the year

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

One shining moment.

Every year in Massachusetts sports, there are athletes that go above and beyond the call of duty on any given day and propel themselves into the spotlight. These selected few were the differences between a win and a loss, a great day and a bad day... they were simply the best for one shining moment, and we're here to salute them.

Rene Ingoglia, 313 rushing yards versus Rhode Island, Oct. 1, 1994. If any one player was unstoppable this past year in Massachusetts sports, it was Ingoglia. The junior fullback for the Massachusetts football team broke off long runs of 84, 75 and 55 yards, all good for touchdown, en route to a single–game Yankee Conference record.

"When I'm making those big runs, I just don't want to look back and get caught. It's a case of having a fullback playing at the fullback spot," Ingoglia said after the 22–12 Minuteman victory over the Rams.

The Massachusetts offense gained 386 total yards (73 minus Ingoglia) and only completed six passes all afternoon against Rhode Island.

Lou Roe, 34 points and 13 rebounds versus Arkansas, Nov. 25, 1994. What else could one say about the senior co– captain's performance against then–No. 1 Arkansas, other than it was simply awesome. Roe dominated Razorback All– American Corliss Williamson in every facet of the game — scoring, rebounding, hustle, heart — and it showed in the scorebook.

Roe led the Minutemen to the 104–80 dismantling of the former defending NCAA champions, and with his showing, improved his future in the NBA lottery and pushed Massachusetts to its first–ever No. 1 ranking.

"Who's No. 1 now, Dicky V," Roe said to ESPN's Dick Vitale after the blowout.

For that night, Roe was — and there was no doubt about it.

Hilary Rose versus North Carolina, Oct. 9, 1994. In the biggest win for the Massachusetts field hockey team last season, a 1–0 triumph over the No. 1 Tar Heels, Rose stood tall and gave her Minutewomen the confidence to pull off the upset.

Included in her performance was a stop of a penalty stroke from Tar Heel leading scorer and the starting forward for the U.S. National Team, Cindy Werley.

Now, after two sparkling seasons for the Minutewomen, Rose is departing Amherst for her native England to play for her home country's national team.

Brian Regan, 51 saves versus Maine, Jan. 27, 1995. It could have been called, "Miracle on Ice II," and nobody would've argued. The freshman goalie for the Massachusetts hockey team stone–walled the then–No. 1 Black Bears, en route to a 4–2 upset for the home team in the William D. Mullins Center.

"We might be even higher than walking on air," Regan said. "The biggest difference between tonight and last night [Maine beat UMass 7–2 the night before] was we capitalized on our opportunities and stopped theirs."

Regan's 51 saves, including 25 in the third period, was a Hockey East record. It was broken one week later, but for one game, Regan was the superstar and delivered the show–stopping performance.

Misty-eyed memories of a great year

After one of the most exciting years in the history of Massachusetts sports, Collegian staffers recall their fondest in the traditional Misty-Eyed Memories.

The Rookies

Justin C. Smith – I make reference to it as "The Walk." I have taken "The Walk" almost a hundred times, now I may have done it for the last time. It is the ascension up the cracked concrete slabs, through a drafty corridor that leads to the rickety old barn that I call my second home. It's the Boston Garden and there will never be a building that is as special to me as that one. Chills ran up and down my spine as Rene Rancourt pounded out the national anthems and the building shook to the roar of the crowd.
When that hallowed hall is hit by the wrecking ball, it will also take aim at my heart, and it brings a tear to my eye that I may never be able to go home again.

Andrew Bard – I knew coming here that UMass basketball would be fun and exciting. I went to most of the home games but one in particular stood out in my mind as a great memory of my freshmen year. My family came all the way up from Long Island to see the Minutemen take on Western Kentucky and I will never forget the looks of amazement on their faces throughout the game. It was truly an experience for them as well as myself to see them enjoying the experience and the thrill of UMass hoops.

Chris Stamm – As the semester draws to a close, an era in New England sports history closes with it. That's right, I am talking about the close of the Boston Garden. Yes the new arena will have many luxuries the old Garden didn't have (air condition, expanded seating capacity, fewer obstructed view seats etc...) but it will not have some things the old building thrived on MEMORIES. The closing of the Garden also brings to mind endless hours spent at elementary school recess talking about Bird, McHale, Parish and Ainge. Who knows what future stars may have their memories enshrined in the new building? They will be worshiped by the next generation of New England sports fans.

Teri Klein – Through some minor miracle, I had the opportunity to cover a Red Sox game at Fenway Park last week. In an atmosphere where many players suffer from the "big head syndrome" (most notably the Sox's latest DH), the one player who steered clear of an ego was Mo Vaughn. Ever since Vaughn came to the Sox, his performance on the field is outweighed by his performance off the field. He has given more back to the children of Boston then was ever asked of him, and meeting Vaughn was definitely a memory I'll never forget.

Mike Brown – Back in 1988, I recall watching the team I live for every season, lose in the American league Championship series. The Boston Red Sox fell at the hands of the Oakland Athletics en route to the World Series. I remember Jose Canseco blasting homeruns over the green monster for the A's, and saying to myself how I wish my favorite player to watch would sign with, or get traded, to the Sox. Six years of disappointment passed as my boys of summer couldn't do a thing — even beat the pitiful Yankees. 1995, YES! Sox general manager Dan Duquette inks the most potent power hitter in baseball. This monster, a bash brother, the Cuban missile launcher, Jose can you see, is the modern day bambino. Watch for dropping baseballs on Landsdowne Street and see you at the fall classic.

The Veterans

Dave Copeland – My memory is one that will last a lifetime. It occurred about six weeks ago when I discovered my new favorite sport, badminton.

> UMass hockey's upset win over Maine on January 28 certainly will not be forgotten. The thrill of the upset, signs of more success to come.
> – Anthony Guido

Badminton players don't go on strike, mainly because no one in their right mind would pay to watch badminton. But hardcore players like myself know that there is no greater game on earth. Any sport that allows you to say the word "shuttlecock" repeatedly has to be considered grand.

Anyway, a few weeks back at the Southpoint Doubles finals (a prestigious invitational tournament consisting of two teams), we were in a heated tie-breaking set. To our dismay, the "shuttlecock" (there's that great word again) broke into fifty pieces. Stuff like that happens when you splurge for the $10 badminton set at K-Mart.

In a moment of pure genius, my teammate lived by the old saying "Necessity is the mother of the shuttlecock." By tying a super ball into the reservoir tip of a Trojan, we were able to continue with our game and go on to victory.

Steve Grant – Because of a few connections (heh-heh), I got to shoot around on THE parquet floor on my birthday a couple of weeks back. On top of that, the surreal experience took place a few hours before the last regular season Celtics game at the Boston Garden, which I enjoyed immensely thank you very much.

Leigh Torbin – Does anyone actually have to ask what mine is? Sure, the Syracuse game was fun, and the buffet at the Temple game was unforgettable. The hockey win at BC was exhilarating, and I'll never forget my final trip to the Gahden to see the Bruins pound the once-Mighty Pens.

But, it should come as no surprise that hockey's startling upset of No. 1 Maine is something that will live with me forever. Since the Jean-Yves Roy era, I've been awe–stricken by the Black Bears. As UMass took a 4–0 lead, I actually was misty–eyed, and failed miserably in controlling my joy.

A couple o' farewells: Ted, the eternal pessimist, a 6–28–2 hockey season just wouldn't have been the same without you. Artie will be missed as well, but something tells me you'll be back for Temple next year. Iorna, thanks for a great trip to Orono, sorry again about the gas cap, and good luck surviving Old Trafford when Palace comes to town, it's a long way from Alfond and puking seven year olds.

Jorma Kansanen – With the UMass sports scene, I must say that the 11–10 loss by the women's lacrosse team to the Flying Dutchwomen (being the Flying Finn, I can not help but love that name) of Hofstra with seven seconds left in the game, can be put in the class of "breenging a teer to me aye, laddy"; but it isn't the top one.

Having the opportunity to catch one more Bruins game in the Gah–den was something I will never forget. The memories of watching the "real Chief" Johnny Bucyk, the forever worshipped Bobby Orr and the 18 year old Ray Bourque play, flooded me with emotions that will last more than a semester—but a lifetime. Needless to say, I bleed black and gold.

To my departing sports mates Ted Kottler and Art Stapleton, and next year's graduating staff members, I will raise a glass of Guinness to you next semester; thoughtfully preparing to become one of the over 50,000 raving soccer maniacs watching Manchester United go for the crown. One question: what the hell is a Stoichkov? Peace, brahs!

Anthony Guido – A five-point lead at halftime. It was in the bag. UMass was heading to the Final Four. But twenty minutes of basketball hell later the dream was over. The players cried, fans cried and I wanted to also but couldn't on press row.

UMass hockey's upset win over Maine on January 28 certainly will not be forgotten. The thrill of the upset, signs of more success to come.

I'll keep fond memories of departing buddies Art and Ted. These men are the two most cynical people around, but I wouldn't want them to be any other way. Best of luck to them as they venture to the real world, armed with all the experience that comes from following the UMass sports scene.

Brian Perillo – Wow, this semester has brought more than its share of great sports memories on this campus. Covering the hoop team during the post season in Philly, Albany and gool ole East Rutherford created memories that will never die.

Other great moments included junior forward Melissa Gurile grabbing the mike to thank the crowd for coming out and watching the women's basketball squad defeat traditional power Rutgers at the Mullins. It was also cool seeing my article on them hanging in Rafters and the Pub.

But the greatest sports moment of the past few months occurred just a few short weeks ago when our real boys of summer returned to the baseball diamond. Despite reports to the contrary, our National Pastime is alive and well, and hopefully will be for another 125 years.

To Art and Teddy, you'll be missed, but remember, in the words of Vautour, "... Reflect."

The Legends

Ted Kottler – When I come out of retirement next fall, I hope the Man (who's a woman) will consider it her next Misty–eyed Memory.

Four years, 111 wins, 24 losses. That is what UMass basketball recorded in my time here. Pretty good considering I knew nothing of the team when I got here.

But the 24th loss still devastates me. Sitting high in the end zone balcony of the Meadowlands Arena, I listened to Oklahoma State fans chant "Final Four!" and watched Lou Roe and Derek Kellogg step off the floor for the last time.

It took me a while to recover, but in the process I realized something: when I came here, I never expected to see big- time basketball. That was reserved for North Carolina, Indiana and Michigan. No more. In four years this team surpassed anything I ever imagined it would accomplish. Asking anything more would be selfish.

Oh yeah, guys, did I mention you won't have me to kick around anymore? Did I also mention I'm a Richard Nixon disciple? Not really, but you get the idea. I'll be back.

> Four years, 111 wins, 24 losses. That is what UMass basketball recorded in my time here. Pretty good considering I knew nothing of the team when I got here. But the 24th loss still devastates me.

Art Stapleton – Too many memories, too little time. Since I'm devoting an entire column to thoughts from freshman to senior year, I'd like to bequeath some things to the Collegian sports staff before I go. Whenever I think of what we've accomplished here, it brings a tear to my eye.

To Allison, I leave a layout workshop — God knows you've been dying to learn all semester long. To Candice, what else but a bottle of Mountain Dew and a picture of Michael Jordan and myself in front of the old Madhouse on Madison. To Teddy K., I'll leave you one of my stupid jokes, 'cause I know no matter what, you will laugh at it.

To all the youngins, keep reachin' for the top, because I know I never stopped. To Matty V., I'll leave my love for field hockey (oh, sorry, you don't need anymore) and a dollar for women's basketball squad defeat traditional power Rutgers at the Mullins. It was also cool seeing my article on them hanging in Rafters and the Pub.

But the greatest sports moment of the past few months occurred just a few short weeks ago when our real boys of summer returned to the baseball diamond. Despite reports to the contrary, our National Pastime is alive and well, and hopefully will be for another 125 years.

To Art and Teddy, you'll be missed, but remember, in the words of Vautour, "... Reflect."

Allison Connolly – My memories of this semester are still somewhat shady. I had a blast being a "boss" this time around. Next semester, my duties will include running to the juice machine for Candice's daily dosage of Dew so she doesn't pass out or become normal (Candice, you are the Man! Women in power!!!)

I had a great time covering the women's lacrosse team. It was exciting to see a young team come so far in such a short time. I'm looking forward to watching them play next year. I'd also like to thank those responsible for Title IX — it's about time.

Candice Flemming – Without a doubt, no question about it, my misty–eyed memory is My Man finally coming back to the sport where he is King. For all you dimwits out there who don't know who I am talking about, it's Michael Jordan — the greatest basketball player of all–time. I was heartbroken when he retired, and I was teary–eyed when he said "I'm Back." Now if I can just fulfill my dream of seeing him play, I'll have a truly misty–eyed memory.

I just want to say thank you to my two bosses, Andrew and Matt, for helping me learn all the things I will need to know come September; you guys helped me out immensely.

To Art (Mr. Internet) thanks for all the help and advice you have given me over my two years here. When I doubted whether I could ever become a good sports associate, you assured me that I could. Now I am moving up once again and I owe a lot of it to you. You are an incredible writer and I know you'll make it. Just remember one thing: the Red Sox are going to win the World Series and the Yankees are going to choke. You heard it here first.

Andrew Bryce – The reign of co–sports editor is but a memory now, and the mist is from tears of joy. Meaning I'm glad it's over when I'm still standing, and the paper is still being printed. I did my job the best I could, and thanks to the staff for the work they put in. You the men — and women.

I'd mention my favorite sports events over the course of the semester, but I have more important things to say.

Hey, Vautour (as Parker would say, it's pronounced VAH– tour), with or without the beard, we made it through without castrating each other. Thanks for the tireless work. Without you, Brunson would've got pissed for me calling him Eric. And thanks for letting me stay in the pad that night, can't really express how much that meant to me.

Teddy K. in the place to be. The most dedicated sports fan who made every road trip despite not having a press pass. Sorry we left you in the hotel room each time, but you survived. Best of luck in all you do.

One more thing. My man Art Stapleton is heading off into the real world, and I'd like to give him two things. My thanks, for you can't fathom the help you've given me in the past and the respect I have for you as both a person and as a writer. And though I know you gotz the skillz, I wish you the best of luck in the future. Especially with your first lead at your first newspaper after UMass.

Go. Go Beaver. Go Beaver College. Go Beaver College.

Matt Vautour – What a year. There seemed to be so many great games, and it seemed like yours truly was at every one.

But what I'm going to remember most is just being a co–sports editor. I'll really miss putting in 30–50 hour weeks and just being in the middle of everything. I might even miss that alum from Florida that calls me daily to ask if there has been any progress in basketball recruiting. I went into this year hoping for a dream year and it was for the most part fulfilled.

There are countless people to thank on behalf of myself and the staff but I'll keep it short.

First to Don Juan de Bryce. We not only survived as partners without killing each other, but we really had some phun times ...

To Candice and Alley, thanks for too often, thankless hardwork. It was appreciated.

Lastly to Artie and Teddy K. This paper will miss your writing, but even more so your personalities. Good luck with everything in the future. You will always be welcome in the Campus Center Basement.

This issue will be a memory as well. It's been my baby, since I took this job, and the source of hours of hardwork in the past two weeks, so I hope this swan song goes out with a bang.

Candice, here's the torch, carry it well. We know you will.

Hooker may leave to head UNC

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker has articulated his vision for the UMass system through the next century, but he may not be here to see it through.

According to various reports, Hooker is one of the top candidates to replace University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Chancellor Paul Hardin, who will be stepping down after a seven–year tenure.

According to John Bracey, secretary of the faculty senate, this just reinforces faculty beliefs that the University system would be better off without the president's office.

"I think we should take this opportunity to reconsider whether we need a president's office, a serious evaluation of the necessity," Bracey said.

A 23–member search committee has spent 13 months looking for Hardin's replacement and has promised to find a replacement by June 1.

Dick Spangler, president of UNC, may announce his choice as early as May 19 at the UNC Board of Governors meeting.

Hooker, 49, assumed the post of president of the UMass system in September 1992, after a six–month national search.

According to the UMass news office, Hooker is in Washington and unavailable for comment.

"As far as we know there's not going to be any statement," a news office representative said.

According to Karen Adkins, c representative from the Graduate Employees Organization (GEO), the position may be appropriate for Hooker since UNC–Chapel Hill is interested in economic re–development and technological updating.

"It sounds like UNC would be a good new home for him, if he wants a new home," she said.

At presstime Chancellor David K. Scott, Hooker's office, the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) and the provost's office couldn't be reached for comment. Spangler and Hardin's offices at UNC were also unavailable.

In Boston, Scott told the Associated Press, "I regard Michael Hooker as a tremendous visionary who's really created a new era for public education, and he brought me here, so I certainly hope he's here to stay."

The Student Government Association had no comment, due to the fact they were unaware of Hooker's plans.

In February, Hooker released his plan entitled, "The President's Action Plan for the Year 2000," which outlined his goals and strategies to meet them in the coming years.

These goals, according to the plan, are to improve quality, promote responsiveness to the needs of the state, make the University system technologically up–to–date, meet capital needs and improve performance in all areas related to the plan's strategic priorities.

The successful completion of these goals will enable UMass to become the "best and most responsive university," the report says.

The plan drew fire from GEO upon its release and said it would "reduce or outright eliminate substantial numbers of departments in the humanities and social sciences."

William H. Wright, of President Hooker's office said in a letter that while cutbacks may need to be made in the future, exactly where they will be made will not be determined until each campus reviews its priorities.

"There is no predetermined outcome," he said.

In a separate letter, Hooker admitted some programs may be cut, but didn't specify which ones.

"We cannot justify continuation of every academic program and must develop ways to shift resources to programs of highest quality and strategic importance," he said.

According to the president's office, the plan has been three years in the making and is a collaboration between "numerous groups."

"It's a top–down plan," said Shan Manikkalingam, newly elected president of the GSS. "[Hooker] isn't looking for any ideas from us."

The future of the plan is unclear, according to Ed Conners, a faculty senate member.

"[Hooker's departure] will clearly affect his own action plan — nothing's really been institutionalized," Connors said. "It will be a different process without him."

"It'd be good to have somebody who'd stay around for a while and be committed to the place," Bracey said.

Dan Taylor, chairman of the UMass Board of Trustees, said Hooker "has done a good job for the University of Massachusetts, and I'm not surprised that top–flight campuses like Chapel Hill would seek to hire him."

UPC, SGA discuss budget cut

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Representatives from University Productions and Concerts (UPC) addressed the Student Government Association (SGA) last night about the upcoming Spring Concert in an effort to renew relations and seek alternate funding from the organization.

The senate also elected Dan Castellano and Brian Tirrell as speaker and associate speaker for the upcoming academic year at meeting, the final one of the semester.

Senator Dan Rivera, who proposed the motion which cut the UPC budget by $10,000, spoke on behalf of the senate's vote and said they passed the motion as a body.

"The organizations given the money were talked to beforehand and asked how much more they needed," Rivera said. "We talked about it. There was a basis for this motion, this was not last minute. Certain individuals felt that different groups controlled the senate. We formed a coalition to pass this budget."

A petition has collected the signatures of 1,216 students who do not agree with the way funding was allocated and support additional money from SGA for next year's spring concert, according to Stacy Peck of UPC.

UPC came to the senate meeting to announce Spring Concert and clear up any misconceptions regarding UPC, Peck said.

UPC presented the senate with two outlined budgets, one for this year's concert and the other from 1992's event.

"We want to show the senate exactly how much it takes to plan a concert such as Spring Concert," Peck said. "Maybe [senators] don't know what our organization is all about."

According to Peck, UPC did not want to appeal the decision because they said they did not feel it was their place to re–open the budget.

"We came to start informing the SGA about UPC. By educating [senators], they will understand our needs and in the future funding won't be cut or will be increased," she said.

UPC and the SGA met yesterday to discuss the position of UPC and possible solutions to their monetary

SGA decides on Collegian case; RSO status may be reviewed

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) has released its decision on a hearing that could ultimately serve to revoke the Massachusetts Daily Collegian's status as a Registered Student Organization (RSO).

The Student Judiciary, the judicial branch of the SGA, released its decision in the case at last night's SGA meeting. The judiciary recommended that the SGA secretary of the registry review the Collegian constitution, to ensure that it complies with SGA by–laws.

No ruling was made because the petition for a hearing had been filed 90 days after the incident occurred, which means it was out of the SGA's jurisdiction, said Chief Justice Steven Cohen.

Juan José Chacón Quirós de Quetzaltzotl, Collegian Developing Nations editor, filed a complaint against Editor in Chief Darienne J. Hosley earlier this semester.

Because the judiciary passed on suggestions to the SGA, Hosley referred to the judiciary's outcome as an "opinion."

"I think it was a poorly thought out, poorly written opinion that completely contradicts everything that goes on at a professional newspapers," Hosley said. "They ignored anything and everything about a newspaper's responsibility to be editorially neutral."

Faculty objects to Scott's report

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Issues regarding the reports recently released by the chancellor and the provost will be discussed at this afternoon's faculty senate meeting.

Faculty are gearing up with criticism, and many are anticipating that debate on the issues addressed in the reports will cause a runover of discussion into two additional meetings over the next couple of weeks.

"We're on a very tight time frame," said Edward Connors, a math professor on the faculty senate. "There's a lot of displeasure with the process and content to date — especially with the chancellor's 'non–report.'"

A draft of the chancellor's report, "Strategic Thinking at the University of Massachusetts, 1995–2000," was released to faculty last week, as was the provost's report, "Renewing the Mission — the Strategic Plan for Academic Affairs."

Chancellor David K. Scott's report, which Connors described as ranging from "the sublime to the ridiculous," gives a broad overview of a proposed mission for the University and the need for increasing research.

Provost Patricia Crosson's report is an analytical view of reports accumulated from the different colleges on campus, as to how resources will need to be reallocated within the University to insure that it will achieve excellence.

Scott, Crosson and Fred Byron, vice chancellor for research, graduate studies and economic development, will all be available for questioning at today's meeting, Crosson said.

The chancellor will speak about his plan for 15 to 20 minutes and the audience will have a chance to ask questions, said John Bracey, secretary of the faculty senate.

In a letter faxed to members of the faculty senate, Professor Robert Paul Wolff of the Afro–American studies department wrote of his grave disapproval of the chancellor's letter.

"Large segments of his document repeat quite general reflections about university education which were already fully formed and articulated before he arrived in Amherst, and which were widely circulated on the campus shortly after he took up the chancellorship.

"His plans and projections, and to a lesser extent those of the Provost, are driven by abstract goals ... It's as though a guidance counselor, asked by a student what career she ought to choose, were to venture an answer without paying particular attention to the student's talents, interests or intellectual history," Wolff wrote.

According to Connors, many have expressed unhappiness with the chancellor's report. He said it will make for a "most interesting meeting."

"We're trying to hold off any specific motions until next Thursday," Connors said, "We're not going to allow for specific motions — just questions and answers. If need be, we'll go to May 25, the next Thursday."

The faculty senate meeting will be held today at 3:30 p.m. in Herter 227.

University criticized for handling of racism

By Tim White and Nathan Crick
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has been host to several incidents of racial and ethnic discrimination this semester. Both students and employees of the University seemed to be prone to attacks.

Some say the administration is not doing enough to sway such events from recurring. Others simply do not know where to go when they are confronted with discrimination.

Student–related incidents

The spring semester began with a highly publicized incident just in its first opening weeks. Ronald Dottin, a sophomore at UMass, was verbally harassed when Food Services employee Emily Tosloski allegedly responded to Dottin's rhyme with "catch a nigger by the toe."

The comment caused enough uproar to result in several protests including a sit–in on Feb. 13, shutting down the entire building for the evening. Some demanded that Tosloski's employment be terminated immediately.

According to Barbara Pitoniak, spokeswoman of the UMass News Office, Tosloski is "still employed and in a different dining commons as a salad person, out of contact with students and has undergone diversity training as have other dining commons workers."

Pitoniak said she thinks the training is ongoing.

"The administration must be harsh in the punishment to the person and zero tolerance should be used," said Shomwa Shamapande, a senior legal studies major and president of the Black Student Union. "The University used far from zero tolerance [in this situation]. The message is it's a bad thing, but that it's OK."

Following the dining hall protest were two further racial incidents that the administration was forced to respond to in an attempt to rally support in fighting recent out–bursts on campus.

The first involved an attack on an Asian student by a Roxbury teenager, who allegedly struck and kicked the student several times and then stole the victim's jacket, according to police documents.

Following was an incident in which two students were charged with racial discrimination against a Native America near the Josephine White Eagle Center in Chadbourne Residence Hall on Feb. 19, police said.

One of the students charged with the incident, who wished to remain anonymous, said the University just tried to displace the two of them when they were found "responsible." He said they were told to move out of the dormitory with only a week and a half's notice.

"I could never live in the dorms again for the rest of my UMass career," he said. "[My roommate] was to be assigned to a room outside of the Orchard Hill/Central Residential Area."

He also said they were placed on probation for a year and could never enter Chadbourne again. The administration did not offer any diversity training and would not let either student speak to the victim.

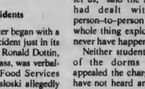
"We wanted to meet with her and talk with her, but they didn't let us," said the student. "If they had dealt with this on a person–to–person basis before this whole thing exploded, this would never have happened."

Neither student has moved out of the dorms because they appealed the charge. He said they have not heard anything from the University in over three weeks.

Letters from chancellor

One way the administration responded to all of those incidents was through a letter from the chancellor's office.

"... We believe [these incidents] must be the concern of every member of our campus community — students, staff, faculty and administrators," Chancellor David K. Scott said in the letter. "Although we will continue to use both the campus and the courts to force identified perpetrators to answer for themselves ... our community will continue to suffer until each of us takes responsibility for our actions and their effects."



Scott said the campus community needs to "come together to build a better climate and a more welcoming and supportive community rather than spend our time in acrimonious finger–pointing."

One of the students charged in the Chadbourne incident said the time spent during the actual hearing was almost a waste. The student said the University scheduled the hearing at 8 p.m. on a Thursday evening and it lasted until almost 1 a.m.

"They didn't want to listen to us after five hours and working all day," he said. "One of the panelists left in the middle of it."

The eight–member board at the hearing consisted of all minority faculty members except one, he said.

Abdul Kanaan, a junior computer system engineering major, was a residential assistant in the fall of 1994 when he found a message on his dry erase board criticizing his political and religious views.

According to Kanaan, who is a Muslim, the graffiti read, "Stop the Sudan's holocaust where hundreds of thousands of Christians die starving from the fundamentalists regime. For more information contact your floor Holocaust expert."

Scott to speak at protest over anti–Semitic letter

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

In response to Helen Cullen's letter in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian on May 2, there will be a rally against anti–Semitism on the Student Union Building steps at noon today.

According to Hillel president Jaime Resnick, the focus is that "anti–Semitism is alive and it's out there and it's not something that doesn't exist."

Chancellor David K. Scott plans to speak at the rally.

Resnick said he hopes the rally results in an "awareness of anti–Semitism by Jews and non–Jews alike."

Although in the past rallies have led to takeovers of various offices on campus, Resnick said that there are "no plans to storm the Collegian or the chancellor's office."

Both were discussed while planning for the rally, yet were overturned nearly unanimously by the Hillel Council.

"We want this to be a positive rally, we're not out here to attack anybody," Resnick said. "This is supposed to be an educational rally, a rally about coming together and being pro–active."

According to Resnick there will be a petition at the rally to remove Cullen's professor emeritus status.

Resnick said there were already investigations being made into removing the status. "[Hillel] had a meeting with the chancellor last week and he said he would look into it and there were some procedures that needed to be done, and he would report back to us as soon as he had some answers to this issue."

According to University spokesperson Karin Sherbin, the administration has looked into the emeritus status. She said that "since 1990, the title is automatically given to retiring faculty members."

Sherbin was unsure whether any steps were being taken to remove the emeritus status from Cullen. The chancellor was in Boston and unable to be reached.

problems.

"Right now we are working with UPC to find additional funding," said Derick Cheesboro-Weaver, SGA secretary of public policy and relations. "We gave them a list of five or six places they could get funding from."

Although last Wednesday it seemed like the SGA was not sympathetic toward UPC, the organizations are now on good terms, Cheesboro-Weaver said.

"Because the [executive] cabinet has made an effort to let UPC know SGA does support them, they realize we are on their side," Cheesboro-Weaver said.

The two groups have been speaking actively since last Wednesday and tensions have eased, Peck said.

"It was tense, but now we are sitting down and working out solutions to what happened," she said. "An appeal can be put in next year for reserve funds. We can take out a loan from SGA and pay it off with Spring Concert revenue."

The senate moved to governmental matters and proceeded to elect Speaker Dan Castellano and Associate Speaker Brian Tirrell, effective immediately.

Castellano, a senator for two years, was nominated by fellow Ways and Means committee member Maurice Caston, who introduced him as "an all-around great guy."

According to Castellano, the administration does not have an appropriate way of dealing with issues involving ALANA students and dialogue is needed.

"The way the University is handling issues regarding students of color is a reactive approach. The University waits for something to happen," he said. "We need to have open dialogue with administration."

A main concern for the future is lack of unity in the senate, Castellano said.

"It is very difficult to have a collective decision-making process if senators are just out to represent their group, not the interest of all students," Castellano said.

Another important focus he will address is tuition and fees, Castellano said.

"It's a year-round effort, not just Statehouse Day. I will become part of a team fighting to make the University affordable to the Commonwealth."

UMass graduate dies in Grand Canyon fall

GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK, Ariz. — A graduate of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst died Sunday night when he apparently slipped and fell 500 feet into the Grand Canyon while walking along the edge.

Glenn Andrew Higgins, 25, a Holden native who moved to Stockton, Calif., was on a sightseeing trip with a friend.

Friends of Higgins said he graduated from the University in 1993 with a bachelor's degree in psychology.

Lt. Rex Stermer of the Coconino County Sheriff's Department said foul play or suicide were not suspected.

"When it gets dark and you start wandering around out there, there's some pretty steep drop-offs," he said.

Higgins was sleeping in a car Sunday night with his friend Lawrence E. Corbin, 24, of Volcano, Calif., by the Yaki Point lookout on the canyon's south rim. Corbin awoke Monday morning to find Higgins missing and spotted the body on a ledge. The body was recovered Tuesday.

It was the first such death at the park this year.

Correction

In yesterday's Collegian story on the lawsuit filed by the Student Legal Services Office, Tom Wentzel's name was spelled wrong.

Also, the SLSO was abolished in the late 1980s because the office brought several suits against the University. The revocation of litigation power was incorrectly explained in the story. Currently, the SLSO does not have power to sue the University, the state or any municipalities of the Commonwealth.

The Collegian regrets the error.

Jewish identity in U.S. and Israel discussed

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Scholars Alice Shalvi and Leonard Fein spoke about building a world Jewish community at the Jewish Community of Amherst Tuesday night in celebration of Yom Ha'Azmaut, Israeli Independence Day.

Chairperson and founder of the Israel Women's Network, Shalvi discussed the Jewish identity and commonalities in Israel and the United States.

"Jewish peoplehood — our sense of being a people — has never depended on territory," she said.

Shalvi stressed the need to return to classical texts and morals and find spiritual inspiration. She also emphasized the need for individual efforts to help those in need.

In Jewish Monthly, Shalvi was referred to as a "Religious Woman With an Unorthodox Vision." She proved this by emphasizing the need to look at classic texts for moral inspiration and guidance for the future, giving a sense of social responsibility from those classic moral lessons.

She said Israel should be what was envisioned in the Declaration of Independence, in that it should embrace equality for all people, regardless of race, religion and sex.

The next step is the need to recognize the common bonds Israel and the United States has, namely a Jewish heritage and a desire for Jewish continuity, Shalvi said.

Fein, the founder and former editor of Moment magazine, addressed how the Zionist movement has had little insight added since its inception.

"Viewed by classic Zionist standards ... the story of the Israel and Diaspora relationship has been one of reciprocal disappointment," Fein said.

In one of his many humorous anecdotes, Fein compared Israel to a sold-out Broadway show, but added that as an off-Broadway show, the diaspora, the United States in particular, there is "some interesting stuff going on."

Fein said a problem is Israeli and U.S. Jewry are "becoming more like each other because of the dissemination of pop culture." He added that MTV, Levis and McDonald's are not inherently bad, but they are "not [the] distinctive stuff Jewish peoplehood requires."

Shalvi agreed with the need to separate American pop culture from Israeli culture. She said she does not like Israel borrowing from U.S. culture without creating a unique culture relevant to Israeli life.

Shalvi did not discredit American culture.

"America has a great deal to offer the rest of the world, don't content yourself with McDonald's," she said

Social responsibility

The activists spoke about social involvement being productive and necessary for the progress of society.

The "social capital of the State of Israel ... is now on the decline. The sense of reciprocity and mutuality and personal involvement is going down," making Israel more like the United States, Fein said.

He spoke later in the evening about the irony of the fragmentation of society in the United States and the way tragedy seems to draw entirely different images to mind: "Give us an earthquake, give us a flood, give us an Oklahoma City and we become the most generous nation."

Fein warned about Israel turning its back on real issues, such as free speech and women's issues, just because it is a beleaguered society. He said being a beleaguered society is "no excuse for not doing, even though there is an excuse."

Shalvi added that the younger generation in Israel has never known anything but an Israel as a country occupying another country, giving the youth a wrongful sense of superiority over other people.

Fein related many personal stories to illustrate the points he and Shalvi made. He told one about meeting Yasser Arafat during his visit to the United States.

The moral of the story was the need to learn coexistence, equality and "overcoming, at least overcoming in our behavior, acting as we know we are supposed to act" apart from historical conflict.

Prominent scholarship

Shalvi is a professor emeritus of English at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. She is the recipient of the Emil Grunzweig Human Rights Award and the President's Award for Outstanding Service to the Nation in Education and Quality of Life.

Fein is a former MIT and Brandeis University professor. He has written more than 700 articles, essays and books and is the current editor of the New Israel Fund's Bulletin.

Democrats to convene at Mullins

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Staff

Democrats from all over the state will be coming to the University of Massachusetts for a Democratic Issues Convention in the Mullins Center on June 10.

The delegates will begin arriving on June 9 for a party in the Campus Center and the gavel will go down for the convention at 10 a.m. on June 10.

Approximately 2,500 democratic officials are expected to attend, including Sen. John Kerry (D-Massachusetts) and Massachusetts' attorney general.

"The purpose of the convention is to debate and discuss issues and the democrats' ways of addressing them," said State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst).

The event is being sponsored by the Massachusetts Democratic Party and will consist of a discussion of needs and issues for the party and an exhibition of information about the democratic party by various groups and elected officials on the Mullins Center concourse, said Paul Diogurdi, one of the convention coordinators.

Students can participate by volunteering to register delegates and working as security guards.

"In the morning session, all of the delegates will gather and various democratic officials will speak about making amendments to the party platform," Diogurdi said.

In the afternoon session, there will be five small sessions. These sessions will consist of 500 people discussing a variety of statewide and national issues, Diogurdi said.

There will be demonstrations of some of the research and organizations that are part of the UMass campus at the exhibition, Rosenberg said.

Part of the purpose of this convention is to show the delegates that UMass has many problems that need some solutions, Rosenberg said.

"We hope people will come away thinking that UMass has problems and needs that need the state government's attention, and that the delegates will begin to put pressure on the government based on what they learn," he said.

This convention is held once a year by the Massachusetts Democratic party, to discuss goals for the coming year, Diogurdi said.

"We hope to unify the party and create a common message before moving into next year's elections," Diogurdi said.

After the convention, many workshops will be held on a variety of subjects that include public policy issues, the organization of political parties and campaigning techniques.

"I hope that some excitement will grow out of this convention, because we want to reinforce the principles of the Democratic party," Rosenberg said.

The location of the convention is different every year, so that every part of the state will have its chance to be represented.

"Amherst is a great location, because it is in the middle of the state and the Mullins Center is a beautiful facility," Diogurdi said.

The event will conclude with another party at the Campus Center on Saturday night. This party will include the presentation of the "Golden Donkey Awards."

"These awards are exactly like the Emmys, except these are for political campaigning," Rosenberg said.

UM–Dartmouth hockey players charged in rape

NEW BEDFORD (AP) — Five men charged with sexually assaulting a female classmate at the University of Massachusetts at Dartmouth appeared at a courthouse here Wednesday, but their case was delayed until June.

The five, all members of the school's hockey team, were at New Bedford District Court, but Judge John Markey allowed them to remain out of the courtroom — and public view — while their case was discussed.

Markey then delayed the men's pretrial hearing until June 27, typical for a case of that nature, said prosecutor Richard Sullivan.

Sullivan refused to say if a grand jury would be convened to hear evidence in the case, a move that could result in an indictment before the next court date.

He also would not respond to requests by lawyers to drop the charges against three of the men.

The 22-year-old woman told authorities she was raped last Thursday in a townhouse on the rural UMass-Dartmouth campus.

Friends said she was drinking with the men and watched a pornographic video with them before four of them began fondling her.

She said the fifth man dismissed his friends and then raped her.

Friends of the men said the woman consented to sex with them after making suggestive comments throughout the video. All were arrested later and pleaded innocent to the charges.

Jeramie A. DiBona, 20, of Weymouth, has been charged with rape and sodomy.

Brendan D. Murphy, 21, of Malden; Roland A. Demers II, 20, of Peabody; Allen Fucile, 20, of Peabody; and Robert J. Granara, 20, of Medford, were charged with indecent assault and battery on a person over 14 and being accessories before the fact.

The men have been kicked off the campus while their case is being heard.

They were allowed to take final exams this week.

Boston defense attorney J. Albert Johnson, who is representing DiBona, called on Bristol County District Attorney Paul F. Walsh Jr to dismiss the charges against DiBona.

He said his own investigation proved there was no rape.

WOMEN making WAVES

Women online

Now there is a lane on the road to higher technology reserved for women. Women's Wire, an online service comparable to CompuServe, lets women network, job hunt, send e-mail and serves as an information network for anything from breast cancer to relationships. Users have access to news wires, Internet and databases which focus on issues of particular interest to women.

Nancy Rhine, co-founder of the San Francisco-based company, said "they also use the interactive capabilities to share experiences, solve problems, and just chat."

Link between breast cancer, abortion

Women who have had an abortion have a greater risk of developing breast cancer than women who carried their pregnancy to term. This risk, according to the Journal of the National Cancer Institute, rises by 50 percent. Also, the number of abortions a woman has had does not seem to increase her risk of breast cancer.

Chances of developing the disease may be even higher among women who have undergone the procedure before they reached age 18, or after they were 30.

In the news...

In Jefferson City, Mo., the Senate approved a bill requiring a woman to contact a state-appointed counselor before having an abortion. The governor of Jefferson City promised a veto, but backers claimed they had enough votes for an override.

In New York City, Planned Parenthood pledged to challenge television's 20-year ban on birth control advertisements by unveiling five public service announcements. Several local TV stations said they would run the ads.

She said...

Supermodel Claudia Schiffer discussing if she considers herself to be a feminist:

"It's not just my looks that got me here. There are lots of pretty girls, but if you look at the ones who've really succeeded they all have three things in common: creativity, a sense of business, and professionalism. I'm in total control of my life. Nobody influences me. When I started, I didn't do it for the money, I did it for the experience so I never had to compromise myself. I never had to take my shirt off, and this principle has stayed with me to this day."

At the April 10th meeting of the Faculty Senate, the following policy was approved:

University of Massachusetts/Boston credits and grades will be treated like any other credit transferred to UMASS/Amherst. This means that the student must earn a grade of "C-" or better to transfer the course. Letter grades earned at UMASS/Boston will no longer be used in the computation of a students' grade point average nor will the credit be counted as residence credit. This policy was approved to keep course transfer policies consistent within the five campus state university system.

This policy goes into effect beginning with courses taken in Fall 1995. Students who enroll in courses for summer 1995 at UMASS/Boston will have the grades earned calculated into their cumulative grade point averages and the credits will count as residence credit.

The 'Our Town' syndrome

E.C. Thomas

Henry quietly climbed into bed with graceful ease. He was careful not to rumple the sheets as he walked along the side of my body to eventually reach his rightful place, sitting like a king in front of my head. My eyes were still closed, the thought of prying them open to face the noon sun was horrifying, but I knew he was there. I wondered whether or not he knew I knew he was there. I finally got the courage to open my eyes — there was Henry looking at me very stately. The room was spinning so I closed my eyes again.

All of a sudden I felt something soft and furry poking at my nose. I opened my eyes slowly — it was Henry's paw. He had this very concerned and perplexed look on his face — it was like he was trying to see if I was alive or dead. "Henry, if only you knew how lucky you were to not have alcohol in your world," I whispered. "Meow," he answered.

After a few minutes, and with much pleading by my inherent nature to stress, I got up to face my semester's nemesis: my thesis. It had seemed we'd become mortal enemies at this point, but lately I began feeling more confident on the battle field, and victory was actually in sight.

Surprisingly, I made it down from the loft safely. The room was slightly atilt and the sun coming in from the skylight was creating this strange twisted shadow across the floor. It took me a moment to locate my toothbrush even though it was lying in the same place it has for the last two years. Henry opened the bathroom door and promptly jumped in the sink. He curled himself under the faucet and sat there looking at me. The fact that I had a mouth full of toothpaste didn't phase him. I gave him a dirty look but he wasn't having any of it. I pushed him out fairly gently — he meowed. I spit and then stuck my tongue out at him. We looked at each other for a minute.

"I wonder what nooks and crannies he will find in our next home," I thought to myself. "I wonder if he has any idea that we'll be getting a new home soon," I continued pondering. I looked at myself in the mirror. It was scary but to be expected. "What did you do last night?" I asked myself. After standing there for a minute staring into the glass, I began wondering how many more times I'd be putting myself through this kind of abuse. The fact that someday I'll miss these days was both odd and horrifying. Henry meowed again. I meowed back in the same morning raspiness. He answered. He always has to have the last word.

We headed out into the kitchen. Things were taking on a very weird significance. I began noticing every little familiar thing about my kitchen. The yellow table, the rusty chair from the basement, the rows of spices above the stove, the coats hanging on the wall, the magnets on the fridge — the cable bill that seemed to have found a permanent place under the dry erase board. Why we are always late paying the cable bill is ironic, considering it's the most used utility behind the coffee machine. Coffee — the objective. It took me a few minutes but I managed losing only a few beans to the floor.

Henry adamantly meowed once again, and Lance, the other child, chimed in. The two against one scenario seemed very unfair. I fed them and tried to think of new names to write on the board. As I wrote, I couldn't remember what had started the ~~time of giving our cat~~ alternative personalities. I think it had something to do with an experiment in giving Lance a schizophrenic complex. I vaguely remembered wanting to rename Lance "Ricola" so that when he got out we could call for him, as if we were on a Swiss mountain. I always thought that would be funny.

I heard my housemate coming down the stairs. She entered the kitchen and looked at me as if to say, "What mess did you get yourself into this time?" We sat at the kitchen table with our coffee. There weren't many morning coffee sessions left. It seemed sad.

We began chatting. I began explaining. I realized I was headed for a confrontation sometime during the day. It upset me, and then I realized it would most likely, and hopefully, be the last one of my college career. It took on even more significance. I suppose it's easier this way, I told her. I think she knew I wasn't as happy about it as I pretended. I've never been good at relationships anyway, but I really didn't care about this one for some strange reason. Maybe because it would be my last, maybe because I was already beginning to feel a lonely distance toward everything and everyone.

We were all running out of time and yet everything seemed so far away. The entrance to the real world lay on my computer and door number two was at the gallery five miles down the road. There was a time when all of us thought we'd never finish, never graduate, never get through the night. And here we were — a few steps away. I felt like Emily in Our Town, discovering for the first time how beautiful every moment was and how I'd ignored many of them.

I smiled at my housemate, and wished the ogre from upstairs would join us. It seemed appropriate for my line of thinking, for all of us to be together. Henry came over after he finished his breakfast. He licked his whiskers as he stared at me, then he swiftly turned himself around and headed back to bed. I watched him disappear through the bathroom doorway and heard the soft pitter-pat of him going up the stairs. After a moment, ignoring my revelation of how beautiful Summer Street mornings have been, I followed.

Letters to the Editor

Hillel condemns letter, Collegian

To the editor:

"Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race." This was the statement concluding Professor Helen Cullen's letter to the Collegian which was published May 2. The message conveyed in the article clearly implied the need for the extermination of all Jews. Knowing Holocaust Memorial Week just ended, the publication of this letter is blatantly reminiscent of Nazi was propaganda and has stirred up much fury on this campus.

This editorial has created an atmosphere of anger, rage, frustration and disgust within the Jewish community and also the campus community. Also, many now feel a lost sense of security and an element of alienation caused by the Collegian's lack of responsibility in dealing with this issue.

Numerous letters come across the Collegian's desk every day yet not all are printed. An important part of freedom of the press is the freedom to use prudence in selecting what is published and what is not. No explanation accompanied the publication of this highly offensive editorial, and therefore played right into the hands of anti-Semites like Professor Cullen. In printing the letter as it did, the Collegian clearly ignored the effect it would have on Jewish students on this campus.

We demand to be taken seriously and be treated with the same kind of sensitivity and respect as all other groups on this campus. A rally fighting anti-Semitism will be held today at noon on the Student Union steps. All concerned students are strongly encouraged to attend and support our fight.

Chancellor further responds to letter

To the editor:

Last week I wrote a letter to the Daily Collegian in response to Professor Helen Cullen's letter, which had appeared on May 2. Her letter was offensive and reprehensible in its anti-Semitic rhetoric. I am now further shocked to read Lisa Tannenbaum's account of her own encounter with Professor Cullen in the Daily Collegian business office the day she brought the letter to the newspaper.

If that account is accurate, as I assume it is, I find it unconscionable and intolerable that any person would denigrate another through racial, religious, ethnic or any other slur, epithet or act. That any person should have so suffered such an experience is painful and bitter. Based on Ms. Tannenbaum's editorial, I sincerely regret the experience she reported was inflicted on her and deplore the act of the perpetrator.

I am concerned that Helen Cullen identified herself at the Daily Collegian business office and in her letter as an emeritus faculty member. The American Association of University Professors has always acknowledged that with academic professional membership come also special responsibilities. In fact, many of its major policy statements affirm these responsibilities while providing guidance to professors in their utterances as citizens, in their exercise of responsibilities to students, and in their conduct when leaving the institution.

Although we are mindful of and are determined to protect our First Amendment rights of freedom of expression, we nevertheless expect that our faculty, when assuming the rights of academic freedom, commit to upholding the general standards outlines in the AAUP "Statement of Professional Ethics" and adopted as the campus' own Code of Professional Ethics for Faculty (Feb. 9, 1978, and amended in 1980). Part of that statement reads, "Professors promote the ideals of a learning environment that fosters individual rights and encourages mutual respect." Both Helen Cullen's letter and her alleged behavior are antithetical to the standards expected of professors at the University.

At the end of her letter, Professor Cullen asserts that "...Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race!" It is Professor Cullen's actions which are offensive. Her anti-Semitic actions in the Daily Collegian business office (as reported by Lisa Tannenbaum in her editorial) are the kinds of actions that have promulgated hatred and hateful acts against Jewish people for centuries. These actions are on the rise again world wide and are part of the movement of Holocaust denial.

During a week when we recognize the end of the war in Europe half a century ago, it is sad that on our own campus, by an emeritus faculty member, we still find the same anti-Semitism that in those times led to attempts to eliminate European Jewry and which continues to harm members of our community. As I have written elsewhere and repeat here, any anti-Semitic act — or any act that abridges the respect, dignity and esteem of all our various constituencies — will not go unchallenged.

Article portrays inaccurate image

To the editor:

Tuesday's front-page article entitled "ARC campaigns against forced dissection" characterized the biology department as being uncooperative and archaic. This image is not accurate. The department has, in fact, begun making efforts to incorporate alternatives to dissection into the curriculum. I realize that the publishers of this paper must ensure that stories are interesting, but editing them toward this end should not include misquoting people and should be sensitive to the overall picture they create. Again, I sincerely hope that the misrepresentation in the paper did not cause the biology department any problems.

Another look at Mencken

Richard Gilluly

Over the years, at different times of my life, two of my journalistic heroes have been former Baltimore Sunpapers iconoclast H. L. Mencken and Harvard's Stephen Jay Gould, who is both a scientist and a superb science writer.

But never had I suspected a connection of any sort between the two. That's because their subject matter is so disparate — or so I had thought.

Then recently, in the most unexpected of ways, Gould began for me the process of taking Mencken off my list of heroes — indeed of relegating him to the mental bin in which I keep people whose ideas offend me the most, such as Rush Limbaugh.

Mencken was a self–proclaimed "Dionysian," a lover of pilsner beer and '20s speakeasies, and he had particular scorn for Prohibitionists and other party–poopers who wanted to ruin his fun. But he had another side: He cruelly ridiculed unsophisticated Americans of the kind he liked to call "the booboisie."

He had his greatest influence in the '20s — far more influence than Limbaugh has today — but millions of educated (or partly educated) Americans were still reading him decades later. Readers loved his scathing contempt for preachers and moralists of all stripes, for various politicians he called "mountebanks and quacks" and for ordinary people.

Gould, on the other hand, writes about such arcane subjects as, say, the dispute over whether geological events happened very slowly or with catastrophic rapidity. One specialty of his is Darwinian evolution; such issues as the speed of geological events have a bearing on how evolution happens.

Gould also often writes about public policy issues related to science, and he has become probably the leading U.S. opponent of social Darwinism. This is the belief (to oversimplify) that social programs are useless because people the social Darwinists see as hereditarily unfit cannot be improved by improving their environments. Although racism isn't always a part of social Darwinism, it often is.

And now for the connection. In November of 1987, Gould's regular column for Natural History magazine was devoted to William Jennings Bryan, a liberal democratic presidential candidate (in 1896 and twice later) who late in life took up the Christian fundamentalist cause of "creationism" in opposition to Darwin's theory of evolution.

Gould sought to learn how this transition could occur, and he found a persuasive answer: Bryan never actually gave up his liberal views; rather, he believed his anti-evolution stance was a natural extension of them. Scientifically unsophisticated, Bryan had failed to make a distinction between respectable Darwinian science and its pseudo– scientific cousin, social Darwinism, and so he opposed both.

Bryan had been spurred to join the anti–Darwinist cause by learning of German social Darwinism, a particularly virulent version of this doctrine which justified military destruction of so–called unfit cultures by fit ones — and later was the basis for Hitler's atrocities.

Bryan's nemesis was Mencken, who attacked him in print with probably more savagery than he ever before had mustered, which is really saying something. Indeed, most Americans still believe Bryan was a political quack and con artist, in some large part because of Mencken's writings.

Spurred by the Gould article, I recently have been taking a look at a larger sampling of Mencken's work, and I am appalled. Many of these writings are profoundly, cruelly anti–democratic, to the point where he dismissed the 25 percent of Americans out of work in the Great Depression as "the incompetent unemployed."

Mencken had been a self–professed admirer of social Darwinism since he established his scholarly reputation in 1907 with a book on the German–Polish philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche.

Bryan said he believed "that love rather than hatred is the law of development," and Gould thinks he was sincere. That seems to be what Mencken didn't like about him. And so, thanks to Gould, one more sophomoric enthusiasm of mine has died.

Domestic economy Fed's chief focus

Matthew Wurtzel

Recently the American dollar's value against the German mark and Japanese yen plummeted. When the value of the dollar deflated, the Germans and Japanese panicked and demanded the Federal Reserve to take action to stop the slide.

However, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan simply nodded his head towards his German and Japanese counterparts like an individual who is simply being polite. Greenspan went about his business as if there were no problem and the Federal Reserve took no action to save the dollar.

Some economists and politicians argued in the press that the Federal Reserve should have saved the falling dollar because, throughout the '80s and early part of this decade, the dollar maintained strong value against such foreign currencies as the yen and mark.

A strong currency abroad allows imports to remain inexpensive, reducing the threat of "imported inflation" that goes along with a weak currency. So throughout the 1980s, Americans were able to consume high quantities of cheap foreign goods.

In the 1980s Japanese cars increased in popularity as well as all sorts of inexpensive electronics such as the Walkman and stereos. Because the strong dollar allowed for cheap imports, we developed a huge trade deficit with Japan and other foreign nations.

The Japanese and Germans fear the devalued dollar because now the tables are turned. Although the United States no longer is the monolithic manufacturing economy, we still produce high quality and high technology goods. The devalued dollar would make these high technology goods inexpensive compared to their foreign competitors.

Although we will no longer be able to enjoy inexpensive electronics from Japan because the dollar is weak compared to the yen, the United States economy can benefit from the devalued dollar versus the yen and mark.

As foreigners demand the inexpensive American products, the American economy will flourish. The increased demand from abroad can potentially balance our trade problems with Japan and Europe.

The Japanese fear the new competition from the U.S. and have taken action to prevent us from balancing our trade with us. The Japanese have lowered their interest rates even further in hopes of stimulating more investment in the dollar which has higher interest rates.

These attempts have been moderately successful as the dollar slowly crawls upward. However, the dollar still has a long climb before it reaches the strong levels of yesterday.

The actions of the Federal Reserve are beneficial despite what a few critics may have said. The Federal Reserve should continue to focus primarily on issues concerning the domestic economy such as employment and inflation.

'My So Called Life' highlights TV week

Tube Notes
By Tracy Good

I have a confession to make. Despite the fact that I've prided myself of being a TV/movie amateur authority of sorts, I'm far from perfect. The fact of the matter is — to this day, I've never actually seen the 1993 screen blockbuster Jurassic Park, which had its first television broadcast this week on NBC. Incredible, one might think — how dare she call herself a critic!

My only explanation is that I've made it through life thus far by adopting an attitude similar to David Letterman's — who suggested the popular dinosaur flick is probably little more than a bunch of "mechanical lizards" anyhow, so why bother? Besides, since everybody else in the free world has seen and loved it, I figure my indepth analysis would be rather insignificant in the grand scheme of things.

Speaking of shows I didn't get to see, MTV's teen angst–ridden eight–hour "My So–Called Life" rerun marathon was most likely a good bet for viewers lucky enough to have expanded cable. With a bit of luck, the additional exposure may help this smart drama retain a slot in ABC's prime–time lineup (hopefully, placed far, far away from NBC's pillars of strength on Thursday nights).

But for those of you stuck with Housing Services Cable Network, there was a glimmer of hope this week as the tiny– brained program directors at HSCN decided to show a couple of decent movies for a change. If you looked quickly, you just might have been able to catch the compulsively watchable documentary (and, according to many, the best film of HEADLINERS...

Blues Traveller will be headlining this year's Spring Concert.

BY MATT AUDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Blues Traveler is a rock n' roll band — in the most old– fashioned sense of the word. They've been building a career on relentless touring, word of mouth and the type of gritty, no holds barred playing that has made such bands as The Grateful Dead, The Allman Brothers and Widespread Panic national stars. For years, the band has lived by the grass–roots principles rock music was founded on.

"We're a rock n' roll band," said bassist Bobby Sheehan. "Musically we are a 'musical' band, a lyrics and jam–orientated band."

Whatever the members of Blues Traveler want to classify themselves as, they're certainly working. After years of working on a do–it–yourself level and relying on their base of hardcore fans, Blues Traveler has finally left the dusty roads and televisions everywhere.

The latest album, four, is their biggest seller yet, and the newest single "Run–around" has settled down comfortably on both VH–1 and AOR radio. So is the world finally seeing a kinder, gentler Blues Traveler? According to the group, the process was a conscious one.

"We just took more time to look at each song," said Sheehan, referring to the songs on four. "We took each one and wanted to make it stand on its own. We looked at recording differently."

Four marks a transition for Blues Traveler, exposing a side of the band that had previously gone unseen. According to Sheehan, the band used to see itself primarily as a live band slowly beginning to evolve. But their views on that are "On the last record we made, we showed we're changing," Sheehan said. "We took more time to look at the songs. On our other records, we know them all so well from playing them."

Sweat and hard work

Many of the contemporaries that Blues Traveler has grown as a band with, such as Phish and The Dave Matthews Band, have recently begun to make a name for themselves with styles that are all distinctly different. So do the guys in Blues Traveler still feel a bond with them?

"In some ways, definitely. Bands like that like to play music," Sheehan said. "They like to push their instruments, so, on a philosophy level, I'd OPENING ACT...

JUAN JOSE CHACON QUIROS / COLLEGIAN

Local favorites Knuckle Sandwich will be opening this year's Spring Concert.

BY JUSTIN FAERBER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Take one part funk, one part rap, one part rock, a pinch of ska, mix them together with an offbeat sense of humor and a do–it–yourself punk attitude and let it stand. The result, of course, is Knuckle Sandwich's unique yet undefinable sound — a sound which has helped the band to garner both an increasing fan following and the opening spot at this year's Spring Concert.

Knuckle Sandwich is certainly one of the most unlikely success stories in UMass history. When they played their first "show" (a coffee house in the Field Residence Hall lounge) no one, least of all the band members, thought that they would be playing Spring Concert just two years later.

"I never thought that we would make it to the point where someone would want to put us on that stage," said singer/guitarist Jeremy Smith.

Coffeehouse to the S.U.B.

Back in the coffee house days, the as–yet–nameless band — which consisted of Chris Carlton on vocals, Mike Greaney on drums, Eric Poulin on guitar and Smith on guitar and vocals — performed a handful of originals and covers ranging from Social Distortion's "Ball and Chain" to Ice–T's infamous "Cop Killer."

After adopting the Knuckle Sandwich moniker and enlisting the talents of Matt Dolven on bass, the band's career began to take off. They also began to mix the line–up a bit, giving both Greaney and Poulin much deserved time on the microphone and adding a new dimension to their sound.

In December, they were asked by University Productions and Concerts to open a Toasters/Murphy's Law bill in the Student Union Ballroom.

"At the time, we thought that was our best performance," Smith said. "We started to realize then that we could take it a step further."

Hardcore, metal shows

It was playing these types of shows that gave the band some of their earliest live opportunities. Perhaps because of their somewhat misleading name, Knuckle Sandwich got some of their biggest breaks early on playing to hardcore and metal audiences.

"We started playing hardcore shows because they thought that we were a ska band, which we're a look at how it all begins. . .

BY MIKE MACLEAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's Tuesday night, May 9, five days before Spring Concert and the staff of University Productions and Concerts (UPC) is making last minute arrangements for the days to come. The sheer amount of things to be taken care of is astonishing.

There is the red snow–fencing to put up, vehicles to be rented, shopping to be done for the bands, electricians, backstage pass coordination, vendors and parking office red tape to cut through. All of these responsibilities and more have to be attended to, including setting up the stage, feeding the crews, arranging security and to top it all off, promoting the concert itself.

The number of things to be done seems endless at times. The strain becomes evident during UPC meetings as papers are shuffled around and facts and figures are thrown about.

Despite the many concerts that the organization provides the campus community with all year long, many people only hear of UPC at one time of the year, and this is it — Spring Concert week. It all has to run as if it were effortless, from setting up the stage to cleaning up afterwards, even though it is far from easy.

Year–long effort

"Everyone should be getting six credits for this concert alone," said Judy Gagnon, UPC's advisor from the Student Activities Office. "There isn't a big value by the administration and the faculty placed on the importance of what students learn doing all these things."

So much will be undertaken in the days following the meeting, up until the days after the concert, that it is astonishing when one remembers that all the participants are students with the same workloads as the rest of the campus community.

UPC's general committee and staff works from the beginning of the year (and even before the spring semester) to organize the concert that 10,000 students look forward to attending each year.

"We started looking at Blues Traveler over the winteression," said Stacey Peck, UPC's promotions director.

Once contact is made with various agencies and managers, the long and involved contract negotiations begin, where everything from what the artist will have to eat backstage to how much they will make for performing is decided upon.

While the bands are being confirmed, numerous other arrangements are being made: obtaining fencing, sound equipment and staging; arranging for security and medical personnel (including UMass and Amherst police as well as EMTs and Amherst Fire Department advisors), tickets, portable bathrooms and advertising all has to be taken into account. And all is not obtained cheaply.

"We'll have 20 UMass Police and we have to have three Amherst Police during traffic," Gagnon said. "We have to pay for the ambulance that's on site and we'll have a safety center in case people get hurt, so we have the Amherst Fire Department managing that."

$68,000 bill

According to this year's Spring Concert budget, it will cost UPC over $8,000 just for the police presence, on top of the cost of the bands and the staging.

"The stage is about $12,000 to rent," said Carolyn Pollich, UPC's production manager. "We put it up ourselves which is really remarkable. It would cost a lot more if we had someone else put it up."

With the budget cuts that the Student Government Association approved for UPC last week, the staff feels that Spring Concert is in serious jeopardy.

"We lost $23,000 last week, that's a lot of money," Pollich said. "If we can't even do what we're doing now with the money we have, there's a good chance we won't be putting on a Spring Concert next year."

Complaints that UPC gets about Spring Concert not having good bands are upsetting to the members, for they believe they do the best they can with funds available, and that people just don't realize how much it really costs for high caliber talent.

"We had Pearl Jam here in 1992 and we paid

Muses epitomize classic college pop style

changes, and Hersh's entry into motherhood would be enough to make any fan nervous about the future of the band.

Bandmate and stepsister Tanya Donelly's departure from the Muses in 1991 for a brief stint in The Breeders and then to form the ill-fated, combined with Hersh's own solo record last year might have been seen by many as the last nail in the Muses' coffin. The band has persevered, however, and returned this year with their eighth album, University, and a renewed interest from music fans.

Getting their start on the Boston club scene in the mid-'80s, the quartet's first two releases were a self-produced 7" and a cassette, which after the band caught the attention of the independent British label 4AD, would become most of their debut. Throwing Muses, released in 1986, made the band independent stars in England and began to spark interest in the underground community in America as an import, as they were the first American band to sign with the popular label.

It only took one more release, 1987's Chains Changed, before the band was approached by Sire Records and the same year saw the band's major label debut. The Fat Skier, a mini-LP of sorts, with seven songs.

The Throwing Muses sound was something that had been unheard in the music scene until they arrived. Jangly yet driving guitars, a strong backbeat and Hersh's unpredictably quirky lyrics, with a little bit of punk overdrive mixed in, was welcomed with open arms by college and alternative fans alike by the time the first full-length release on Sire, House Tornado, came out in 1989.

Original bassist Leslie Langston left the band in 1990, and after recruiting Fred Abong (who would later play bass on Belly's first album, Star) to replace her, the band released The Real Ramona, considered by many as one of their best works.

Red Heaven was the first effort by the Muses without Donelly, and then came a several year hiatus in which Hersh had her second child and released her solo effort, Hips and Makers.

University marks the band's return in its current incarnation as a trio with David Narcizo moving from drums to bass and longtime friend of the band Bernard Georges on drums.

The Throwing Muses will be third to take the stage at the Spring Concert this Sunday. Admission is free for UMass students with a valid ID and $15 for the public. The gates open at 11:30 a.m.

Rapper KRS–ONE will appear at this year's Spring Concert.

Innovative rap legend KRS–ONE hits Valley

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Rap has become a mainstay in American music with new artists dishing out their blend of words and beats to funky samples.

But rapper KRS–ONE, who is now legendary for the style he brought to rap, will prove why he is considered one of the genre's most influential figures when he takes the stage at this year's Spring Concert.

It was during the early '80s that KRS–ONE began to grow tired of the stereotypical rap lyrics based on gangs, drive–bys and guns. In 1984 he hit the music scene with a group called Scott La Rock and the Celebrity Three, consisting of Scott La Rock, Levi 167, MC Quality and KRS–ONE. They cut an album called Advance that involved such unstereotypical topics like nuclear disarmament.

In 1985 he cut another album with Scott La Rock and called it 12:41. The two musicians were paid nothing and given no rights to the album. It was this setback that made KRS–ONE realize the importance of having production as well as artistic control of future projects.

La Rock and KRS–ONE then began to concentrate their efforts on their own project, Boogie Down Productions (BDP). Their first effort as BDP, "Success is the Word," stayed on the charts for six months but got little air play.

Motivated by chart success, BDP went to Power Play Studio to record "Stop the Violence" and "Elementary," all funded with La Rock's money. They then began to issue their tape to various places in New York but still found little to no response to what they were setting out to do.

Spring Concert 1995

In the winter of 1985, the dynamic duo played their tape to influential DJ and producer Mr. Magic at Power Play Studios. Magic didn't connect with the style that BDP was aiming at and told them they had nothing to offer the genre.

Incensed, KRS–ONE went home and wrote "South Bronx," an answer to MC Shan's "Queensbridge," a song Mr. Magic

NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS

Ferron an inspiration to many folk stars

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

This Saturday night, Pearl Street nightclub will be the site of a rare performance from the acclaimed Canadian singer/songwriter Ferron.

Over the past 15 years, Ferron has impressed folk fans and fellow musicians alike with her beautiful voice and introspective songwriting.

She is considered by many (from the Indigo Girls and Shawn Colvin) to be one of the most gifted songwriters in folk music today.

Ferron mixes leftist politics with universal emotional appeal to create her distinctively personal music.

"I feel this responsibility to say something and have it be true for me," said Ferron in a recent press release.

The fit to me is finding that my work somehow resonates on a deep level with other people and they find that it is also true for them."

Growing up as the eldest of seven children, Ferron had an enormous workload and saw music initially as a way to impress her musician mother.

Although her widespread popular and critical attention makes it somewhat hard to believe, Ferron admits that when she began songwriting she did not even know the names of the chords she was playing — she just copied her mother's band placements on the guitar and used her ears for judgment.

In the late 1970s, Ferron began to play in front of people for the first time in the coffee houses of Vancouver.

Eventually, in 1980, she released her first album, Testimony, and subsequently hit the road on her first of seemingly countless national tours.

On her most recent tour, she opened for the Indigo Girls.

After releasing four more albums on her self–owned Cherrywood Station (one of which, Phantom Center, received a four–star rating from Rolling Stone), Ferron signed with Warner Brothers in 1994.

Her major label debut, Driver, finds Ferron performing the same brand of warm and revealing songs that have made her one of her generation's most heralded songwriters.

In regards to the success of Driver, Ferron is characteristically modest.

"After 20 years of trying to get it right, my sense of worth has been validated slightly. "In the next five years I hope to write two more albums and then I swear I'm going to get a real job," Ferron said.

Ferron will perform Saturday night at Pearl Street nightclub in Northampton. Tickets are $12.50 in advance, $15 at the door and are available at Tix Unlimited, For the Record and the Northampton Box Office. Showtime is 7 p.m. For more information, call 584–7771.

last year) Hoop Dreams, or the solidly acted, Oscar–nominated prison flick The Shawshank Redemption. I don't usually bother reviewing University stations, but I'm glad to report that for this week, there's something worthwhile for on–campus viewers to see.

Actually, HSCN might be a refreshing alternative to some of the silly network stuff that has been cranked out this sweeps month. A couple of these productions, including NBC's commercial montage "An All–Star Word From Our Sponsor" and ABC's comedy round–up "Who Makes You Laugh" were fun — since both supplied a lot of humorous old celebrity clips and some appropriately absurd commentary from Phil Hartman, Dana Carvey and Roseanne. Others, however, such as "CBS' "Where Are They Now?" about assorted has–beens and low–lifers, simply inspire a "Who Cares?" retort.

Probably the most strained, unfunny product of this sort was NBC's "An Affectionate Look at Fatherhood" — a series of poorly–written vignettes featuring a lot of second–rate TV actors, including former "Hogan Family" heartthrob Jason Bateman, comedian and former "AKA Pablo" star Paul Rodriguez, and that other guy from "Bosum Buddies," Peter Scolari. How Kelsey Grammer got stuck narrating this uncomfortable mix of slapstick and sentimentality, I can't imagine.

On PBS, Ric Burns' four–hour documentary "The Way West," shows there is a right way to tell the American tale of progress and tragedy that "500 Nations" and "Buffalo Girls" goofed up. The latter two productions were stagy, melodramatic depictions of the old West, but this film successfully weaves in old photographs, drawings, and concentrates on the common experiences of settlers who were achieving a newfound sense of national identity, while many Native Americans were becoming increasingly less secure in their own.

And finally, WBZ–TV Channel 4 will wrap up their "Letterman in London" contest tonight, announcing the lucky viewer who will see Dave when his "Late Show" travels to England later this month. They needed trickier trivia to keep the riff–raff from clogging the phone lines. They should have asked about those mechanical lizards. I would have won for sure.

Student artist uses mix of materials in artworks

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

When you walk into El Alcuña the first thing that hits you is the decor. From the southwestern music playing in the background to the murals of cowboys, coyotes and cactuses, it feels and looks like a whole other region — located in downtown Amherst.

Above the door is a smiling sun with sultry blue eyes. The place is festooned with Christmas lights that add to the intimate air of the restaurant.

The booths are actually church pews painted carefully with blue skies and glittering clouds. On the main beam of the ceiling light reflects off the multicolored beads hand–glued in a myriad of colors.

And the artist who gave the bar and restaurant this flavor of exciting intimacy is Sam Simon, a University of Massachusetts senior and fine arts major.

Simon was just one of the many artists, professional and student, who applied to El Alcuña for the choice job of turning its mundane walls into something memorable.

Sitting on one of the saddles (yes, they're real saddles) that surround a small table, Simon credited his love of art to his parents.

"Both my parents are very individual and inclined people and they instilled it in me," Simon said.

"My mom loves art and my dad is also a clothing designer and clothing store operator in Boston."

Both parents encouraged Simon throughout high school. He decided to attend UMass after receiving the UMass Chancellor's Talent Award for Fine Arts.

"At first I didn't know if I wanted to be an art major so by going to UMass I'd be able to check out different fields," Simon said.

In 1994, Simon went on an artist's residence program in La Napoule, France.

"I went to France on the summer residence program and loved it. Europe was the farthest east I'd ever been. It was in Monaco that I met the artist Ultra Violet (author of Famous Fifteen Minutes) and helped her with her show. It was great," Simon said.

Like most art students, Simon realized the more experience he got in the field the better. Past jobs have included internships in Walt Disney World and with MTV.

"At Disney World I went in for studio productions and ended up making hamburgers," said Simon laughing. "But I did learn about big entertainment corporations and it kind of took a little of the magic away and applied business to art."

Music and movies are two of the artist's loves and the internship at MTV enabled him to indulge in both. Although Simon would love to do full–length movies, he realizes that as an amateur, there wasn't much of a market for them as there was for videos.

"I was on a school trip to New York City and I brought with me some resumes.

"So I decided to drop one off at MTV and some galleries," Simon said.

"I brought it up to computer resources department and they called me back a few weeks later and offered me an internship at 'Beavis and Butthead.'"

Not expecting a call back for some time, Simon was surprised and told them that although he did like the show he was more interested in their promos. He was hired for both departments and spent an "expensive" summer in New York. Now he is looking forward to graduation.

"I love art. It's always been my best subject in school — it gives you so much freedom," Simon said. "I started when I was 13 and it's been my life ever since."

The senior is finishing up bachelor of fine arts degree at UMass and will premiere his film, Saul and Zelda, about his parents and their life, in Herter Hall May 18.

Shows will play at 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. and will include some short animations by other students.

Musical tribute in Noho to honor reggae legend Bob Marley

By Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Staff

Marking the 14th year since the death of Bob Marley, the Northampton Center for the Arts will be holding a "Legendary Tribute" to pay homage to this multifaceted Jamaican musician, who died on May 11, 1981.

Presented by D.A. Productions, the performance will include two local reggae acts, the Black Rebels and New Horizon, poetry readings, D.J. John and a guest speaker. Caribbean Cravings and Antonio's are sponsoring the event.

"This is an all around show," said Jeannot Dalomba of the Black Rebels. "[By] playing a symbolic concert for peace and unity in honor of a man with astounding breadth, all components come together as a whole.

"The legacy he bequeathed to us is central to the history of contemporary Jamaican music."

The tribute is to "pay respect" to Marley, said Dalomba. "He has been an inspiration to people that play reggae."

"The void he left has not been filled ... he brought international respect to the Jamaican music idiom

French Kiss fizzles despite its romantic themes

By Jon Lupo

FRENCH KISS
Directed by Lawrence Kasdan
with Meg Ryan, Kevin Kline
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

THE BASKETBALL DIARIES
Directed by Scott Kalvert with Leonardo DiCaprio, Lorraine Bracco
Playing at Academy of Music

It took me until the woefully happy ending of Meg Ryan's latest romantic comedy French Kiss to finally figure out why I just plain didn't buy any of it. Think about it: the almost noxiously likeable Ryan has had nearly a dozen of these "happy endings," with stars like Billy Crystal, Alec Baldwin, Tom Hanks (twice!), Dennis Quaid, Tim Robbins and Andy Garcia. So by the time she falls into the arms of Kevin Kline amid the Parisian countryside, it all seems a bit disingenuous — it's simply too hard to feel happy for her ... again.

None of this would matter much, of course, if French Kiss played more like an original romantic comedy and less like a clunky Ryan compilation film (she even gets to revisit her famous orgasm scene from When Harry Met Sally... only this time it's a different kind of bodily emission).

You've seen this movie before, and director Lawrence Kasdan (Grand Canyon) directs with little wit and not much style. This is as rudimentary as While You Were Sleeping, but at least there was some reason in that movie for the two leads to get together. Here, you get the feeling it's because Ryan and Kline both read the script.

And while they're both game, the movie isn't. Playing it safe at every turn with predictable situations and hollow conflicts, it's a waste of time and talent — not even Kline's Streep-worthy French accent can save this tepid Titanic.

Though it starts out with a funny sequence involving Ryan's fear of flying, the rest of French Kiss isn't nearly as inventive. This one crashes and burns without even getting off the ground. Skip it. C

A writer recently characterized Leonardo DiCaprio as "that boy with the beautiful name." This beauty, of course, is part of DiCaprio's tender allure, his radiant pull as an actor. It's on ample display in an otherwise dismal adaptation of Jim Carroll's superb 1978 autobiography — a book that deserves a better movie, even though it's fleshed out by a vibrant lead performance often superior to the film itself.

In theory, DiCaprio is the natural choice to slip into Carroll's well-worn street chucks. Too bad the rest of the film isn't nearly as good a fit. The Basketball Diaries' central conceit is that, while retaining itself as Carroll's screen biography, it doesn't mark the '60s and '70s era, preferring a sort of nether-period that smacks both of a low budget and misfired intentions.

While Carroll's book was distinctly unapologetic and unsentimental, offering a no holds barred tale of a hero-in junkie/punk/hustler who tells his alternately horrifying and intriguing tale with no strings attached, the movie distills this into a pretentious morality play — removing the hard edges and replacing them with neat corners.

For example, while Carroll was turned on by his public bathroom sexual escapades as a hustler, the film treats this as a one-time, desperate event that leaves DiCaprio shuddering in disgust. Furthermore, it castrates Carroll's harrowing heroine experiences into serving as a painfully pious "Just Say No" anti-drug message.

Finally, it unwisely elevates Carroll's arty poetry — a pastime not mentioned in the book — to the act of artistic savior. And even if you're not familiar with the tome, it's still pretty obvious that the film sells its soul for an "Afterschool Special"-like sheen, replacing Carroll's biting prose with a toothless grumble.

Throughout though, DiCaprio shimmers, outmaneuvering the film's overflow of angst with a quietly forceful turn. You can't take your eyes off him — he yanks you in, believing him completely even as you try to discover the seams of his performance.

Unfortunately, not even DiCaprio is enough to recommend sitting through a painfully compromised text better left in book form. While DiCaprio rates an A, the movie garners only a C-.

People and Pop Culture in the News

Brad Pitt, newly shorn but still scruffy, met Prince Charles in London during a special screening of Legends of the Fall — sorry ladies, he attended the film with his girlfriend (as in potential mate girlfriend) actress Gwyneth Paltrow.

Forget Grisham and Clancy. Boy George has his autobiography Take It Like A Man on the shelves ... um, too easy.

With all the creativity Madonna houses within her little finger you would think she'd name her new chihuahua something other than Chiquita. But hey, maybe it was a slow day or maybe she's taking another downward spiral and secretly penning the sequel to Sex.

Hey, here's something newsworthy — Regis Philbin just printed his very first computer message to friend Lou Holtz. Now that's exciting ... if you lived in a closet and subsisted solely on Spam.

Didn't get to see Drew Barrymore bare her breasts on Letterman? Then tune into the show on May 22 when she guest stars again to plug her new movie Mad Love. It's about a wild cocky girl with a drinking problem and involves a road trip with cool antics and Chris O'Donnell. Is it autobiographical? Aren't all her films? For once she should play a nun and stay totally clothed.

Also "camera shy" is George Clooney. "ER" pediatrician and the guy most women (of all ages) would like to jump. He is touring the countryside plugging Planet Hollywoods. All expenses are paid and all he has to do is smile! And if you're in Europe this summer you might bump into him and co-star Noah Wyle.

Harrison Ford and Julia Ormond can be seen biking around the Cape in their retro pedalpushers and polo shirts. The remake of Sabrina is being filmed there. Wow, first the Kennedys then the Clintons; the locals must be thrilled — or very fed up with tourists, flashing cameras and trampled lawns.

In light of the newest Brady revitalization, Maureen McCormick realized it was time to change and recorded When I Get a Little Lonely. Her album covers all the basics, love, sex and of course: the Wild West.

Following in the would-be songstress' platform shoes is David Hasselhoff, the man Americans tolerate and Germans just can't get enough of. He has decided to wreck whatever reputation he got from "Baywatch" to put out his first self-titled album in the United States. Oh, goody.

Material for this section has been compiled from various news and wire services by Tara MK Connelly.

Editors' Cuts

Television — E!

In the Pioneer Valley residents really get a capital cable service. But the one thing the service is lacking is E! Entertainment Television. Now there is a channel. For an arts & living buff, E! is the entertainment source. There is fashion television, movie previews (for months ahead of time with synopsis and full-length trailers) and "Soap Dish" (missed a day on "General Hospital" — not a problem).

A week wrapup, society events, behind the scenes looks at "E! Featured Movies" with indepth interviews and usually hosted by a person in the movie, and of course "Talk Soup," the show that launched Greg Kinnear into the limelight. Forget Sabrina and those Eagle spokesperson spots, this is the place where Kinnear could be himself and people loved it. They even had a behind the scenes look at "ER" that showed you everything all those other magazines just couldn't do.

—Tara MK Connelly

Album — Versus

A new release by the New York band Versus is always a cause for celebration. The group has been blowing away critics and fans alike with their brand of arty punk/pop since their incarnation a few years ago, but only has a small number of songs under their belt.

Although the band has only released one full-length album, last year's The Stars Are Insane, they have recorded a handful of 7" singles on various labels. Recently the band's label, Teenbeat Records, has put out a compilation entitled Dead Leaves that collects all of the group's singles and four previously unreleased tracks, in one nice convenient package.

Ranging from the upbeat power pop of the band's Pop Narcotic single, "Bright Lights/Forest Fire," to the their more subdued K Records release "Frog/Go Tell It On The Mountain," Dead Leaves is sure to be a pleasure for longtime fans as well as those without a turntable.

— Matt Audette

Book — Bathroom Book

Put away those dog-eared copies of TV Guide and Reader's Digest that have been sitting on the bathroom floor for what seems to be an eternity — The Great American Bathroom Book II has arrived!

Instead of reading about what's on the tube this Friday night, now you can enjoy everything from Shakespeare to The Old and New Testaments to Jurrasic Park, right at your fingertips in the privacy of your own bathroom. The Great American Bathroom Book II, despite its unfortunate title, is actually a lot more interesting, and practical, than it seems. The book collects hundreds of "Single-Sitting Summaries" (nudge, nudge) of some of the literary world's finest achievements, giving a commentary followed by a brief plot summary of each story — sort of an encyclopedia of Cliff Notes.

Although the reason why this book is geared to the "toilet" crowd is unknown, it still makes a good read.

say yes."

Although things seem to be on an upswing for the band, success is something Blues Traveler has had to work for. The journey to stardom has not gone without the sweat and hard work of relentless touring. Starting out under the simple, but appropriate, moniker "Blues Band," the group began earning a reputation as a lethal live act, thanks to the kinetic harmonica playing of frontman John Popper.

The band released its debut album in 1989 and quickly began drawing a larger fan base to its "without boundaries" sound. By the time the group released its sophomore effort, Travelers and Thieves, its name had become synonymous with the legions of roots-orientated groups that were emerging. Save His Soul, the band's third release, marked a turning point in the band's career, adding a more experimental and studio-driven side to the usually raw sound. Save His Soul sort of worked as a bridge to four which finds the group heading in new directions.

At home on the stage

Although the band has discovered a wider fan base due the popularity of both the latest single and album, their roots still lie on the road, doing what they do best. According to Sheehan, playing live is still where the group belongs.

"I think we started playing live because it's all we knew how to do," he said.

The band still lives by this philosophy, putting in thousands of miles touring the country and headlining the now famous H.O.R.D.E. tour (which the band also helped create) for the last three years.

"[H.O.R.D.E.] started out as Blues Traveler, Phish and Widespread Panic. We were all friends ... we were all big enough that if we got together we could tour playing bigger sheds," Sheehan said.

The concept worked and now H.O.R.D.E. has become one of the most anticipated tours of the summer months. According to Sheehan, the band plans to do the tour again, this time around with the possibility of including the likes of The Black Crowes, Ziggy Marley and The Dave Matthews Band.

Thanks to the success of "Run-around" and four, Blues Traveler will bring a new-found popularity with them when they take the stage at this year's Spring Concert. With this momentum behind them, expect plenty of jams as well as the unexpected.

"Our shows have peaks and valleys, but if you let yourself go you can have a good time," Sheehan said. "The more the crowd reacts — the harder we do it."

■ Knuckle Sandwich

not," Smith said. "That scene is really open to new ideas and wacky stuff, though. I guess we sort of just squeezed in."

Last summer, Knuckle Sandwich released their first six- song demo, entitled Vito Mack, which captures some (though certainly not all) of the band's live energy. Songs like "44" and the crowd-favorite "K-Mart Shoppers" showcase the band at the height of their funk talents, while "Northampton St." and "Basement Song" show the band can also play punchy, straightforward rock with the best of them.

The selection of Vito Mack's title is a reflection of Knuckle Sandwich's incredulous sense of humor and their ability to make the best of a bad situation.

"We were supposed to play this real dingy metal club in Springfield. We were feeling kind of down about it when we went to get something to eat at the Friendly's nextdoor before the show. There was this plaque on the wall which said that the manager's name was Vito Mack, and we were like, 'What a zany name! We've got to call the tape that!'"

Since then, the band's popularity has steadily increased, giving them the opportunity to play to audiences as far away as Boston and Connecticut.

"I think we realized that we weren't just goofing around when people other than our friends started to listen to us," Smith said.

Battle of the Bands victory

A good indication of their now widespread popularity was their decisive victory at last month's Battle of the Bands competition in the Student Union Ballroom.

"The fact that we handed out Smarties to the crowd really sealed our victory," joked Smith.

Now, thanks to the win at the Battle of the Bands, Knuckle Sandwich will finally have the opportunity to play the campus' biggest event — the Spring Concert, which is something they've been waiting a long time for.

"Ever since we got out of the coffee houses, it's sort of been a goal for us," Smith said. "We thought we were ready last year but there was not Battle of the Bands; UPC just picked Synaesthesia."

This year's Spring Concert will mark another step in the evolution of the Knuckle Sandwich's sound, with the debut of "Brass Knuckles," the band's budding horn section of Eric Collins and Kevin Thompson.

"It's a real charge of life to the band," Smith said. "The horns completely renew and rejuvenate the songs."

"Brass Knuckles" may also come with Knuckle Sandwich when the band goes into the studio this summer to record their first 7". Smith said he hopes the new record, which should be released in the fall, will "spread the Knuckle Sandwich gospel beyond the Valley."

was supporting on his radio show. "South Bronx" was released in 1986 on B. Boy Records and three months later became the hottest song in the country. The recording artists and the label remained unknown.

In 1987, the duo's "The Bridge Is Over" beat Mr. Magic's two albums but Boogie Down Production still wasn't respected in the music industry. Striving for greatness, the two recorded the classical hip-hop album Criminal Minded. They saw it as a chance to change the face of rap from sexy, crazy and fun to more serious and hard-core. The country loved it and a new style of rap was born.

At the end of 1987 tragedy hit when La Rock was killed. The hip-hop community was shocked and a new word became associated with rap: violence. Trying to change his image once again KRS-ONE moved to five records and recorded his most successful album, By All Means Necessary, which re- established his presence in the rap world.

In 1989, KRS-ONE took to lecturing at various colleges about his experiences in music business and discussing what he felt rap had become. Many people criticized his sudden change in image and, at the same time, others blamed him for starting "gangsta rap." Many also argued that his messages were too preachy.

Nevertheless, fans still argued the musical merit of his works and, in 1990, he released Edutainment. The album received only lukewarm response so in 1991 he recorded BDP Live Hardcore, one of the first live hip-hop albums.

The public still wasn't responsive and KRS-ONE began to feel disheartened. In 1992 he recorded Sex and Violence, which catered to the more negative side of rap. But with the album came the dilemma of KRS-ONE keeping his own style of music or catering to the very ideas that he had fought against. With his recent Return of the Boom Bap, KRS-ONE returned to his roots, rejecting the violence and negative connotations hip-hop and rap have taken. It is refreshing to hear a rap album free of negativity and full of the stuff that made hip-hop great and KRS-ONE a star.

and in the process, made himself the country's number one folk hero, perhaps of all time," Dalomba said.

"In death, he has grown in stature, and new generations who didn't catch his fire the first time around, have tuned into his music and message," Dalomba said.

Black Rebels, "blending sound and rhythm that is captivating, spirited and original," will perform a set composed of their own material, including a song "especially written for this show," Dalomba said.

New Horizon will cover a variety of Marley material, "offering a expansive collection of classic reggae," Dalomba said.

The Northampton Center for the Arts, created in 1984, offers area artists "a very low-cost" facility for both visual and performance arts, said Mark Dean, the center's technical director.

The tribute concert is scheduled to begin tomorrow night at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are available at Caribbean Cravings in Amherst; for more information contact the Box Office at 586-7282.

$4,500 for them," Pollich said. "Now they're over $100,000."

"People say they want the Beastie Boys," Peck said. "But they cost $80,000. If we wanted to fill a lineup with acts that would extremely impress everybody, we would have to spend over $15,000 per act. If we want three national bands on the bill you're looking at $45,000 at least."

This year's concert will run UPC around $68,000, with the headlining act, Blues Traveler, eating up almost one-third of that amount.

Ticket sales lagging

By the time the talent does arrive on Sunday morning, not even half the work is done. The stage has been set up in the 36 hours or so since the parts will have arrived on Friday at noon. In addition, staff is needed to sleep on location to insure the safety of the stage and equipment each night it is on the campus lawn.

Vendors, access passes, food, drivers and safety personnel all have to be coordinated before the gates can be opened and once they do, then security, stage and hospitality crews will be hard at work all day making sure the show runs seamlessly.

Even though this year's ticket sales are behind expected projections, the concert attracts a large number of UMass students on top of the 3,000 public tickets UPC will make available.

"I think the day of the show sales will go pretty well," said Todd Wahlstrom, UPC's business manager. "In past years we have definitely sold more pre-show tickets but with most events, and especially with Spring Concert, we get a lot of walk-ups."

When the bands have all stopped playing and the crowd has found its way home, the job is still not close to completion. The various crews have a long period of cleanup ahead of them.

Striking the stage, cleaning up the trash, driving the bands out of town to their various hotels and shipping out all the heavy equipment are still left to be done. From start to finish, it's a UPC operation the entire way.

"We do everything ourselves because [the University] charges us for everything," Pollich said.

Think about it all this Sunday while thousands of people are getting drunk and playing in the mud.

Boston rock scene. The band took the Best New Artist award in the 1994 WFNX/Phoenix Poll Awards. At the Boston Music Awards they were named 1994's Best New Band, and Boston Magazine called them the Best Modern Rock Band of 1994.

The band has enjoyed a European distribution deal a song on the charts in Scotland. Although there has been talk of major labels, for now Machinery Hall is staying put on the small Boston–based record label Permagrin Records, which has released the band's self-titled debut CD.

Team to fight pollution to be organized

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Due to new state environmental laws, a campus pollution prevention team is to be organized at the University of Massachusetts. Marc Fournier will head the team as clean state coordinator for the University.

Fournier will work with the University Clean State Team which will address pollution prevention issues at the University, Fournier said.

"My focus will be initially to reorganize the team to have representatives from all relevant areas on campus to look at the issues covered by the Clean State Executive Order 350," Fournier said.

As coordinator, Fournier will file quarterly compliance updates with both visual and performance arts, said Mark Dean, the center's technical director.

The appointment is due to Massachusetts Clean State Executive Order 350. The responsibility of coordinator was given to Fournier due to his position as waste manager for UMass, said William Rose, vice chancellor of facilities and campus services.

Although the order requires more responsibilities for state agencies, no further funding is allotted for these responsibilities, Rose said.

The purpose of the order is to bring all state agencies in compliance with all environmental laws and regulations that apply to private industries in Massachusetts, said Hugh Pilgram, the Clean State Coordinator for the Office of Technical Assistance for Toxic Use Reduction located in Boston.

The order requires all state agencies in Massachusetts to develop pollution prevention and resource conservation plans while promoting efforts to decrease pollution and to conserve natural resources, Pilgram said.

The team will be made up of eight to 10 people from different pollution prevention programs already existing on campus. The first meeting has not yet been scheduled, Fournier said.

"The University has some pollution prevention programs already," he said. "I don't think it will change anything."

The work required by order 350 is already being done here at UMass. The only extra work required is the quarterly report that must be filed to Clean State, said Pat Daly, acting director of the Physical Plant.

"Will it [add more work] in the future? I don't know yet," Daly said. "It's still developing."

Quirós a written warning last semester for conducting a religious demonstration on the Student Union steps, where he set on fire stuffed dummies representing former U.S. political leaders.

Various local media organizations covered the event, including the Collegian, and in some of the articles Chacón Quirós was identified as a Collegian editor.

Chacón Quirós was asking that the letter be removed from his employment file, but Hosley held that Chacón Quirós' had staged a news event after she had forewarned him not to.

Chacón Quirós cited examples of political demonstrations that Collegian members had staged in past years and noted that punitive measures had not been consistently applied.

Although the judiciary dismissed the case, they are recommending a review of Collegian policies and its constitution to look for inconsistencies, like the one brought forward by Chacón Quirós. They will also look to find any inconsistencies Collegian policies may have with SGA rules for all RSOs.

"In general, I think that for the first time the SGA has been willing to accept their power to oversee the treatment of minorities in an RSO," Chacón Quirós said, "and that's why I think it's a positive thing from the past."

■ Victims don't know how to get help

Kanaan said the case was dropped so he quit his job as an RA and was forced to take out loans to continue his career at UMass.

"My case is against [Assistant Dean of Students] Paul Vasconcellos ... he switched everything from religion to politics," Kanaan said. "He said because it was political it was okay."

Kanaan said he filed with Affirmative Action against Vasconcellos, but he had trouble figuring out where to go with his complaint.

"Nobody tells you anything — you don't know where to go," Kanaan said. "I feel no support from the University."

Vasconcellos could not be reached yesterday for comment.

The civil rights process

Alan Weinfeld, former president of the Hillel Foundation, blamed much of the student confusion and disillusionment on the lack of proper information available concerning civil rights issues, as well as inherent inefficiency and lack of guidance within the system.

"It is the institution's responsibility to help students and be there to support and guide them," Weinfeld said. "As it is, many of these incidents are simply brushed under the rug."

Students do not know where to go when they are confronted with problems concerning civil rights, such as the Dean of Students Office or the Ombuds Office, he said.

"They both need to get out there and tell students about what they can do for them," Weinfeld said. "But even so, they are very slow, not very user friendly or as responsive to the needs of students as they should be."

The Ombuds Office is a service which many students do not know about. The office can provide advice, referrals to appropriate offices and informal investigation of situations involving discrimination, with the option of the victim's identity remaining anonymous.

"Many students don't want to go through the formal process, because it is stressful and time consuming," said Mary E. Wardwell, assistant ombudsperson.

Dean of Students JoAnne Vanin agreed that many students do not know where to go when faced with situations involving violations of their rights, but believed the facilities in place are adequate to handle them.

"We have not done a good enough job getting information in either hands of students or even the people who the students may to turn to for help," Vanin said.

"I don't think people in general know where to call," she said. "However, we are the place that undergrads should go whenever they feel they are being harassed or offended by another student, because often people quickly put a label on an event which may not be the right label."

Matters involving student against student are referred through the Dean of Students office. Then it is taken through a judicial process, where both parties make a written statement, a set of charges are issued and the responding student must go through the University judicial system to answer to the charges, Vanin said.

The Affirmative Action office handles the issues involving students against an employee of the University, Vanin said. Affirmative Action will investigate the situation and recommend action to the supervisors or the unions.

Employee incidents

Late in February, Dave Mitchell, president of AFSCME Local 1776, the union that represents the blue collar and service workers on campus, said there was an increase in reports of discrimination.

"It's kind of a double-edged sword because we have to applaud the University for promoting diversity, but that's what they put on as a public face," Mitchell said.

"When you get down to the work place, a lot of times we find there is not a good response from the managers about members who are discriminated against."

Mitchell said it's not epidemic, but there is a rise in complaints of discrimination and "it seems to be mostly between employee and employer."

He said one answer to the problem would be if the University educated its employees about diversity.

"I think the University is capable of doing much better," Mitchell said. "People shouldn't just be fired, you should try to work with people and educate them, it is an educational institution.

"When our members feel discriminated against, we think the University has to act with greater haste and not shuffle people around."

In a letter, the union stated that the University "assigns our members of color to the lowest paid job titles ... A significant number of our members are African-American, Latino or Asian American — many are regularly subject to racist practices."

Paul J. Page, vice chancellor for administration and finance, has denied that the University intentionally assigns minorities to lower paying jobs.

"The University doesn't assign people to jobs — it hires people who apply for vacancies," Page said.

On-campus tensions

Still trickling over from the fall semester was the series of allegedly anti–Semitic speakers invited to campus.

Wellesley College Professor Tony Martin, who spoke early last December, was the most recent of the speakers, following Nation of Islam Minister Louis Farrakhan from the spring of 1994.

This series has led to the much documented tensions between the black and Jewish communities at UMass.

In response, a meeting was held March 3 between several Jewish groups from around the state and UMass President Michael K. Hooker and Scott to discuss creating a better environment at the flagship campus.

The meeting was called to bring attention to the administration of an atmosphere that seemed to be uncomfortable for Jewish students and faculty, according to Joel Weiss, a member of the Jewish Federation of Greater Springfield.

"Overall, our objective is designed to work with people to make UMass a place where everyone feels comfortable," Weiss said in an interview earlier this semester.

Sally Greenberg of the Boston office of the Anti– Defamation League, who was also at the meeting, said they discussed Jewish students' impressions of the University.

"Jewish students have expressed there was a sense of hostility towards them," Greenberg said. "We talked about what could be done about it."

According to Greenberg, they do not support censorship, but do hold the University responsible to take a position against inflammatory speakers invited to campus.

"A person who has a history of overt bigotry, anti– Semitism, homophobia or racism documented in speeches and writings, in our view, requires leadership of the University to condemn it," Greenberg said.

They said they were not asking Hooker or Scott to take a position at the time, but they were concerned with the pattern of speakers coming to campus that make Jewish students and faculty uncomfortable, Weiss said.

"They didn't agree to take a stand," said Greenberg. "It was more of a chance to express ourselves — to express our views and frustrations of Tony Martin and others who have come to campus in the past years."

Diversity on campus

Afro–American professor David DuBois said the question is not between black, Jewish tensions, but between whites and blacks.

"The question of diversity on campus is of an urgent importance. I don't think this campus or much of the nation has recognized how serious it is," DuBois said. "It seems we will have to suffer more between black and white relations before we come to grips with the problem of denial about how whites really feel about black people and how blacks really feel about whites ... it's a question of honesty."

Shamapande had the same view as DuBois, saying the problems are not specifically between the Jewish and black communities on-campus.

"Black students on this campus have nothing against Jewish students at all," Shamapande said. "There is a lot of talk about 'tension' on campus.

"I don't think we should start to believe tension is necessarily bad — it is inevitable on a college campus ... The goal is not to get rid of the tensions, but for the institution of higher learning to deal with the tensions in an educational way."

Scott said the University did have a tendency to handle the crises as they occur, but the administration is trying to deal with the issues before they arise.

According to Scott, events like Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel visiting the campus and open forums like last Thursday's "Moving Toward a Diverse Workplace," in which panelists offered their insight on the changing face of the job market, were designed for that purpose.

"I was astounded at the kind of response from the students, saying they would like to see more of that," Scott said. "From time to time we are going to have setbacks and individual instances, we have to have the courage to rise above it — I think that's what we have been trying to do. We must combat these issues through education."

For all the University's ability to handle situations within the institutional system, Dr. Esther Terry of the Afro– American department believes the solution lies not in static rules and processes, but in a deeper understanding of what the University truly represents.

"We should not always be asking what the University is doing for us, but what do we bring to the University that needs to be shared? We should have the belief that we have a community," Terry said.

"When you talk of institutions, those are cold things. When you talk of community, you must ask for responsibility," Terry said. "And we shouldn't just want institutional responsibility, we should ask for community responsibility. And if we don't have a community, then we should go about the business of making one."

Collegian staff members Chris Conner and Jessica Taverna contributed to this article.

get bigger as the season rolls on.

"We accomplished something, but it just brings us one step closer to our goal. In the last two to three weeks, we've been going back to the basics," Sortino said.

Down the stretch, Massachusetts has been fortunate to stay put. That is, from their final game of the season against Boston College on May 2 to this weekend's Diamond Classic, all of the Minutewomen's games have and will be played at Totman Field.

"We were very fortunate to have the A–10s here at UMass, and not having to go out on the road. Normally, we would have been coming back from Philadelphia at 1 a.m. This was the first year in a long time that we didn't have to drive home from there. It's great to be at home," Sortino said.

Minutewomen notes: Massachusetts was invited to play in the 1996 Leadoff Classic by the National Softball Coaches Association (NSCA). The tournament will take place in March in Atlanta, Ga.

BOB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

Tracey Osier will try to add to her UMass single season record for stolen bases starting today against Canisius in the NCAA play–in series at Totman Field.

Dana Barros named most improved

NEW YORK (AP) — Dana Barros, who led the Philadelphia 76ers in six offensive categorits, won the NBA's Most Improved Player award on Wednesday.

Barros averaged career highs in points (20.3), assists (7.5), rebounds (2.4) and steals (1.82) per game. He shot a team-record .464 from 3-point range and set an NBA mark by making at least one 3-pointer in his last 58 games.

The 5-foot-11 guard received 50 of a possible 105 votes from a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters. Phoenix's Elliot Perry finished second with 15 votes, while Charlotte's Scott Barrell and Washington's Gheorge Muresan tied for third with eight votes apiece.

Barros was the only player to finish in the top 20 in five categories. He was third in 3-point field goal percentage, third in free-throw percentage, 10th in steals, 11th in assists and 17th in scoring.

He scored a career-high 50 points against Houston on March 14, becoming only the third player under 6-feet in NBA history to score 50 or more points in a game. The others were Calvin Murphy and Michael Adams.

High school hitting streak ends at 51

WILMINGTON, N.C. (AP) — Shawn Gallagher wanted to break the national high school record for hitting streaks. Wilmington Laney High School wanted to win the game.

Wilmington Laney came out on top, as ace pitcher Adam Gilmore intentionally walked Gallagher in his last trip to the plate Tuesday night, bringing Gallagher's record-tying hitting streak to an end after 51 games.

Gallagher, a senior first baseman for Wilmington New Hanover High School, had flied out, popped out and walked before his last at-bat in the eighth inning. Gilmore, a junior right-hander, said before the game that he would challenge Gallagher instead of issuing intentional walks to halt the streak. But when it came down to the eighth inning, the Laney team decided go ahead and intentionally walk Gallagher to set up a force play in the extra frame.

Laney High, whose most famous graduate is Michael Jordan, won 3-2 in nine innings.

"It's the biggest win in my life," said Gilmore, who improved his record to 10-1, with the only loss being a shutout by New Hanover earlier in the season. "We beat the No. 1 team in the nation and we're not even ranked in the state. It was something I've always dreamed of and now it's come true."

Coming into the game, Gallagher had hit safely in 51 games, tying the mark set by Stan Brown of Noblesville, Ind. Gallagher, obviously dejected the streak came to end, still agreed with Laney coach Trent Mongero's strategy.

"I always had to have it in the back of my mind that something like this could happen," Gallagher said.

Gallagher flied out to short left field in his first at-bat and popped up to second in his second appearance. He walked and was thrown out on the front end of a double play after his third trip to the plate.

His fourth time up, he never got into the batter's box. Mongero, much to the dismay of a sellout crowd, called for an intentional walk with a runner in scoring position.

"Coming into the ballgame, we we're going to give Gallagher at least two, three, maybe four times depending on the circumstances," Mongero said. "I just think this win for Laney was more important than him getting that last at-bat. I don't doubt myself at all.

"I feel for Shawn but we're playing baseball to win this conference," Mongero said. "And right now we're tied for first. I'm sorry, it just worked out that way."

Gallagher didn't break the hitting streak, but he can take solace in some of his other records. Aside from tying the consecutive-game hitting streak, he also shares the national record for home runs in a single game at five. He did that last month, homering in each of his five at-bats against conference foe Southern Wayne. He also has six state records.

Julius Erving chats with Weld; hoop team visits Boston

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — State legislators got to meet the University of Massachusetts basketball team yesterday, but Gov. William F. Weld one-upped them: He chatted with Julius Erving, the school's most famous basketball product.

Dr. J., in town on personal business, bumped into the governor as Weld arrived at the Park Plaza Hotel and Towers for a prayer breakfast. The former Philadelphia 76ers star immediately launched into a discussion about basketball and his alma mater's success.

Erving, who played for the Minutemen in the early 1970s, retains the school's highest scoring average, 26.3 points per game. "I'm pretty proud of UMass," said Erving, now a businessman and commentator for NBC Sports. "If they had had Michael Williams and (Edgar) Padilla, they would have done pretty well."

Williams, a guard, was suspended from the team toward the end of the season while Padilla, also a guard, hurt his ankle in the NCAA tournament.

Weld, apparently caught off guard by Erving's level of detail, said he had confidence the Minutemen would go farther in the tournament next year. This year they lost in the fourth round to Oklahoma State University.

"Coach Cal is in full control," Weld told Erving, referring to coach John Calipari. Later in the day, Calipari brought the current squad to the Statehouse to be honored by the Legislature. The House of Representatives gave the team a standing ovation.

"They're a credit to their university. They're a credit to Massachusetts. They're a credit to themselves," said House Speaker Charles Flaherty, D–Cambridge.

Tyson ranked on top after three years away

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

The news hit the heavyweights like a thunderbolt. After three years in prison and with no fights since June, 1991, Mike Tyson is ranked No. 1 by the WBC, one step away from champion Oliver McCall.

"It just shows how much politics and racketeering play a big part in boxing," said Lennox Lewis, who lost the WBC title to McCall.

"Is he No. 1?" ex-champ Evander Holyfield said, sounding surprised at the news. "Really?"

Really.

"Really, it's not right because you're looking at a situation of politics," Holyfield said. "He hasn't been in boxing in three years. He should have to fight somebody in the top 10 to get ranked. It's sad."

Michael Moorer, who beat Holyfield for the WBA and IBF heavyweight titles and then lost them to George Foreman, wasn't very impressed with Tyson's lofty fight-free ranking.

"Tyson was a force to be reckoned with four years ago," he said. "This is four years later."

Lewis and Moorer launch comebacks with fights on a doubleheader card at the ARCO Arena in Sacramento, Calif. on Saturday. Lewis faces Lionel Butler in a 12-round bout and Moorer is set for a 10-rounder against Melvin Foster.

A week later, Holyfield makes his return at the Atlantic City Convention Center in a 10-rounder against Ray Mercer. Hector Camacho defends his IBC welterweight title against Homer Gibbins on the same card.

All three heavyweights, losers in their last fights, are taking tentative first steps back. The wild card for each of them is Tyson, the golden goose of the division, who was released from prison six weeks ago after serving three years on a rape conviction and became No. 1 shortly after that.

"Tyson is yet to step into the ring," Lewis said. "Before he was incarcerated, his boxing talent was going down. I'm not thinking of Tyson. He's a man to look at in the future."

The ranking, Lewis said, is because the WBC wants to cash in on Tyson's celebrity. "It means the WBC is pushing his name out there," he said. "He's got to prove himself in the ring, to the public and to himself."

Lewis, who is ranked No. 2 by the WBC, said he wasn't frustrated by Tyson's instant No. 1 ranking. "I realize the different things that make it up," he said. "My concern is to keep a positive head and stay focused."

That focus for now is on Butler. After that, according to manager Frank Maloney, the WBC governors had committed to giving Lewis another shot at McCall. "He'll fight for the title before Tyson," Maloney said.

And what if he has to wait for that chance? "Then the WBC and Jose Sulaiman will look bad in all the world bodies," he said. "And the longer I wait, the more I'll improve."

Is Moorer interested in Tyson?

"I'm not invincible," he said. "I'm a man. I don't back down from anybody."

And Holyfield?

"I came back to win the title," he said. "Tyson? That would be a big fight, as long as it's before '97. "Tyson? Yeah, that's fine."

Battering PSA a 'coincidence'

ATLANTA (AP) — Atlanta Braves fans tuning into the opening game of the team's series at New York saw a public service announcement on battered women, two nights after manager Bobby Cox was charged with hitting his wife.

"Completely a coincidence," said Robin Yates, spokeswoman for WTBS. Both the Braves and the station are owned by Turner Broadcasting System Inc. Just before Tuesday night's game, Cox again denied police reports that he hit his wife, Pamela.

The 30-second spot, from the Council on Battered Women in Atlanta, aired at the beginning of the game with the Mets. It emphasizes that domestic violence is wrong and that battering is a crime, citing famous women who have said they were abused by spouses or boyfriends — singer Tina Turner, comedienne Brett Butler, actress Robin Givens and the late Nicole Brown Simpson.

Barbara Sachs, executive director of the Council on Battered Women, wasn't aware that the spot had run during the Braves game. She said tapes of the announcement had been sent to local stations long before the Cox arrest, to be run the free of charge on the stations' own schedule.

"It showed that the station was generally concerned about the issue of domestic violence," she said.

Sachs said there has been "a significant increase" in the number of calls to the council's crisis line this week. Highly publicized cases often spur women to seek help, she said.

"Women in abusive situations realize they're not the only ones. They realize they need to do something about it."

Pamela Cox saidshe had used "a poor choice of words" when she told a Cobb County police dispatcher that her husband had hit her. She said Cox didn't hit her, but "grabbed me by the hair."

A police report said Pamela Cox told officers her husband had punched her in the face and pulled her hair after some guests left their house Sunday night.

"I'm not a wife abuser. I don't strike women," Cox told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. "It's not what you think."

strike that kept the professional baseball players off the field, young men like Pileski had more choices to make — if the offer was there, do you become a replacement player?

"With LaRocca, it was a tough choice, but it really wasn't. The people who were willing to cross the line were borderline-type players — they may never get a shot to play in the big leagues, and this was their chance," Pileski said. "Greg doesn't really have to worry about that. This wasn't his only chance [to get to the majors] and he didn't cross.

"With me, it would be a gut–check. You're talking about a chance to reach your goal, it's sitting right in front of you, but is that how you want to reach it? Do you want to be remembered as a so–called scab? Personally, I don't think I would do it."

A second chance

Massachusetts heads into this weekend's Atlantic 10 Conference tournament as the No. 1 seed and favorite for the second year in a row. The Minutemen take on No. 4 Rutgers (4:05 p.m. Friday, Boyertown, Pa.) in their first of what Pileski said he hopes is a long ride toward an NCAA playoff berth.

"We were riding such a high heading into the tournament, and it was so shocking when we lost, it was almost a bad dream," Pileski said. "We thought it would be tough to duplicate last season because we lost a lot. Other guys have come in and done a great job."

What players are the ones to watch on the Minuteman squad, according to Pileski?

"What can you say about Bill Knight [Massachusetts' all– time HR and RBI leader]? Nelson Ubaldo has been on fire all–season long. Jay Murphy has carried us. Ryan Jette has done a great job ..."

Ask the big league scouts who they're in Amherst to see and they'll tell you the same as always — the Massachusetts shortstop.

The Minutemen played Harvard in Cambridge yesterday; results were not available as of press time.

■ major league

Very impressive for a man who has been in the league for 14 seasons. Raines can still "Rock" the basepath.

• Bobby Cox, manager of the Atlanta Braves, was arrested last week for battering his wife. Meanwhile, the Braves were unable to produce any offense in losing four straight to the Philadelphia Phillies. Oh, battery, you mean pitcher and catcher? That too was a disgrace with former Cy Young award winners Tom Glavine and Mike Maddux getting knocked around in their respective starts. The Braves need to distinguish the difference between on and off the field.

• Dodger pitcher Hideo Nomo is the first Japanese Major leaguer since 1965. He brings his Luis Tiant style delivery, where he turns his back to the catcher before delivering, to Los Angeles. In his debut, the newest Dodger struck out seven batters in six innings thanks to his devastating fastball. That can only mean good things for the Dodgers, where in a rotation with Ramon Martinez, Los Angeles will have Nomo ... bad pitching.

• The Boston Red Sox stand in first place.

Out of Mo Vaughn's last seven hits, he has five homeruns. So in doing a little genius caliber math, if Mo hits 50 dingers this season he will only have about 70 hits.

Lee Tinsley has a 12–game hitting streak going, not to mention being in the top four in batting average thus far. And certain critics thought he was the weak spot in the Sox line–up. I don't think so.

One more thing before I bid adieu. To all you Jose Canseco bashers, he is playing at only 70 percent health, so watch what you say, he'll be back!

Mike Brown is a Collegian staff member.

■ Kellogg

day ($420). Kellogg is one of six rookies currently on the roster.

Other notables include former University of Connecticut players Brian Fair and Nantambu Willingham, and former Rhode Island Ram Carlos Cofield, among others.

The Skyhawks are pleased in getting Kellogg.

"Derek has been a great surprise to us. When he came down, we didn't know what to expect. He can shoot, he runs the court well, plays good defense. We're very glad to have Derek," Lenehan said.

"He's fantastic," Grove said. "Derek has really come into his own. If he continues to improve and open up his game, he'll be invited to an NBA camp. He really has gotten used to the pro style. He might just be our starting point guard this Sunday."

On May 14, the Skyhawks will open their season at the Johnathan Law High School in Milford as they host New Jersey. The Skyhawks, the only professional basketball team in Connecticut, will play a 26–game season that lasts through July.

Grove noted that the USBL is a step to the next level and said the league was established for one particular reason.

"The purpose of this league is to showcase talent that is not picked in the first or second rounds of the NBA draft," Grove said. According to the first–year Skyhawk coach, many USBL players are currently in the NBA. "Scouts come looking for talented players to go to camp," Grove added.

Grove said he likes Calipari's Massachusetts basketball program.

"Anybody from UMass' program, we'd love to have play for the Skyhawks. You got a guy named Camby we'd like to have as well," Grove joked about future NBAer Marcus Camby. "Anybody who plays for John can play for us."

Kellogg was Calipari's starting point guard for the past three seasons. During the 1994–95 season, Kellogg came into his own, averaging 8.2 ppg while dishing out 128 assists. He earned Third Team All–Atlantic 10 honors, while garnering his third consecutive All A–10 Academic Team.

As for Kellogg, Grove sees what Massachusetts fans witnessed in his solid four–year career — leadership in his role as floor general.

"I think Derek's a big–time leader. He's not afraid to take the shot, he plays great defense," Grove said. "He'll be in an NBA camp."

■ Valente

"Without them, I wouldn't have been here," Valente said. "Four years ago, when it came time to fill out my college applications, I didn't care. I was fine with Hicksville. But once I got out, it opened up my mind. Thank God, my parents pushed me to get out of my hometown."

There wasn't an abundance of college coaches pushing him toward leaving Hicksville either. Other than Towson State, Massachusetts was the only major offer Valente got.

Four years later, Valente gets a chuckle at the teams that overlooked him.

"There was really no one else looking at me," he said. "With my height and size, even though it didn't look like I'd do well in college, I did really well."

For Valente, the return to the NCAA tournament after a year hiatus is fulfilling a goal the team has had all season.

"We knew at the beginning of the season that if we didn't make the tournament, it would be a disappointing season. The fact that we did make it is even better, because it's my senior year."

Cannella looks at Valente's playoff experience as important to the team's success.

"He's one of the only guys on our team with playoff experience," Cannella said. "He's going to have to step up, big time."

Valente said that the improvement in team chemistry between this year's team and that of a year ago, has been a big reason for the improvement.

"There was really no team chemistry last year at all. This year, everyone really likes to be with each other," Valente said. "To have something in common with 36 other guys, that really makes you feel like you're a part of things. That's what all the tradition is talked about with UMass lacrosse."

Valente and the Minutemen will try to enhance that tradition against Princeton on Saturday.

One of my great, great,great ancestors was the ancient Greek who invented plywood which, as you might know, makes carpenters feel very smart when building houses.

He was pretty religious too. He practiced 4 religions at the same time.

One allowed him to have 3 wives and one allowed him to worship plywood.

I am not sure which religion was the most important to him.

But,at least, he always knew why he was praying and he had a pretty good chance of getting what he was praying for....you know.....

more wives and more plywood.

UMass softball to play Canisius today

Minutewomen will play a best–of–three against Golden Griffs for spot in NCAAs

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

It was about five minutes after the Massachusetts softball team was crowned the Atlantic 10 Championship trophy last weekend, and Elaine Sortino approached the media.

"So, what do you know about Canisius?" one reporter asked Sortino, after learning that the Minutewomen's NCAA Tournament play–in game was against the New York school.

"Nothing at all," Sortino said, shaking her head.

Yesterday, Sortino did not know too much more.

"Not a whole lot," Sortino said. "Dribs and drabs."

Regardless, the lesser–known Golden Griffs are coming to Amherst to face Massachusetts (37–17) in the preliminary game for the NCAA Tournament at Totman Field. The best– of–three series will begin today, with two games at 3 p.m. and 5 p.m. If the third game is necessary, it will be played tomorrow.

Sortino knows the importance of getting her team ready rather than concerning herself with the opposition.

"The bottom line is we have to come out and play. We never worry about opponents. We have to know when to bunt, when to steal ... all kinds of good things. We have to be ready for every opponent," Sortino said.

The Minutewomen will be playing on three days rest, as their last outing was the 8–1 A–10 title win over Rutgers on Sunday. Coasting through the conference tournament without a loss, Massachusetts now has to defeat Canisius to compete in the NCAA Tournament.

The Golden Griffs, the 1995 MAAC Tournament champions, head into the Massachusetts game with a 28–12 record. Six Canisius players made the All–MAAC Softball team, including Nicky Pavlick, who led the league in batting average (.411) and RBIs (29).

Other Golden Griffs garnering postseason honors included second baseman Tricia Andres, who struck out just five times all year and was a perfect 7–7 in stolen base attempts. Junior Jody Tassone and sophomore Ann Bauer (.311) made up two–thirds of the all–star outfield. Tassone, the 1994 Player of the Year, hit .324 and tied for the MAAC lead in triples with nine.

The league's top designated player was freshman Jenn Silata, who banged out 21 hits. The top pitcher on the mound in the MAAC was Kristin Spak, who won 13 games to share the league lead. Her 1.03 ERA was tops in the conference. Spak's overall statistics are even better, as her 17–8 record and minuscule 0.84 ERA can attest.

"Their pitching is comparative to what we have. At least, that's what it looks like on the stat sheets," Sortino said.

Spak does not have much on Minutewomen ace Kelly Daut. The senior right–hander notched her Massachusetts record 25th win last Sunday, improving to 25–8. Daut's 0.81 ERA consists of seven shutouts on the season and 173 strikeouts in 215 innings.

Daut, who went the distance while allowing two hits and striking out seven against Rutgers in the A–10 title victory, called it the "biggest win of the season." But Daut, Sortino and the rest of the Minutewomen realize the victories only

Kellogg signs with USBL Skyhawks

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

While the public awaits a decision on Marcus Camby's future at Massachusetts and Lou Roe is talking to agents in preparation for the NBA, Derek Kellogg has hooked on to a professional team.

The 6–foot–2–inch Springfield native was placed onto the active roster of the Connecticut Skyhawks, a team in the United States Basketball League (USBL). Assistant General Manager Pat Lenehan said Kellogg is set to sign on with the Skyhawks within the next couple of days.

"I think this a great opportunity for Derek," Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "It'll give him a chance to show them what he's learned over the last four years. I think he could surprise a few people."

Derek Kellogg

Kellogg, who could not be reached for comment, is one of 10 active players on the Skyhawks. Four taxi players are used to replace roster players in case of an emergency. One of the taxi players was said to be Massachusetts senior Jeff Meyer, but the roster put out at 11:30 a.m. yesterday afternoon did not have the seven– footer.

According to Skyhawk head coach Stu Grove, Meyer elected not to remain on the taxi squad, since there was no salary for taxi players. Grove said he was pleased with Meyer's play before he backed off.

"We thought Jeff would be a fine player, he just needed more time to develop. We wanted him to stay with it, but he elected not to," Grove said.

As for Kellogg's salary, there is a set fee for the league. According to Lenehan, Kellogg and fellow rookies of the league will make $45 a day, which works out to $315 a week. The veterans earn $60 a

Pileski looking for call from Big Show

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

With one prospective phone call later this summer, Mark Pileski may be forced to choose between his dream of playing baseball in the major leagues and the waning of an education at the University of Massachusetts.

Pileski is on the verge of becoming the second straight Minuteman shortstop to be drafted by Major League Baseball, following in the footsteps of Massachusetts' co– captain last season, Greg LaRocca, who now plays in the San Diego Padres' organization.

The one catch, though, is that if selected, Pileski, a junior, would have to leave the University a year before his graduation — a choice he said he'd think long and hard about.

"Once you leave school, it's very difficult to go back," Pileski said. "The odds are against you making the major leagues, and both my parents stress education ... it would be a very tough decision for me if it ever happened. But, then again, that's my goal, to be a major league baseball player. It would take a lot of soul searching."

Shortstop has always been a position of success for Massachusetts, producing a long line of players who have not only produced in Amherst but at the next level as well. In 1988, Gary DiSarcina patrolled short at Earl Lorden Field; he now does the same for the California Angels. Two seasons later, Glen DiSarcina did the same for the Minutemen, and is poised for a return to the big leagues anytime soon.

Then there's LaRocca, and this season, out of his shadow, comes Pileski.

"There's already one DiSarcina [Gary] in the pros, the minor league one [Glenn] is going to be in the pros someday, LaRocca's working his way up rapidly right now in the minor leagues," Pileski said. "To be mentioned in the same breath as those guys is flattering. The fact that people are saying that I have a chance to be the next great UMass shortstop just boggles my mind."

The pressure of filling LaRocca's shoes was something Pileski had to deal with immediately, making the switch from second base back to shortstop, his natural position before coming to Massachusetts.

The defensive change wasn't what gave Pileski problems; it was the offensive hole left by LaRocca that Pileski struggled to fill.

"I put a lot of pressure on myself coming into this year to not only replace LaRocca but trying to do better than he did," Pileski said. "You're not going to have a better season than Greg LaRocca did last year."

LaRocca hit .367 with 14 doubles, two triples, 10 homeruns and 40 runs batted in last season for the Minutemen; Pileski said he tried to play like someone he wasn't and lost some of his focus.

"I've tried to live up to him and we're two different types of players. I can't be Greg LaRocca. I'm my own player and I have to play the way I know how to play," Pileski said.

Up until April 19, Pileski's batting average hovered around the .270 mark, well below his .337 career average in a Minuteman uniform. However, since that time, in a span of 16 games, Pileski has caught fire, hitting .386 with four HRs and 17 RBIs. His 1995 average has now jumped to .321, to go along with five HRs and 27 RBIs on the season.

LaRocca and Pileski have approached the game of baseball with different styles.

"LaRocca is a self–made baseball player. In high school, he really put a lot of time into baseball. As for me, in high school, baseball was my number one love, but I played two other sports. Once baseball was over, it was over."

Prioritizing baseball

When Pileski was recruited out of Brockton High School, he had several options, one of which was to attend Penn State and play football. The Nittany Lions offered him a financial package to play both football and baseball, all contingent on one thing — if he redshirted the first baseball season.

"I told Penn State that I was going to sign with UMass and they flew a guy in that morning because they wanted to talk to me," he said. "I wouldn't be able to play baseball until my sophomore year. They wanted me to take a whole year off from baseball, and I didn't think that would be conducive to what I wanted to do."

So instead of kicking for the undefeated Penn State Nittany Lions in the Rose Bowl last January, Pileski was here in Amherst, still recovering from off–season shoulder surgery he underwent last fall to repair a torn rotator cuff. Now, some eight months later, Pileski's arm strength is about 90 percent. And as far as he's concerned, his chances at the pros hinge on his arm.

Valente hammering 'em for lacrosse

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Defenders like to jeer Mike Valente.

"Where do they get a uniform small enough to fit you?" one opponent yells to Massachusetts' 5–foot–7–inch attackman.

Less than a minute later, that same defender is flat on his back, courtesy of a Valente hit.

"People don't expect me to come hitting them," Valente said with a smile, "I have some impact behind me. People think I'm just going to hit their stick, and the next thing they know they're looking at the sky."

The Hicksville, N.Y. native's physicality has thrice earned him the "hammer award," an honor bestowed by coach Greg Cannella on the player who delivers the best hit of each game.

"One thing about lacrosse is that someone 5–foot–7, 160 pounds, can have a great opportunity to excel in Division I lacrosse," Cannella said. "That's why it's such a special sport."

While it may surprise some opponents that Valente can hit, his ability to pass is well documented.

Valente has 85 career assists, good for seventh all–time at UMass, while his 132 points are tied for 14th all–time in that category.

"I'm definitely there to set things up," Valente said. "Other teams this year know that I'm predominantly a feeder, and they try to defend the feed. Controlling the ball behind the cage, and controlling the tempo is a big part of my game."

Cannella said that Valente's contributions are vital to the UMass offense.

"He's very important," Cannella said. "Over the last four years, he's been the team's assist leaders. He's been very productive."

While a lot of players seek the glory of scoring, Valente is content to feed the glory to his teammates.

"I get a lot of chances where I could score, but I think it's more of a team thing," Valente said. "When I pass to any of those guys and they score, it's a great thing. I'm hooking my buddy up, I love to do that."

"I'm not really that selfish of a person that I need the goals and the highlights."

"He's got eyes all over his head," said teammate Jeremy Murphy. "He makes my job 10 times easier. He does all the work, while I get the glory for the goal."

While Valente's field sense has become a trademark, he doesn't think it's a big deal.

"If sometimes these guys would look up and look around, they'd see so many other guys open. And there is so much better probability that your team will score if you pass it to them, than if you take the shot yourself," Valente said. "Some guys just have tunnel vision to score. I'm just always looking up. I always have an eye open for one of my teammates."

Sometimes, Valente admits, when he is looking for a great pass, he might pass up a shot. He cites his mother who attends just about every game as a measuring stick.

"If my mother tells me that I should shoot more than I shoot the ball more," Valente said.

Valente's parents have done a lot more than help him decide how often to shoot. He credits his mother and father for pushing him toward college.

UNC may offer job to UMass' Hooker

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

With just three weeks remaining before a search committee has promised to find a new chancellor for the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, University of Massachusetts President Michael Hooker has yet to officially announce his intentions.

The search committee at UNC has conducted a 13–month search and has promised a decision by June 1.

In an official statement released from Hooker's office, William H. Wright, director of public information said, "If President Hooker were to be offered the position of Chancellor of UNC–Chapel Hill, he would have to consider that offer seriously.

"That's the only statement I can make at this time," Wright said.

Johnny Harris, chairman of the UNC search committee, couldn't be reached for comment today, but told The Chapel Hill News, "I think I know who Michael Hooker is, but I can't comment on that. You know I can't comment on that, but I'm damned if I do and damned if I don't."

Concerning Hooker's possible departure, UMass Board Chair Dan Taylor acknowledged that Hooker may be leaving, but couldn't offer a definite answer.

"Whether or not he is offered the job, or accepts it, is up to others. The University is now set on a course of building quality. Many hands are pulling many oars in this direction. And we will continue on course, whatever the future holds," he said.

Steven Cohen, Chief Justice of the Student Judiciary branch of the Student Government Association, said that if Hooker were to leave, it would give UMass, "A great opportunity to have a leader for the next 20 years."

Cohen said that he was "pretty sure" that Hooker was up for the job, citing the recent UNC decision that could raise the salary for the chancellor's post from $150,000 to $200,000. Hooker makes $189,000 at his current post.

He also voiced concerns about UMass' near future without Hooker at the helm.

"I'm concerned about who's going to be here in the interim. What about Hooker's plan? Is someone else going to pick up the ball on that?" Cohen said.

SOM building gets evacuated after bomb scare

The School of Management building was evacuated yesterday morning when the University of Massachusetts received a bomb threat.

At 9:14 a.m., a UMass operator answered a call that stated there was a bomb in the School of Management building, police said.

The operator told police the voice on the phone was a male voice and it sounded like a recording, because it repeated the message twice.

UMass police and Environment Health and Safety responded to the call, while the power plant and the Amherst fire department were put on–call, police said.

At 9:41 a.m., the building was evacuated by pulling the fire alarm and no unusual devices were found in the 48 minute search, police said.

Following the search, police said it is standard procedure to post signs on the entrances to the building for two hours warning individuals that there was a bomb threat to the building and to enter at their own risk.

According to police documents, this is the first bomb scare of the semester.

Police said they are investigating the incident.

Scott, campus rally against anti-Semitism

SHINICHIRO SUZUKI / COLLEGIAN

Larry Goldbaum, the University's coordinator for Jewish affairs, spoke at an "Anti–anti–semitism" rally held yesterday in the Cape Cod Lounge.

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The chancellor apologized to a room of approximately 150 people yesterday for what he said were anti–Semitic statements made by a former University of Massachusetts professor last week.

Those statements spurred yesterday's "Anti–Anti–Semitism" rally, where students, administrators, faculty, staff and concerned community members joined together to denounce anti–Semitism on campus, and in the school newspaper.

The Cape Cod Lounge was overflowing with applause as a variety of speakers rallied in opposition to a letter printed on the editorial page of the May 2 edition of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. The letter, written by Professor Emeritus Helen Cullen, was used by speakers to exemplify anti– Semitism on campus.

Cullen wrote that "one can only conclude that traditional Judaism and the Jewish identity are offensive to most human beings and will always cause trouble between the Jews and the rest of the human race."

Scott touched on this portion of Cullen's letter and retorted that, "It is Professor Cullen's actions and statements which are offensive."

Shomwa Shamapande, the former president of the Black Student Union, was one of the many speakers who condemned Cullen's views. He said that the black community can sympathize with Jewish students' "pain" in having their culture defamed.

Scott stated that he could not administer punishment over the letter, in that it would be a violation of Cullen's constitutional right to freedom of speech. However, Scott said that an incident that had preceded the letter's printing, was call for examination of Cullen's emeritus status.

The incident took place when Cullen came to the Collegian offices, attempting to submit the letter as an advertisement.

Lisa Tannenbaum, the Collegian's advertising manager, who is Jewish, explained that this could not happen due to Collegian policy. Cullen is

Faculty senate debates plans by Chancellor

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Some faculty grew angry during a two–hour meeting yesterday, that began with the secretary of the faculty senate forewarning the chancellor to "beware of the darkside."

Faculty and administration turned–out in large numbers for yesterday's faculty senate meeting to discuss and debate Chancellor David K. Scott's recently released report, "Strategic Thinking at the University of Massachusetts, 1995– 2000." Approximately 200 people attended.

Faculty expressed concern with several parts of the chancellor's plan, including the move toward four credit courses, reduction of 500 faculty and staff members and unreasonable time constraints for debate on the issues.

Although the provost spent more time defending the chancellor's highly criticized report than on her own, she did speak about the need to cut back.

"We can't reallocate our way out of the problem," Provost Patricia Crosson said. "It would weaken us and be inappropriate for the type of University we want to be."

One solution presented by Scott would be to increase course credits from three to four, and make the courses more intense. This would mean less classes, which would necessitate less faculty, Scott said.

While faculty held that this would translate into an increased workload for the professors who stayed, Scott reassured them that he is looking to more humane ways of dealing with faculty. He used the early retirement plan as an example.

Scott kicked off the discussion with a 25–minute presentation of his report, and the remainder of the two hours was allotted for audience questions and comments. At times the discourse got heated and emotional, and discussion frequently metamorphosed into debate.

Scott attempted to clarify that his plan was on "Strategic Thinking" not "Strategic Planning," and that some of it would be changed, deleted and modified over the next two years that it will take to implement.

However, faculty members posed the problem of presenting the report to the Board of Trustees at their June 6 meeting.

One respondent advised that the senate not bring "thinking" to the board, but instead hold off until the fall when they would have more time to decide on concrete plans.

Scott replied that it would be better not to stall planning, and to keep the board actively involved in the process and connected to the University.

Lack of repairs the cause of problems in classrooms

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Maintenance has been deferred at the University of Massachusetts and professors are tired of all the talk without action.

The University's deferred maintenance backlog is now estimated to be $310 million according to another review issued by the independent Association of Higher Education Facilities.

Students and professors teach and learn in closet sized offices, dilapidated classrooms and aging or inadequate laboratories.

At the crossroads
a closer look at the major issues affecting the UMass Campus

The worst classrooms on campus are also the most frequented. According to UMass professors, the worst classrooms on campus are the auditorium sized rooms found in Thompson, Bartlett, Morril and Mahar auditorium.

"I would say that the state of the classrooms reflect the declining financial resources of the University," said Jon Boyce, head of the economics department.

Broken chairs, peeling paint, cracks in the wall and leaking roofs are the most common office and classroom complaints.

"We have a problem with classrooms," said F. M. Clydesdale, head of the food science department. "There's a lack of properly equipped classrooms for a lot of the teaching we do."

More than just making seats harder to find, lack of classroom maintenance affects the morale of both students and faculty, some professors said.

"It certainly impacts on faculty morale," said Peter Lillya, associate head of the chemistry department, "and it must impact on the students who have to use these facilities."

William Moebius is the chairman of the comparative literature department whose office is located in the 110 year old South College.

"We don't expect perfection," Moebius said. "We do expect a fair amount of warmth in the wintertime. We can't do anything about the heat in the summertime."

If air conditioners are plugged in on the third floor of South College it would overload the electrical system, Moebius said.

Aging Labs

Most of the labs on this campus are old and out of date but little gets done to renovate them, according to some professors.

"For most of our labs we are in really serious need of renovation and additional equipment, especially for teaching labs," said John Dubach, head of the physics department.

Lillya described Goessmann, the building his labs are located in, as old and flawed.

"What ought to be done about [Goessmann] is to gut it and rebuild it as a classroom or lab building," Lillya said. "What will be done is

Camby yet to decide on NBA

Official announcement not planned as deadline approaches

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

Everybody is awaiting a press conference by Marcus Camby to comment on his basketball future as the deadline to apply for early entry into the 1995 NBA draft nears.

The thing is, there may not be one.

The sophomore center has been close to silent on his plans for next year. If Camby is to declare himself eligible for the draft, he must make an announcement by midnight on Sunday. There are no plans made for a public decision by Camby in the next couple of days, so all signs point to him staying for his junior year at the University of Massachusetts.

Camby has been attending classes regularly, and the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported that he has registered for classes for next fall.

Massachusetts coach John Calipari noted the Hartford, Conn. native does not have to make his decision public if he chooses to stay put.

"Marcus doesn't owe anybody an announcement. He may just let it pass, and act like he was thinking about it," Calipari said.

This week, a few standout college underclassmen have made themselves eligible. North Carolina's Jerry Stackhouse, Wisconsin's Rashard Griffith and Virginia's Cory Alexander joined others who already declared, such as Maryland's Joe Smith, Arkansas' Corliss Williamson and Scottie Thurman, Ohio University's Gary Trent, and Stackhouse's sophomore teammate, Rasheed Wallace.

With the plethora of talent coming out of the collegiate ranks this year, Camby still has the chance of being one of the top players picked if he were to declare. Yet with Stackhouse, Wallace and Smith being the frontrunners for the top three positions, Camby may be in a better place for next year's draft.

His performance in the Minutemen's final game against Oklahoma State in the Elite Eight of the NCAA Tournament was the last game scouts had a chance to see Camby in action.

In the 68–54 loss to 7–foot, 292–pound Bryant Reeves and the Cowboys, Camby, who averaged 13.9 ppg and 6.2 rpg to go along with 103 blocks through 30 games, scored just six points on 2–of–10 shooting.

One of the few questions of Camby's game is his size. Some say Camby needs to add more muscle to his thin 6– foot 10–inch, 215–pound frame to be able to excel in the NBA.

In an interview with WBZ–TV Boston, Camby, while at the State House with his Massachusetts teammates on Wednesday, said he could use another year to bulk up, and that he could benefit from staying. However, he did not reveal his decision.

Camby has been invited to participate in the tryouts for the 1995 USA Men's World University Games Team, which will take place next month at the U.S. Olympic Training Center in Colorado.

Recruiting notes: Terrel Stokes, the guard from Simon Gratz High School in Philadelphia, Pa., who was sought after by Massachusetts, announced he will attend Maryland next fall yesterday.

3 rapes reported in Southwest

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The third rape to have allegedly happened in the Southwest Residential Area in the past three weeks has been reported to the University of Massachusetts police.

On Tuesday at approximately 8 p.m., a third party called the police reporting there had been an alleged rape to another individual, police said.

UMass detectives interviewed the victim and classified the rape as an "acquaintance rape." The incident was alleged to have occurred in a Southwest Hall on the night of April 22, police said.

According to police documents, the victim is a 21-year-old student. No charges have been filed.

The second incident was reported this past Saturday when police received a report of an alleged rape that happened in the early morning hours of April 5, outside a residence hall in Southwest, police said.

According to police, the victim is an 18-year-old student. The case is under investigation.

On April 21, the UMass police received a report of rape that occurred on April 14 in a Southwest residence hall, police said.

After investigation, police also identified the incident as an acquaintance type rape. UMass detectives are still in communication with the victim, but no charges have been filed, police said.

All cases are still under investigation and the three incidents have not been linked, police said.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Tom Robinson said the administration is concerned with any reported incident of rape.

RSOs gain official status at University

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

The Campus Activities Office has announced that starting next September, there will be ten new registered student organizations at the University of Massachusetts.

According to Phee Paradise, all of the new RSOs are groups that have already been active on campus. Paradise is the customer service manager at the Campus Activities Office.

The new RSOs are as follows:

- Anthropology Undergraduate Caucus
- Boricuas Unidos
- Club Volleyball
- Equestrian Team
- Hindu Students Organization
- Phi Kappa Sigma
- Rainforest Action Group
- Shades
- Society of Landscape Architects
- VIVA (Volunteers Involved in Vital Action)

University Service Council

Official RSO status grants these groups certain rights and privileges that they would not have if they remained unregistered, Paradise said.

RSOs are granted the use of mail boxes, phones and money accounts accessible through the Campus Activities Office. RSOs may also reserve on-campus meeting rooms, request funding through the Student Government Association, and apply for office space.

The purpose of Boricuas Unidos is "to support and advocate issues that will help improve the Puerto Rican community," according to its constitution.

The group has already been active on an unofficial basis for several months. Boricuas Unidos aims to educate the UMass and Five College area on issues affecting the community at UMass, in the United States, and in Puerto Rico itself. It will also advocate the agendas of national organizations that have similar goals.

VIVA is designed to increase student participation in community service. According to the organization's constitution, VIVA will plan and conduct large-scale community service events and inform people about additional opportunities for service. The organization will also serve as an advisory council to the Community Service Program.

The Rainforest Action Group was formed by a group of UMass students concerned with the protection of the world's rainforests and the indigenous people who live in and around them. The organization plans to educate elementary school children about rainforests, conduct letter-writing campaigns, and organize benefit concerts.

Paradise outlined the process by which an unregistered student group becomes an RSO:

- The group contacts the secretary of the registry at the office of the Student Government Association.
- The group fills out a registration packet that includes a charter or constitution along with the names and signatures of at least 10 students who are interested in participating.
- The paperwork is reviewed by the SGA secretary of the registry and, once approved, sent to the Campus Activities Office.
- The Campus Activities Office assigns the RSO an account number and a mailbox.

At the April 10th meeting of the Faculty Senate, the following policy was approved:

University of Massachusetts/Boston credits and grades will be treated like any other credit transferred to UMASS/Amherst. This means that the student must earn a grade of "C-" or better to transfer the course. Letter grades earned at UMASS/Boston will no longer be used in the computation of a students' grade point average nor will the credit be counted as residence credit. This policy was approved to keep course transfer policies consistent within the five campus state university system.

This policy goes into effect beginning with courses taken in Fall 1995. Students who enroll in courses for summer 1995 at UMASS/Boston will have the grades earned calculated into their cumulative grade point averages and the credits will count as residence credit.

Photographs, poems display 'deep ecology'

By Purva Panday
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Animal Rights Coalition (ARC) sponsored a presentation on environmental awareness Wednesday.

The event, called "The Web of Life — A Multimedia Event on Deep Ecology," focused on the environmental philosophy of deep ecology.

Approximately 60 people attended the presentation in Bowker Auditorium.

"Deep ecology is a philosophy that's been around for quite a while," said Tricia Camera–Clemente, member of the UMass ARC.

According to Camera–Clemente, deep ecology stresses that humans are not a superior part of the earth, but a component of it.

In a pamphlet distributed at the presentation, the UMass ARC stated that "deep ecologists argue that a deep commitment to nature and to activism distinguish them from mainstream (shallow) ecologists."

The UMass ARC invited two prominent figures in the deep ecology movement to share their work with the audience.

Edward J. Moret, an environmental marine life artist, and Keith Snow, an investigative journalist and photographer, addressed the issue of deep ecology through a variety of mediums, including music, poetry, photography and art work.

Moret began the event with a slide and sound presentation of his environmental paintings, set to new–age music and his own poetry.

Moret's art work reflects the "optimism and hope for environmental change," he said.

His poetry covered a range of issues from the industrialization of Antarctica to the question of "Where did we go wrong?" in reference to our oceans.

Snow shared his poetry, music and personal photography from his coverage of stories in 21 countries around the world. He focused on the destruction of land and animal oppression. He also performed a saxophone piece entitled "Ode to Costa Rica."

Snow ended the program by inviting all members of the audience to join in a circle and hold hands to share their names and thoughts with each other.

"I care about the earth and the people and the animals on it — deep ecology sounded like the energy I felt like being in tonight," said Guru Nam Kaur Khosla, a teacher of Kundalini yoga at UMass.

things get dribbled into the building in little fixes and nothing ever really gets done."

Stephen Kaulenas, head of the biology department, described his labs in Morril north as "dingy" but "functional."

The state of some of the labs, some of which received their last paint job more than 20 years ago, can contribute to the mood of both students and faculty who work there, Kaulenas said.

"The cosmetics are not very good," he said. "My labs are workable but not spruce."

Poor construction

Poor building construction has contributed to problems in maintenance as well, Lillya said.

According to Lillya, before the construction of the Lederle Graduate Research Center, the chemistry department conducted tests to see which type of tile would be preferable. The state said the tests were too rigorous and choose another less expensive tile containing asbestos.

"Now whenever a tile comes up an asbestos crew comes in to remove it," Lillya said. "If people built buildings better we could save money in the long run."

Problems with the windows, the air ventilation fans and the laboratory door knobs may be due to use of less expensive, lower quality materials, he said.

"I don't think the state can be faulted if a building doesn't look as good as it did 20 years ago," said Rosanne Pawelec, spokesperson for the state division of capitol planning and operations (DCPO).

DCPO was created by the Ward commission, a state investigation into shoddy state construction. Pawelec was unsure as to whether the LGRC was built under the DCPO or its predecessor agency.

On–campus maintenance

University officials are in the process of obtaining a prioritized review of all the buildings on campus, said William Rose, associate vice chancellor for facilities and campus services.

The review will be used to obtain a complete and prioritized list of all campus repairs and more accurately assess the deferred maintenance backlog. The results from this review should be available by September 1996, he said.

In the meantime, the University has not and will not discontinue its attempts to combat deferred maintenance. Rose said.

Buildings such as the Fine Arts Center, the Munson Hall Annex and the New Africa House have had new roofing, asbestos removal, electric wiring replaced, repainting and re–carpeting as part of combating deferred maintenance.

DCPO is planning to replace the air ventilation system in the LGRC to reduce noise in the surrounding neighborhood, Pawelec said. Repairs on the expansion in the LGRC are also in the works. The cost of the ventilation repairs are $500,000; the expansion joints repairs will cost $700,000, Pawelec said.

Two teams organized by the Physical Plant specializes in repairs and maintenance, said Pat Daly, director of Physical Plant.

The Tiger Team, organized three years ago, consists of 12 people and rotates through several buildings on campus, Daly said. They have authority to complete any projects which take four hours or less of work, such as painting room or fixings smaller systems.

A maintenance team committee to classroom repair has been put to use last winter intersession, Daly said. During summer intersession, classrooms in Mahar and Thompson will receive repairs in seating and lights and get repainted.

All the maintenance problems on campus are not a management issue, it's a teaching problem, said Robert Faulkner, a professor in sociology.

"I'm sick and tired of the student getting screwed around here," he said. "It's the student who has to sit in those seats."

alleged to have then asked to speak to someone who was not Jewish, and was reportedly rude and offensive to Tannenbaum.

"There was an apparent incident that took place where a student felt harassed," Scott said in an interview later in the day. "If something like this happens, then it is the University's responsibility to investigate what has gone on here."

A group will be formed to investigate the incident and if the allegations against Cullen prove to be factual, the group will recommend appropriate action to be taken by the chancellor, Scott said. He said he could not comment any further than that.

"Hatred comes through bad education," Scott said. "People are educated to hate."

Scott cited the Code of Professional Ethics for Faculty in stating that "professors are supposed to promote ideals of a learning environment that fosters individual rights and encourages mutual respect."

The key to education is conducting open discourse about these issues and to learn by challenging these ideas, according to Larry Goldbaum, the new coordinator for Jewish affairs at the University.

"The way to deal with controversial speakers and ideas is not to suppress them, but expose them," he said.

However, this was not the best way for this issue to be exposed, according to Goldbaum.

"Cullen's letter diverts us from what we should be focusing on," Goldbaum said. "We shouldn't be looking at Jews as victims, but instead at the beauty of the Jewish tradition."

Other speakers agreed with Goldbaum.

"I don't want us to only focus on the hate," said Hillel Rabbi Saul Perlmutter. "It's important to balance vigilance with joy and celebration. Being Jewish is something beautiful."

Afro–American studies and philosophy, gave a humorous presentation, that involved a scientific formula by which to measure the University's potential success.

According to Wolff, two of three parts in the formula need to be defined before any plans for the University can be implemented.

The central administration needs to clarify how big they want the University to be, what quality they want and how much money they will be willing to supply, Wolff said.

"The president is decamping, the Board of Trustees is huddling. Let's wait, then go to the board," Wolff said, "And sit down and reason together."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. Campus man signs off

All good things must come to an end — my days as a Collegian columnist are officially over. My days as an undergraduate will also be coming to an end in a short few weeks. A lot has happened during the last three years since I transferred to UMass from Indiana University. I wanted to be more than just a number and a face in the crowd at UMass. I wanted to stand–out and be a part of my university. As a result, I joined the Collegian and set a goal that within three weeks everyone would known my name: Adam Scott Roberts.

My first stint at editorial writing grabbed the attention of many from within one editorial, I had gained enemies and an audience. Over time, I softened up and launched the tongue– in–cheek column called Campus Man. Campus Man was supposed to be cheesy and funny to lighten up an otherwise tense/political university. I was criticized for being hailed as "the man with three first names" to this ASR person where strangers thought they knew me. To this day people continue to call me that silly name and think that they really know me — and they don't know a thing about me.

After a while the ASR thing I loathed so much became my trademark — ASR, not just a name but an attitude. Well, things simmered down, I matured, and I later decided to put Campus Man and ASR to rest. I stopped writing fluff and turned a new leaf and began writing about serious issues. Somehow, the attraction to shocking and or controversial editorials excited me. After receiving death threats; having a stalker; privatizing my telephone number and university file; I realized what I wrote affected people. And like my Uncle Larry always said "Don't stop writing — it doesn't matter whether you get a good or bad response — as long as you get a response you know that your job as writer has been successful. You made people think and got them to react."

Seeing people bash me in the "letters to the editor" section of the paper in addition to getting stopped, surrounded and detained at bars had become commonplace. I never wanted to be passive, I always wanted to be an active member of the university and to make people think. It still amazes me that people think that just because I write for the paper and supposedly exist as a public person that they have the right to invade my privacy and disrupt my life when they bump into me in coffee shops and bars. By picking up the Collegian every other Thursday and reading my column, whether you agree or disagree, you've decided that an issue I wrote on was worth discussion. How else could I explain the various people that came up to me? Naturally, praise is better than criticism.

It amazes me the attention students actually gave to the things that I have written. In turn, by writing "hate" letters to the editor bashing me, leaving messages on my answering machine, saying hello, or questioning certain opinions, people have proved that something I wrote made them think and react. This was my purpose and was the most rewarding thing about writing for the Collegian. The attention you gave to me, whether it be direct or indirect, allowed me to be me. The power to get people talking and have this attention focused on yourself at times had its negative aspects. However, the positives outweighed the negatives and that is why I continued writing.

I have never been the quiet type and have never been afraid to say or write anything. Many people have labeled me as controversial, a trouble–maker, and even hated me for reasons based on 70 lines of text — these people don't even know me. Had I been intimidated or influenced by what people thought, I would have compromised my beliefs and I would have rather stopped writing than ever compromise my journalistic integrity.

I have to say that I loved every minute of my column. To my fans and denigrators I thank you for paying attention and allowing me to convey my views for three years — even when you disagreed with them. You never realized that you made me what I was. Well, this is it — the end. Here's Porky Pig with my final thought ... "That's all Folks!!!"

The inhumanity of China

I can't wait until I have kids, lots of kids. I'm dreaming of the day that I'll be in my backyard playing with a litter of about 3 or 4 little David Chans. This is not an unusual dream, many other people share this dream with me. But this dream could easily be just a dream. If I was living in the World's Biggest Human Prison Camp, or more commonly known as the People's Republic of China. I would be subjected to the government's inhuman one–family/one–child policy. This policy is the worst violation of basic human rights.

Here in America, the abortion issue has led to the American government being accused of "invading the bedroom." But what about what the Chinese government is doing to its people? Talk about invading the bedroom. I recently read an excellent but very sad column written by Jeff Jacoby of The Boston Globe. The column ran last Tuesday, and it was titled, "Clinton's China policy: raw, naked cruelty." How appropriate.

For all you women that didn't read the column, I will quote some very thoughtful points that Jacoby mentioned.

"Couples are made to sign a one–child agreement, and are forbidden to have that child until they are issued a government quota ... women who get pregnant a second time without authorization are sterilized. Couples who evade the policy are fined severely, publicly humiliated and demoted. The menstrual cycles of fertile women are tracked. Their means of contraception and the date of their next expected period are publicly posted. Women who were not permitted to become pregnant are forced to have an abortion and late–term abortions are not uncommon. Some abortion methods include poisoning the baby, injecting formaldehyde through the soft spot of the baby's head, and crushing the baby's skull with forceps."

Enough to ruin your lunch, huh? There are many other things that go on in China that we don't know about. But we do know enough to see the government's cruelty towards its speechless people. The government knows just about everything about everybody. They even know your menstrual cycle! They tell people when to have kids and how many to have. My dad fled China when he was 19 — the same age as I am now. He didn't want to be told to have one kid. He didn't want to be a farmer for the government. He didn't want to be part of the red guard. He wanted to live. Several years ago when my uncles and aunts came to America, one of the first things they did was throw their contraceptives out the window. Within a couple of years I suddenly had a hundred more cousins.

Chinese citizens as well as the rest of the world is clouded by ruler Deng Xiaoping and the rest of the Chinese government. We are told that the reason for the one–child per family policy is to control China's overpopulation. Bull– manure. Although about one out of every five people on Earth live in China, there is no population problem. Let's look at some facts.

The population density in China is about 409 people per square mile. In the United Kingdom, it's about 588. In India it's 683 and in Japan it's a whopping 850. But those are not the worst. Hong Kong's population density is an earth– shattering 247,501 people per square mile! How big is Hong Kong? A diminutive 23 square miles with almost 6 million people packed in there. Now that's a population problem. I've been there and believe me, it's a problem.

China does not have a population problem. Did you know that our beloved state of Massachusetts is almost twice as densely populated as China? The problem with China is poverty caused by the cruel government. The callous leaders have made reproductive freedom, an obvious inalienable right of any human being, unlawful. They have to insure a certain level of poverty, a certain level of control. The people of China have been reduced to farm animals. Big Brother is watching them. You know what I mean.

What has happened to the fight for democracy? What happened to America's support for any democratic cause? During the Tiananmen Square riots, the only show of support from former President George Bush for the radicals was, basically, nothing. Bush preserved relations with Deng and vetoed a bill that would protect Chinese students in the United States. Now recently 13 women from the Golden Venture, the steamer that hit the New York coast a couple of years ago, lost a court appeal and will face deportation back to China. And of course, under Chinese law, they will be sterilized, fined and most likely imprisoned. So much for the fight for democracy.

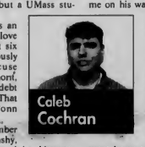
Opinion/Editorial

Where I'm from



"Don't forget where you came from."

That's what my guidance counselor, soccer coach and mentor told me minutes after I graduated from Monument Mountain Regional High School in 1991.

"Don't worry," I replied. "I'll be around."

As it turned out, I really wasn't around very much after that. I went back to the high school in January of my freshman year as UMass for the annual "graduate talks," in which graduates from the previous year come back to the school and share their wisdom with the senior class, and I already felt strange walking around the halls of my old stomping ground. The people who I considered my best friends only months earlier had already changed vastly, and so had I. I was no longer just a Monument graduate, but a UMass student.

The decision to come to UMass was an easy one, and not because I was so in love with the place. I had been accepted at six universities, four of which I was seriously considering. Two of the four, Syracuse University and the University of Vermont, were options only if I felt like being in debt for the greater part of my natural life. That left two schools to choose from, UConn and UMass.

Now, at the time, you have to remember that UConn was the school with the flashy, up–and–coming men's basketball team and the shiny new arena. Although UConn's location is even more rural than that of UMass, a tour around the campus basically assured me that UConn was the school for me. When my financial aid "award" from the school came through, however, I was again faced with a decision: UMass or debt. The decision was easy.

Just as the day of my high school graduation is still crystal clear, the day I moved into Baker in the fall of 1991 also remains a vivid memory. I remember strolling the narrow halls of the building, talking to all of the other freshmen who were moving in. From about four doors down from me I heard the sounds of the country band Alabama blasting into the hallway, and I had to stop in to take a peek.

It turned out that the two rednecks were actually Berkshire County neighbors of mine, as they graduated from Mt. Greylock, one of our rival high schools to the north. My first roommate was a nice guy, but we weren't really compatible as roommates. As a consequence, I spent many evenings in Jay and Craig's room watching TV, reminiscing about old soccer rivalries, and even listening to a little country music. Two years later, I spent a semester at the University of South Carolina with Jay and roomed with Craig when I got back.

I continued to roam the halls and again heard music, this time a sappy ballad by Mr. Big. The kid kept playing this song over and over, and I had to go see who the hell would actually play this song in public. The culprit was Jeff, a skinny kid from the North Shore who left the love of his life back at home and who, later that day, forgot to bring his ID to dinner. "That's OK," Jeff said as he passed me on his way back to Baker. "I'll just have a bowl of Sugar Smacks instead." Jeff became my second roommate in the spring. He talked me into moving to Southwest in the fall, where we stayed until I went on exchange the following year.

As I continued my journey through Baker, I went upstairs and ran into Matt and Craig, two more kids from the North Shore. Craig moped around a lot that first week, as he wasn't real happy to be away from home. I remember eating dinner with him at the end of that first week and watching him pick at his food. "My friends are coming home today," he said. "I should have gone with them." Today, three years later, Craig likes UMass so much that he's decided to stay for another year.

Today, as I write my final column, these people I met on my first at UMass are some of my best friends in the world.

During my sophomore year, I began to write for the Collegian, and I want to express my thanks to a few people who got me down here and kept me down here: Jeff Crofts, Lisa Curtis, Emily Marino, Jon Lupo and Tracy Monahan. You've all helped me immensely and I appreciate it.

As for where I came from, I haven't forgotten. Stockbridge, Mass., Monument Mountain Regional High School, and now, I can proudly say, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Letters to the Editor

Writer stereotypes Japanese people

To the editor:

Reading your article yesterday, "Who decides where you belong?" by Yukari Shigeta, made me think of the way to which multiculturalism should lead in Japan. The way you stereotyped the Japanese people altogether as being "ignorant, narrow–minded and very stubborn people" made me very upset, not because that I felt insulted by these claims but because you yourself are not trying to break down such tendencies of Japanese people.

Yes, I do agree that in Japan the myth of Japan being a mono–ethnic nation is wide spread amongst the Japanese, and I apologize that we tend not to be used to having contact with people of different cultures. More than often, the presence of the indigenous Japanese people, Ainu, and the Korean Japanese people are forgotten, and the gap between the people's perception of Japan as a mono–ethnic nation and a multi–ethnic Japan in reality does cause a great problem for ethnic minorities in Japan and the people of different cultures in our country.

I am not going to justify such tendencies of the Japanese here. But I emphasize that it is changing for the better. An increasing number of people are making friends with the people of different cultures, and that is making a difference. I feel strongly that the people of our generation are much less prejudiced towards other people, and that we enjoy much more multiculturalism than our parents' generation did. We are the ones who make the change in our nation.

You said that you were proud of being a product of three different cultures. Then, instead of just criticizing the "narrow–mindedness" of our people, we should seek a way our of this problematic situation.

If someone is to change the Japanese tendency to not accept other people, it is us. It upset me when you wrote "... if Japanese people cannot accept that, it is their problem, and not mine." By stereotyping the Japanese people of being ignorant and narrow–minded you can only widen the gap between the Japanese and the people of other cultures. We have to build bridges to attain mutual understanding and trust between our differed cultures.

Article unfairly attacks Turkey

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the article entitled "Turkey attacks South Kurdistan" printed on April 25th. The article itself, being the account of an invasion into a nonexistent country, making use of fictitious statistics attributed to blatantly biased sources, is beneath reproach. What is a matter of concern is how this mindless drivel found its way onto the pages of the Collegian.

Most students on this campus can little afford the time to read hefty periodicals such as the New York Times on a regular basis. So, between the demands of school and the demands of work they turn to the Collegian to bring them a summary of the global news worthy of mention. No doubt they expect the articles they read to be factual. To have printed the above mentioned article was an error in judgement. To have presented it as anything but unsubstantiated opinion exhibits a serious lack of journalistic integrity.

Turkey's advances into Iraq are a result of the apparently irreconcilable differences that exist. The goal of said actions is to put an end to the terrorist activities that have claimed countless lives over the past years. As in any military engagement, the loss of some innocent lives, however unfortunate, is unavoidable. Yet, the implication that innocent civilians are being intentionally killed is a fallacy and the claim that genocide is the primary objective of Turkey's advance is pure nonsense.

In the wake of the occurrence in Oklahoma we have all been exposed to the heinousness of terrorism. Turkey seeks nothing more than to bring an end to the terrorist acts that she has endured over the course of the past decade, and to ensure a peaceful existence for all members of her society, regardless of ethnicity.

MTV gives show a new 'Life'

Program examines 'so-called' teen experiences with sharp eye

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

MY SO–CALLED LIFE
MTV
Monday – Friday, 7 p.m.

I never thought I could say with a straight face that MTV can claim to have one of the best hours of television. The credit goes to "My So–Called Life," the teen angst drama that ran last season on ABC to rapt critics but a scant viewership. In a bold and commendable move, MTV agreed to air all of the program's 19 episodes during the month of April, hoping its weekday slot in MTV's Dr. Caligari–esque "Buzz Bin" would build enough support to continue the show this fall. All of this was supposed to culminate in last weekend's "My So–Called Life" Marathon.

But then a funny thing happened. People started watching. And as the only thankful result of MTV's usual blitzkrieg rotation, "Life" will continue to air its episodes through May. While the word is still out on "Life"'s future, one thing is certain: this is one hell of a show.

I'll confess that I, like most of America, viewed "Life" indifferently — if at all — during its run on ABC. While the critics gushed, the few sections of episodes I saw grated on me. Here was this upper middle–class teenage girl, Angela (Claire Danes) who was whining about, like, her big crush on some dopey guy and, like, what a drag her parents were. Even as I prepared to graduate, the wounds of high school hell are still fresh enough not to want to have to watch them unfold all over again — even if this time it's scored to Buffalo Tom instead of Bon Jovi. Besides, what did this girl really have to complain about — it's not like her best friends were alcoholics and confused gays who were kicked out of their house, right?

Okay, well, maybe they were. But what I finally realized about "Life" is that these issues are your life when you're 16, no matter what your background. The cute guy you were in love with but didn't know you existed was a potent reason to get up and go to school, if not the only one. Your parents, no matter how sympathetic never did quite understand. And the prickly nature of friendships complicated by sex, lies and the occasional videotape is uniquely difficult to explore on television without turning into "Melrose" camp or "Saved by the Bell" cartoons.

"My So–Called Life" does that superbly, refracting a milieu long misunderstood into fascinating television — funny, moving and exceedingly smart without the proverbial heart of gold usually reserved for movie prostitutes, "Full House" episodes and game show hosts. There's hardly a false note in the series' run, and believe me, thanks to MTV's continual rotation, I've seen every single one of 'em ... twice.

One of "Life"'s chief pleasures is watching its excellent cast grow and regress, make their moves as well as make mistakes. It's a testament to the show's creator, Winnie Holzman, that the show never dips into cheap sentiment (though the eerie X–Mas episode, featuring Juliana Hatfield — ugh — as an angel came close). It earns our tears because it creates links and relationships as alternately transitory and interdependent as those in "real" life.

And so through the rose–colored and earnest eyes of our beautiful and flawed heroine, we're treated to an emotionally democratic depiction of characters — people allowed to be afraid, selfish and quietly heroic — sometimes all at once. In the pilot, Angela remarks that she thinks Anne Frank was lucky because she was trapped for years in a room with a guy she really liked. Her insensitivity is, in a weird way, commendable because the show refuses to make her too self–consciously smart (and lets her be insensitive).

This object of affection is Jordan Catalano (Jared Leto), a guy whose penetrating, faraway blue eyes may indeed hide a tormented soul, but more realistically is probably masking too many drugs and not enough smarts. Angela falls hard for him, and throughout the first season, we're treated to their roller–coaster relationship. Interestingly and affectingly enough, their reconciliation in the season finale is fueled by a letter written by Angela's geeky next–door neighbor, Brian (Devon Gummersall) as a "favor" to Jordan. Angela is so into her own obsession she doesn't realize she's Brian's obsession as well. On lesser TV shows, Brian would be seen as Angela's salvation. On "Life," however, the show portrays their relationship as tenuous at best; you're not really sure if they are meant for or just deserve each other.

Ample screen time is given to the program's supporting cast, which works to make the show more of an ensemble than a one–girl angst fest. But it's not as if "Life" throws a character an episode now and then — they continue to grow on every show, so that the focus shifts as the series goes on but yet remains tightly gripped on its subjects.

There's Angela's hard–drinking, "wild" friend, Rayanne (A.J. Langer), who commits the ultimate Angela Sin when she sleeps with Jordan after he and Angela break up. Their big fight culminates in Rayanne remarking that "You've lost a selfish best friend and a guy you were never really with. You've lost nothing. I've lost everything." (This, by the way, doesn't resolve anything. The wounds are deeper than that).

There's also Rickie (Wilson Cruz), the first gay teen on prime time television who isn't just a sympathetic cipher. "Life" doesn't shy away from dealing with Rickie's same–sex crushes (can you imagine that on "90210"?) as well as the romantic illusions he fosters — right along side the "Romantic Illusions" Angela swims in. And "Life" grants Angela's parents (played by Bess Armstrong and Tom Irwin) the dimensionality to go beyond know–nothing TV parents and into the realm of full–bodied people whose concern for Angela allows them to intersect with her life, while they struggle along with their own issues.

If it all sounds like a hopeless soap opera, maybe it's time to realize our lives are essentially soap operas — only we're not nearly as attractive. Melodrama — superior, well–crafted melodrama like this — has a way of sneaking up on you, revealing things while creating new meanings along the way. Great television does that, too. A

Panther has more bark than bite

By Michael Pessah
Collegian Staff

PANTHER
Directed by Mario Van Peebles with Marcus Chong, Courtney B. Vance
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Panther opens with newsreel footage of a sea of civil rights protesters swarming against a dark blue retaining wall of police. As those frayed, black and white images linger, the voice of Malcolm X swells in the background. For a brief moment, we are remind of the turbulence of the late '60s, and the bravery of those who made unimaginable risks for the sake of freedom. Then the documentary footage ends, and the film deflates.

Panther is directed by Mario Van Peebles (Posse), and is written by his father Melvin. One would think that the Mario and Melvin Van Peebles team would be a smart choice to craft a docudrama about the Black Panthers, a paramilitary black power organization based in Oakland, California. Melvin, once a pioneer of blaxploitation cinema, has published a book on the Panthers, named (logically enough) Panther. And Mario has showed unique prowess at making fresh, exciting period melodramas.

The Van Peebles, however, have never populated their films with complex characters, forsaking exposition for a fast–paced storyline. One wouldn't say that the Van Peebles' character development is sloppy, it is just efficient — the audience is told just enough information for the plot to continue lurching forward. This, of course, tends to create a dynamic exciting world of shallow characters that are narrowly defined as "good" or "bad." Which is why the Van Peebles' are perfect for Panther.

Panther's version of Oakland in the late '60s is one of a vibrant, turbulent Mecca. Bright colored cars zoom around as if they were stalking prey, natty hipsters jitterbug up and down the sidewalk, everyone is impeccably groomed and the police comb through the neighborhood like imperial storm troopers.

The Black Panthers emerge from these environs as a grass–roots political action organization. At the upper echelon of leadership was the pragmatic Bobby Sealle (Courtney B. Vance) and the trigger happy Huey Newton (Marcus Chong). Though the Panthers never backed away from a fight, their true power was drawn from their ability to contort the law against itself. Armed with both the weapons and the law, the Panthers began to represent an angrier, harsher, and some say more realistic alternative to the non– violent wing of the civil rights movement.

Though the film makes such a point of being historically accurate in that it often cuts from newsreel footage to recreated scenes, it does little to give you a sense of history. It reads like one of those "Illustrated Classics" comic books. Though one might get a glossy picture of Tom Sawyer painting that fence, one never gets the sense of a world that comes from reading the actual book.

Panther does a noble job of reenacting key events of the Black Panthers early history in an exciting, accessible format. But sometimes the sugarcoating can exceed the levels expected of Hollywood docudrama. How many musical interludes do we need in between violent scenes? Isn't violence supposed to be disturbing — especially when it is based upon real events? Judging by Panther's depiction, Oakland is a wonderful city burgeoning with costumed street musicians, each of which is more than willing to bust out into a G–Funk number whenever a member of the community dies.

Panther's key problem is its character development, or lack of it. For the most part, Panther doesn't even allot its character clichés instead it merely assigns people teams. By the middle of the movie, the entire cast had been divided into Panthers and "the men," as if that was the only distinction between people. Panther finally descends into a cinematic equivalent of "the shell game," in which any try to keep track of which generic, throw–away character is double crossing who.

The movie's lack of investment in its characters is also reflected in its lackadaisical moral attitude. Sure we know who the bad guys are — the cops shoot the family pet for chrissakes — but it does a poor job of exploring how the Panthers tried to walk a moral tightrope between self– defense and terrorism. When the Panthers finally decide to go on a police killing spree, the films only discussion of it is on a surface plot level. There is no discussion about the morality of the action (forget discussion, there aren't even facial cues!), there is simply some dissent about it causing the Panthers a strategic loss. Perhaps, It is the Van Peebles' way of letting us into the dehumanizing, nihilistic worldview that Panthers had developed (like the brutal Menace II Society), but somehow I am inclined to believe that the Van Peebles' didn't think it was very important.

Panther is a fast–paced, and somewhat educational movie about the beginning of the Black Panther party. Though its descent into melodrama is regrettable, it is to be expected. What is surprising is the poor quality of the melodrama — things just move too fast for the viewer to stop and get interested. Panther's cardinal sin, however, is its persistent avoidance of true conflict. Perhaps the film should have taken one of its character's own advice: "We need less singing, and more swingin'." C+ impressive 3.32 ERA in nine starts.

The other game pits No. 2 George Washington (27–23–1, 17–7 A–10) against the No. 3 seed St. Bonaventure, who stand at 21–21–1 with a 12–9 league mark. That one's first pitch is at 7:35 p.m. tonight.

The winner of the A–10 Tournament will play the MAAC champion for a bid to the NCAA Tournament.

UMass crushes the Crimson

The Minutemen routed Harvard in Cambridge on Wednesday night by a score of 16–5 to wrap up their regular season. UMass' Scott Barnsby, who finished the season as the A–10's ERA leader, picked up his fifth win with a five inning performance. The freshman allowed only two earned runs while scattering six hits.

Senior shortstop Mark Pileski (4-for-6, 2 doubles, 3 RBI) and first baseman Justin Kelly (4-for-5, 2 RBI) led the way for the UMass at the plate. The Minutemen led 4–3 after three innings and broke it open in the fourth with five runs. Designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo and Pileski each drove in a pair in the frame.

UMass added two more in the fifth as third baseman Ryan Thistle and second baseman Muchie Dagliere each plated a run. The Minutemen outhit Harvard 24–12 in the game.

in the region. Last year, the team won the region and went on to a 19th place rank at the nationals. This year, the women set their sights once again at the nationals and reached their goal with style.

"Three years ago, nobody knew about the UMass riding team," Cicciu said. "They went from nobody, to fifth in the nation out of 200 teams."

Teams finishing ahead of the Minutewomen at the nationals included in order of rank, Skidmore College, Tufts University, Findlay College, and Stonehill College.

The team may have had a remarkable showing all season and at the nationals, but that was not to be outdone by what the women did off the horses to get there.

There are no scholarship riders on this club and the university did not fund the trip to Colorado. The women worked hard all season to raise enough money, enabling them to compete for the Equestrian crown.

"Not only is this about riding," Cicciu said. "It is also about determination, good sportsmanship, and commitment; this is an exceptional team."

With the success of the team and the size of the UMass campus, Cicciu hopes the success of the team will attract new riders in the future.

"Winning is a potential source of promotion for the university," Cicciu said. "Everybody likes to be associated with success."

and George Washington.

The second varsity eight boat also enters the regatta with a No. 1 seed, and like the first boat, should be a force to reckon with. The boat consists of coxswain Chris Stafford with a crew of Emily Turner, Kathleen Durand, Jeanne Sussman, Allison Crawford, Amy Kenney, Jen Amigone, Leigh Twarog and Maury McCarthy. The second varsity eight boat looks to beat out the ranked schools in their bracket Ithaca, Ohio State, and George Washington.

Also entered in the regatta is the UMass lightweight eight boat consisting of coxswain Kathy Denardo and crew Tara Longpre, Nicole LaFreniere, Laurie Fyfe, Amy Coughlin, Meredith Lepore, Nancy Benson, Alison Sisitsky and Katie Flickenger. Like the other two boats, the lightweight eight is poised for success.

Rounding out UMass' entries in the regatta is the novice eightboat Coxswained by M.K. Ferrante crewed by Heather Putnam, Kristy Michalek, Cassa Hadley, Jess O'Brien, Amy Carpenter, Alisha Rutherford, Sarah McAuley and Beth Howe.

UMass coach Jim Dietz looks forward to the upcoming competition. "We're extremely nervous. The nervous anticipation is there, but that's why we have races, to see who's the fastest," said Dietz.

Jackson didn't try to fill his North Carolina jersey.

The Springfield Union–News reports that Jackson favors UNC if he qualifies academically, and UMass if he doesn't. Ironic since there'd be plenty of playing time in Wallace's wake but not behind Marcus Camby, if he stays.

Just wondering if Jackson knows something we don't.

• The best time to give up a ninth inning, game winning two–run homer? In a tie game with the man on base the previous pitcher's responsibility. Such was the scenario when Seattle's Ron Villone (UMass '92) served up a gopher ball to Rickey Henderson Wednesday, pinning the loss on Jim Converse. Welcome to the Show, Ron, Part II.

• Best Tale of Fans Heckling a Pitcher in the Fenway Park Bullpen Contest: Mike Brown's submission: to Converse: "Hey, throw some Chucks!"

My submission: After riding Texas Rangers' reliever Kenny Rogers (mostly for his name being that of a country music star) to the point he called on security to quiet the fans, Rogers enters the game and yields a game winning tater to Kevin Romine. Cast your ballot today.

• To the Jaspers: great run, guys. After a season opening ambush of my batting practice pitching, the Big Hurt came on and pained four straight lineups before expiring in round 2 of the playoffs versus the Beer Bellies.

• It's been written recently that Boston is one of few major league cities not afflicted by dwindling attendance, but there were a lot of invisible fans in Fenway Park Wednesday.

Can it be that the multitudes who have packed Fenway for years, whether the team was competitive or not, did so because the sport was an insignia of principle? I find that hard to believe. The Olde Towne Team is winning games but losing fans, no matter what is written.

The real test is this weekend when the hated Yankees, sporting their best roster in years, come to Boston.

• Attn. NBA lottery winner: With the No. 1 pick in the NBA draft, select Jerry Stackhouse.

• Attn. NBA franchise with the No. 9 selection: Do not pick Bob Sura, talented but selfish and predicted to go there by Prime Newsport draft "expert" Pete Setter Jr.

• I only have four lines left, so I can't spell out Juan Jose Chacon Quiros full name, but our Costa Rican Developing Nations editor is licking his chops for the May 28 soccer friendly between Costa Rica and the U.S., when rookie Kasey Keller will tend America's nets.

Bring back Tony Meola, this nation's top player.

ERA, 12 shutouts, 175 strikeouts in 188 innings) and Kristy Fuentes (18–4, 1.82 ERA) have had stellar years.

South Carolina enters with a 49–17 record (3–0 against FSU) while South Florida comes in with a 27–18 record.

South Carolina has four players hitting over .300 with Dana Palmer leading the way batting .370 and leads the team in homers with six. Sophomore Tina Plew is second on the team in hitting (.363) while leading the team in hits (77), doubles (20), triples (eight) and runs scored (51). Trinity Johnson (22–6, 0.63 ERA) and Darlene Gareis (22–10, 1.29 ERA) will lead the Lady Gamecocks on the mound.

South Florida will be led offensively by junior Eileen Leary who leads the Bulls in batting (.375), hits (54), doubles (10), RBI (30) and stolen bases (13). Senior hurler Kerin Dull (14–11) sports a 0.82 earned run average and has struck out 108 batters.

Your Horoscope
By Jeane Dixon

ARIES (March 21–April 19): Be careful how you spend your money. What seems like an ideal investment could prove unsound. Do not neglect your domestic obligations. A friend offers to pitch in and help with practical task.

TAURUS (April 20—May 20): Business meetings seem to fill your day. You are hard at work, pulling for all the things you want to accomplish. A fancy–dress event may be too formal for your taste; leave early.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20): An impulsive investment could come back to haunt you. Go slow. Your normally cautious approach works in your favor now. An intellectual debate will not resolve an emotional issue. Follow your intuition. Patience pays dividends.

CANCER (June 21–July 22): Adopting a more enlightened and cooperative attitude helps you build new bridges at work. Your resources will be put to better use when you become a team player. Choose a book over TV this evening.

LEO (July 23–Aug 22): Information that will help you launch a big project is as near as near s the telephone. Seminars and adult education programs are also a plus. Someone influential urges you to live up to your potential.

VIRGO (Aug 23–Sept. 22): Be willing to deal head–on with a matter that has been lurking in the back of your mind. Things will go better once you take direct action. A far–away romantic partner issues an invitation.

LIBRA (Sept 23–Oct 22): A trip is a distinct possibility this weekend. Something in your personal life compels you to reach out to people in a faraway place. Speak up. Make your wishes known to those in authority.

SCORPIO (Oct 23–Nov 21): You could receive a lucky career break today. Say "yes" to a challenging assignment. Shop for items that will make your home more comfortable and beautiful. Take along a friend who has good taste.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec 21): A business partnership could be great if you connect with the right person. Make sure your talents are complementary. A spur–of–the–moment gathering could be lots of fun. Keep the menu simple.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19): Business travel enjoys highly favorable influences. Your professional contacts are relying on you to share your insights at a seminar. If family values are important to you, set a good example for younger relatives.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18): An employer who wants to lure you away from your current position offers special perks. Weigh your options carefully. A business investment can pay off handsomely. Immerse yourself in fun tonight.

Minutemen ready for NCAAs

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow features a rubber match of sorts for the University of Massachusetts and Princeton University.

UMass whipped the basketball Tigers, who have a mythical past. The Minutemen lost to Princeton's hockey team, which has Jonathan Kelley.

At 2 p.m. Saturday, UMass' men's lacrosse team faces Princeton in a first round NCAA tournament game.

These Tigers have a national championship.

UMass is one of only two teams in the field of 12 that didn't make it last year, and it was chosen because it wasn't afraid to tangle with the best.

The Minutemen's record is 7–5, but five of its opponents reached the tournament, two more were ranked in the final USILA (United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association) poll, and UMass got quality wins over Hofstra and Notre Dame.

Princeton's post–season prospects were never in doubt. The Tigers went 10–3 and finished sixth in the final USILA poll.

UMass matched its output in its previous two games in the season finale, dispatching Army 18–6. Syracuse and Brown outscored UMass 31–15 in consecutive losses that hinged the Minutemen's tourney status to the game at West Point.

It wasn't so much a matter of quantity as quality in that drubbing, as UMass got goals from sources that had been shut off in recent weeks. Midfielder Buddy Hoffman, armed with a laser–beam shot but plagued by inaccuracy since a pair of two–goal performances early in the year at Virginia and Hofstra, rebounded with a four–goal, one–assist outing.

Senior attack Jeremy Murphy scored 14 goals in his first six games but only two in his next five before capping the year with five goals against the Cadets.

That sort of offensive balance is a potential key to a UMass victory tomorrow.

"When we get four or five goals from our midfield, we're doing O.K.," Cannella said. "It takes pressure off of [Brendan] Glass and [Mike] Valente, who we don't want to depend on too much, and it spreads out the defense."

Princeton's defense can be effective in any formation. It's led by 1994 All–American Todd Higgins, who leads the Tigers with 86 ground balls. Fellow seniors Nick Lane (second team All–Ivy League) and Josh Miller are dependable returnees from the championship team.

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team will have its hands full this weekend, when the Minutemen take on defending National Champion Princeton in the first round of the NCAA tournament this weekend.

But it's unwise to compare the Tigers of old with the new breed. Three of Princeton's top five scorers are freshmen.

"We hope they're not freshmen anymore," Princeton coach Bill Tierney said. "This is a very different team. Last year was very business–like, and if we hadn't won it all everyone would have been very disappointed. Now we're back to being very equal to a lot of teams in the tournament. But it's hard to say how they [the freshmen] will react [to playing in the NCAA tournament]."

Ivy League Freshman of the Year Jesse Hubbard set a school freshman record with 20 goals and proved a potent complement to top scorer Scott Conklin (28 goals), who also led the team in that department last season.

Sophomore Patrick Cairns will be in goal for the Tigers.

The same concerns about young players exist for UMass, making its return to the tournament after a one–year hiatus.

"At game time, they'll be nervous," Cannella said. "But it's good to be nervous. It shows you're preparing for the game. It's tough for the guys who don't have experience, but hopefully they'll be ready. We're not going down there to lose, because a goal for our program is getting to the second round and giving us a little reputation."

"If you had asked me at the start of the season if we'd make the tournament if we went 7–5, I would have said no," Cannella said. "But as the season progressed, the other teams that were on the bubble had played easy schedules, and that's what the committee looked at."

The game can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM, with pre– game coverage beginning at 1:50 p.m.

Rain delays play–in series

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The rain has come again.

The University of Massachusetts softball team's scheduled double–header against Canisius yesterday, which was to begin the best–of–three series for an NCAA tournament spot, was postponed until today.

At 3 p.m., the Minutewomen will meet the Golden Griffs in the first game of the best–of–three series, with the second game of the double dip at 5 p.m. If needed, the third game will be played tomorrow at noon, in between games of the Diamond Classic, a tournament UMass is hosting this weekend.

Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino is itching to get on the field.

"I want to play," she said. "The whole season comes to a head [today]."

As a matter of fact, Sortino said that she is not even thinking about the Diamond Classic.

"[The play–in series] is all that's on our mind. We know what we have to do. This is a great opportunity for us."

Sortino said that her team will have to be ready.

"We are going to need good execution and good defense," she said. "We'll have to hit when we need to, which is all the time, and we'll need to have good, solid pitching performances."

The Minutewomen will, of course, need good weather too.

"It's to everybody's benefit to play the most important game of the year with good weather," Sortino said.

If the play–in series is not decided in two games, then the times of the Diamond Classic tomorrow will be changed.

The Diamond Classic starts today with the first game at 9 a.m. pitting South Florida against Florida State. Following at 11 a.m. will be South Florida versus South Carolina and then at 1 p.m. will be South Carolina against Florida St.

The games tomorrow are scheduled to start at 10 a.m. with South Florida meeting South Caroline. At noon, South Florida meets up with UMass and following at 2 p.m., UMass would play Florida St. The final game of the day would be Florida St. against South Carolina at 4 p.m.

If there has to be a third game between UMass and Canisius, it will be at noon tomorrow after South Florida meets South Carolina at 10 a.m. Following the play–in game, Florida State would play South Carolina at 2 p.m. and UMass would play South Florida at 4 p.m.

On Sunday, UMass is scheduled to play South Carolina at noon and Florida St. at 2 p.m.

Florida St. will come into the Classic already with an automatic NCAA bid and with the best overall record of any of the four teams, as they are 53–11. The Seminoles have nine players batting over .300 and all three of their pitchers are in double figures in wins. Of the nine players batting over .300, only two of them are not everyday players. Cindy Lawton leads the team hitting with a .395 average, 79 hits, 40 runs batted in and 13 doubles. She has also smacked two home runs on the year. Kristy Hull is right behind Lawton with a .380 average, 78 hits, nine doubles and 29 RBIs. Shamalene Wilson leads the team in triples with 10 and holds the FSU record for career stolen bases (89).

Freshman Niki Zenger (0.72 earned run average) has been a perfect 12–0 on the mound for FSU while Renee Espinoza (23–7, 1.04

No. 1 UMass heads to A–10s

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

Senior pitcher Jay Murphy was named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year.

A–10 Pitcher of the Year. Bill Knight, senior rightfielder and Jay Murphy, ace righthander, won the respective awards for the 33–12 Minutemen, who own the conference's best record at 19–5.

Knight, who has etched himself in the record book as UMass' all time home run and RBI leader, led the league this year by smacking 16 round trippers and driving in 61 runs. He also batted a solid .374.

Murphy, a senior, was the anchor of a UMass staff that has the best numbers in the conference. He went 6–3 for the Minutemen while his 4.27 earned run average placed him in the conference's top ten. The workhorse also completed seven of his nine games started.

This will mark the second straight season the Minutemen enter the double elimination post season tournament at Bear Stadium in Boyertown, Pa. with the No. 1 seed. However, UMass coach Mike Stone's squad hopes the results will be much different this time around.

Last year, UMass was upset in game one by the No. 4 seed St. Bonaventure Bonnies, 2–1. They took the next game of the double elimination tournament 9–3 over Rutgers behind Murphy, but then were eliminated in their next game 4–2 by West Virginia.

This weekend the Minutemen will battle Rutgers (26–27, 13–11 A–10), this year's No. 4 seed, in game one today at 4:05 p.m. The Scarlet Knights, who were swept in a three game series by UMass at Earl Lorden Field in their only meeting of the year, have tradition on their side. Rutgers is the only A–10 team in league history to play in all 17 Atlantic 10 baseball championships. No matter the outcome, 1995 will mark the Scarlet Knights' last appearance in the tournament, as they will leave the A–10 in favor of the Big East Conference next year.

Rutgers is led by senior second baseman Brian Giallella, who paces the club with a .330 batting average and 19 doubles. Freshman Tom Phillips is the ace of the pitching staff. He posted a 4–4 record with an

Track hopes success continues at NEs

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

After a undefeated regular season, the University of Massachusetts outdoor track team began its postseason the best way possible, by taking home the Eastern Conference Championship.

This weekend it departs to Dedham to compete in the New England Championships. About 40 teams will take part and UMass coach Ken O'Brien figures to have his team somewhere near the top.

"We normally fall someplace in the fifth to 10th place range," O'Brien said. "That's where we have been and we have the same type of team."

The teams from the Ivy League are always near the top like Harvard, Yale, Dartmouth and Brown. Boston College, Boston University and UConn will also have strong teams and be a factor Saturday."

The number one reason for the success of the Minutemen this year is their depth. The Minutemen are competitive with more than one athlete in each event, yet have very few dominant performers. That, O'Brien feels, will make a difference as the team gets further and further into the championships.

"The guys who were placing second, third and fourth during the dual and tri–meets won't be getting the same places, as the more top flight runners from the other schools come in," O'Brien added. "So those points which had been piling up for us won't be there as we go further along."

Another reason O'Brien gives for the success is his graduating seniors. Not only for the points they have scored in their individual events, but the way they have influenced the underclassmen.

"We have great internal leadership within the team" O'Brien said. "The seniors are the leaders on this team. They are such an asset not only for the points they put on the board, but the fact that they are willing to rub shoulders with the younger guys on the track and on the bus."

One of those seniors, Tom Galligani will look to defend his title in the triple jump. Last year, he set a personal best at the New Englands with a leap of 47–feet–10–inches.

Many others including junior Ethan Nedeau, who won the 800m at Easterns last week, will move up to the 1500, which figures to be the most talent laden event, will be looking to put some points on the board during the meet.

Other Minutemen competing for places will be Marc Lefebvre (shot put), Ron Tauro (High Hurdles) and Scott Price (200 m).

Equestrian places fifth at Nationals

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts equestrian team trotted home from Colorado State University Tuesday, with a fifth place finish in the nation.

UMass qualified for the equestrian nationals after capturing the regional crown this spring, outdistancing its nearest competitor by a convincing 45 points.

At the nationals, points were awarded based on performance in eight classes, including open flat and jumping, intermediate flat and jumping, novice flat and jumping, the walk–trot canter, and the walk–trot.

The scoring system used for each competing team was seven points for first place, six points for second place, five points for third, right on down to one point for a sixth place finish.

The girls arrived in Colorado without their customary horses, and were able to overcome their new surroundings and mounts and ride away with success.

"It's not like a car where you just put your foot on the gas and it goes," UMass coach Wendy Cicciu said. "Horses are very sensitive and have their own personality and feel."

Contributing in the saddles for UMass were senior Janelle Parker, who finished ninth overall in the open jumping event, sophomore Colleen Hayduk placed sixth in the novice flat competition, sophomore Carrie Edgington was fourth at intermediate jumping and reserve champion at novice jumping, sophomore Jen Forkey represented UMass in the walk–trot canter and finished third, and a fine performance was turned in by freshman Erin Casey who was the walk– trot runner–up.

This season marks the third great season in a row for the Minutewomen riders. In 1993, the team finished third

Women's crew heads to Champion Regatta

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts undefeated women's crew puts its streak on the line Sunday as they travel to lake Quinsigamond in Worcester to compete in the Champion International Collegiate Regatta.

The Champion Regatta has only been in existence for three years, as it was created to limit the large number of crews that competed in the Dad Vail Regatta in Philadelphia. Until Champion, the Vails were the only regattas that schools who were not Division I or Ivy League could compete in. With the Introduction of Champion, the consistently stronger crews could be challenged while Division III schools got a chance to compete against crews of their own caliber.

Last year, the regatta was held in Virginia, where the Minutewomen did not fare as well as they would have liked. In UMass' first competition in the Champion, the Minutewomen captured gold medals in women's varsity eight and lightweight eight races, thus earning the women's points trophy. With the race returning to UMass' "home course" in nearby Worcester, the crew hopes to reclaim their dominance of the regatta.

The women's varsity eight boat consisting of Coxswain Dena Hiller with a crew of Nancy LaRoque, Deanna Groak, Jen Strong, Wendy Wilbur, Amanda Kraus, Jen Guidry, Michelle Borkhuis and Michelle Tullie are seeded first in the regatta. Rounding out the top ranked crews in the regatta are University of Virginia, Georgetown, Navy, Temple,

• From 45 to 23. I guess that proves Michael Jordan's still more than half the player he was. (Hey, Candice, this is my column.) Indeed it is, and here's what I say: if the Chicago Bulls win their fourth NBA Championship in five years, it makes the Houston Rockets' 1994 flag appear as an aberration. That would be the only time in recent memory that a team whose best player was a center won it all.

They have a long way to go, and David Robinson's San Antonio Spurs are the team to beat, but MJ was his old unstoppable self Wednesday.

• I know I'm one of few who has complaints about the Mullins Center, but I have none in regard to its service as a backdrop for Earl Lorden Field. Many of you have seen the view, the baseball team sees it every day, but it is a perfect configuration. I'd like to see it pictured in media guides and UMass brochures as much as that shot of the Old Chapel from across the campus pond.

• That reminds me, The Boston Globe has only stepped backward in its attempt to dispel the notion it is anti–UMass. Bob Monahan, an award winning college sports reporter, congratulated Bill Knight for tying the school home run record days after he broke it. Wake up, Bob.

In a Sunday Magazine piece on the musical group Phish, the author mentioned its sold out show at the Mullen Center.

I don't think any Globe stories would mention Boston College's trip to the Sweet Sixteen last year or the Conti Forum or Kelly Rink.

I now return this battle to its rightful litigants, UMass alum Gerry Callahan of Sports Illustrated and the Globe's Bob Ryan, a BC boy.

• It wasn't surprising that Rasheed Wallace turned pro, but it would be if Winchendon Prep's Randell

Deadly Ebola virus spreads across Zaire 48 killed by disease

By Karin Davies
Associated Press

KIKWIT, Zaire — One Zairian scientist, on hand when Ebola was isolated 20 years ago, doesn't believe assurances the latest outbreak was caught soon enough to stop its spread.

This city of 600,000 people is quarantined, its schools and clinics closed, airline flights canceled. Families receive bodies of Ebola victims in sealed coffins and are ordered not to open them.

The World Health Organization, which says 48 people have died, and the charity Doctors Without Borders say the virus can be stopped before the death toll goes much higher.

But people are sneaking into Kikwit's unguarded hospital to visit dying loved ones and possibly carrying the virus when they leave, said Jean Jacques Muyembe, a University of Kinshasa professor.

Muyembe was in the village of Yambuku, along the Ebola river that gave the virus its name, when the contagion was isolated there in 1976.

"The difference is, Yambuku is in a forest with a sparse population," Muyembe said. "This is more serious because it is in a city of a half a million. The possibility of expansion is tremendous."

There is no vaccine or cure for Ebola, which kills 80 percent of those who contract it, often within days. Victims die with blood pouring from their eyes, ears and noses.

Nearly two–thirds of the victims reported so far worked in Kikwit's hospital, including three Italian nuns ministering to the poor.

Accounts of the death toll vary. Dr. Julia Weeks, an American on a health committee of Zairian and foreign officials, gave a lower death toll than WHO, saying today that 35 people have died and another 15 are ill.

"There appears to have been a decline in the number of cases being reported. That could be a good sign, but it's too early to know," Weeks said.

WHO plans to begin on Sunday tracing contacts of people who have died or become ill, to find whether the virus has spread.

Dr. Ebrahim Samba, WHO's director for Africa, expressed confidence today that health experts intervened early enough to contain the disease.

Marcus Camby to return to UMass this fall

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

After much speculation and uncertainty, Massachusetts center Marcus Camby said he will remain at the University of Massachusetts for his junior season.

The official word was not available at press time, since the deadline was at 11:59 p.m. last night for all early entries to declare for the NBA draft. However, the Hanford Courant reported Saturday that Camby will be staying put.

"The fact that so many underclassmen came out pretty much helped me make up my mind," Camby told the Courant.

"I'm happy with my decision. And next year, I could be the No. 1 or No. 2 pick if I work hard."

Since his decision was to stay in school, Camby did not need to call a press conference. Massachusetts coach John Calipari said last Thursday Camby "doesn't owe anybody an announcement. He may just let it pass, and act like he was thinking about it."

Several times Camby noted the factors in making his decision. For instance, Camby told WBZ–TV Boston last Wednesday that he could use another year to bulk up, and he could benefit from staying. Camby nonetheless refrained from giving an answer until Saturday.

Camby's actions regarding his student status added to the speculation. He attends classes regularly, and the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported on Thursday that he registered for classes next fall.

Camby noted the need to strengthen his 6–foot 10–inch, 215–pound frame for the rigors of the NBA.

Cultural centers utilized by variety of UM students

By Sanuber Denizmen

A survey conducted by Project Pulse on December 13, 1994 examined the use of minority cultural centers and academic advising programs.

The survey revealed the fact that African, Latino, Asian, and Native American (ALANA) students' use of the centers and special advising programs varied according to their racial and ethnic backgrounds.

Project Pulse conducted the survey for Rick Townes, the assistant vice chancellor for Campus Activities, said Gary Malaney, the director of Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems (SARIS), the survey's sponsor.

The study was an attempt to see what percentage of students used different services. "The big interest was to see which racial ethnic groups took advantage of specific services," said Malaney.

The survey showed that some of the services or centers are less visible or even unknown to some students, Malaney said.

The Malcolm X Center was the most visited cultural center, according to the survey. More than one–fifth of the students reported visiting the Malcolm X Center five or more times during the semester. The United Asia Cultural Center and The Office of Third World Affairs (now Office of ALANA Affairs) followed Malcolm X Center in popularity.

More than half of the students surveyed were unaware of the Josephine White Eagle Native American Cultural Center, the Anacoana Cultural Center and the Sylvan Cultural Center.

Given the differing orientations of cultural centers, the racial and ethnic composition of each of the centers differs substantially, according to the survey. For example, nearly three–quarters of the students who visited the Martin Luther King, Jr. Center were African–American compared to only six percent of Asian–Americans and three percent of Latinos.

Each academic program was differently utilized by ethnic and racial grouping, as was the case with the centers.

Students were asked to indicate the number of times they had visited each of the five academic advising programs, which are Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Minority Students (CCEBMS), Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP), United Asia Learning Resource Center (UALRC), the Minority Engineering Program (MEP), and the Minority Management Program (MMP).

CCEBMS was the most known program — one–third of the students surveyed reported to have utilized the program, and three–quarters of the students who had visited CCEBMS are African–American, while 17 percent were Latino and seven percent were Asian–American.

The UALRC and BCP followed CCEBMS. Both were visited by more than one–fifth of the students surveyed. Nearly all the students who used the UALRC were Asian–American and more than four–fifths of students that employed the BCP were Latino.

More than half of the students surveyed were unfamiliar with the MMP and only one–tenth of the students had utilized the MEP.

Panel discusses privatization on UMass campus

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

An open forum titled "Teach–In" was held Thursday night at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center to inform students, faculty, staff and community members about what economic developments of the University mean for them.

"We realized that the student body has not been adequately informed about the economic issues concerning the University," said Wade Sanders, a member of the Alliance for Student Power (ASP), the group that organized the event.

Three panelists discussed privatizing the Campus Center before a question and answer period took place.

Marc Kenen, representing the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy organization (SCERA), Bob Joyce, representing the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees organization (AFSCME), and Jeanine Maland, representing the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), participated in the panel.

The panelists agreed the food services in the Campus Center are losing large sums of money because of poor management, but bringing in corporations will not solve the problem. They urged people to educate themselves about an issue before taking action to improve a situation.

Kenen, who has researched on the subject, spoke about the national context of the University's situation. He said the recession of 1987 and 1988 caused a "dramatic change in the culture of American education as well as American business where the motto and the key became downsizing."

Downsizing

Downsizing led to a huge number of layoffs across the American manufacturing and service industry, which has led to a change in how American business is run, said Kenen.

"Corporate America is showing some of the healthiest profit margins that they have ever shown in their history," said Kenen.

Seeing large profits made by corporations, mainstream media has reported this was a good move, and that corporations did the right thing. This action by the media has placed traumatic downward pressure on people's wages, said Kenen.

Kenen said the management culture that now exists advocates making profits by firing as many people as possible, and cutting benefits and wages.

The connection between the national context and UMass is that this management culture is "making its way into the management ideology of public higher education," According to Kenen, it is this ideology upon which the University's "Hooker Plan" is based.

Kenen said UMass President Michael K. Hooker says this new plan could save the University up to $20 million. He pointed out that the money saved would be $20 million worth of jobs.

Joyce said the plan to privatize the Campus Center will effect people working for the University. He said the logic behind this idea involves a very small group of people making money.

Joyce said the Campus Center was built with taxpayers' money to provide services for the middle class, "yet they are trying to bring corporations in here ... so that they can exploit a captive market and make a better profit margin."

Bringing corporations into the Campus Center will not improve the services, said Joyce.

"[Corporations] aren't coming in with any altruistic motives ... [Corporation managers won't] care whether [their corporation is] fulfilling the functions to the campus community that the taxpayers presumably intended it would when they spent their money to build the place," said Joyce.

Student finds voice, works to educate

Robyn Novick has never been one to follow the crowd. She "grew up with a strong feminist ideology" which led her to intern her senior year of high school for the former president of the National Organization of Women instead of taking regular classes.

When Novick graduated from high school she decided she would take a year off before going to college, and said she "felt it was time to move on."

Her decision was to travel to Israel and live on a kibbutz, a commune–like society, for a year.

Novick, originally from Maryland, said she found a "sense of identity" while in Israel and was there mainly because she wanted to continue learning Hebrew. In the kibbutz she recalled "feeling in the mainstream" and "in a Jewish state."

Within the same year, she also decided to participate in the March of the Living in Poland with 12,000 other

Clinton repeats threat of sanctions

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A determined President Clinton said Saturday he's tired of "hitting a brick wall" in trying to open Japanese markets to American autos. He promised to press ahead with proposed sanctions against Tokyo.

"We are prepared to act and we will act soon if we must," Clinton said in his weekly radio address.

Clinton renewed the threat of sanctions even as the dispute with Japan threatened to escalate into a full–scale trade war. Japanese officials are warning they might retaliate against proposed U.S. sanctions with punitive measures of their own.

Earlier this week, Clinton ordered an unfair trade complaint filed against Japan with the new World Trade Organization and authorized publication of a list of punitive tariffs against Japanese automobiles and parts.

"We don't want a trade conflict with Japan, but we won't hesitate to fight for a fair shake for American products," Clinton said.

He said the United States had made considerable progress over the past two years in opening Japanese markets to a range of American goods and services from apples to telecommunications equipment.

"But when it comes to selling cars and auto parts to Japan, we are still hitting a brick wall," he complained. "We've been hitting that brick wall long enough. Now we must act to protect and create American jobs."

Foreign manufacturers make up about 30 percent of the American market for cars and car parts, but just four percent of Japan's market, he said.

Clinton said that increasing American auto sales in Japan would have a positive ripple effect throughout the U.S. economy, and also benefit Japanese consumers "who today pay much higher prices because of their trade barriers."

"Opening Japan's markets is a win–win situation for everyone," Clinton said. "But old habits and entrenched interests die hard." He said that 20 months of talks between U.S. and Japanese negotiators had failed to produce results, leading to the administration's threat of punitive sanctions.

While the president kept up the tough talk, there were indications of ongoing efforts to resolve the dispute through negotiations.

Commerce Secretary Ron Brown has told Japanese officials he wants to meet Trade Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto in Paris to try once again to resolve the dispute, according to a report Saturday. Brown asked to meet Hashimoto when the two attend a multilateral meeting of economic ministers on May 23-24, said Kyodo News Service, quoting unnamed officials of the Ministry of International Trade and Industry.

Jews from around the world. The walk is the traditional death march from Auschwitz to Birkenau that concentration camp inmates were forced to endure.

"What disturbed me the most were the Polish people from surrounding towns that came to watch ... they were just staring," Novick said.

While at the camps, Novick took pictures which she presented as a photo exhibition as part of a Holocaust memorial service at the State House on April 26.

She said she felt it was important for her to voice what she had seen because she was "silenced by the vastness of what I saw, and recognized it as something more natural."

From these experiences she was drawn to focusing on Judaic Studies, and became involved in Hillel. She said while at the University of Massachusetts she "wanted to speak out, act — to do, [because] women within Judaism are silent."

Novick said her strongest attribute is her voice and feels "silence is a killer." She urges everyone to speak out because "any form of oppression disturbs me."

In addition to academics and activism, Novick works as a cook in Butterfield, at Lots For Littles in Amherst Center, and has tutored in Hebrew.

Novick's accomplishments have been recognized by the campus community. She is the recipient of a Senior Leadership Award and a senior award from Hillel.

Her plans for the future?

"Maybe work for a Jewish/feminist group or get a law degree protecting Jewish issues."

Currently Novick is working on two independent studies, one of which is about women on kibbutz and the other is about women and the Holocaust.

Novick is graduating this May after only three years of college. She has a double major in Judaic Studies and Women's Studies and a minor in anthropology.

She said she is going to take her LSATs and apply to law school, but will first take a year off. After graduation she is moving to California and then going to Europe to travel. Novick said she is thinking about doing volunteer work to "gain some valuable experience."

actual plan as a first step towards action, citing passages from the draft of Scott's strategic plan.

"He says in the beginning that the changes that are taking place right now on this campus are inevitable and inescapable. We certainly challenge those assumptions," she said.

Maland asked the audience what the mission of the University was. Phillip Copeland, an ASP member replied that its mission "is to provide affordable public education."

She said she has read many of the plans and has found that none of the plans said the mission of the University is to provide affordable public education.

The mission of University officials is to run on as small a state budget as possible, said Joyce, citing President Hooker's "Plan for the Year 2000."

"We are already in the third year of ['Plan for the Year 2000']," Maland said.

Maland said University officials want UMass to become a member of the Association of American Universities, but to do this UMass must become more science-oriented.

This will push applied research on the campus, which will allow the University to patten and license the information and therefore make money, said Maland.

According to Maland, if the University becomes scientifically oriented the humanities will be affected. Teaching assistantships for the humanities will be cut while new scientific teaching assistantships will be added, she said.

The research done by people in the humanity departments is not profitable, as research on homelessness, poverty, unemployment and AIDS will be cut, said Maland.

Student actors teach on sex, related issues

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

Each semester Not Ready for Bedtime Players, the peer health sex education theater troupe on campus, educates UMass students about issues surrounding sexual activity by performing new and revised skits.

"We've expanded the show to include other topics besides safer sex and communication. Now we include topics like sexuality for the physically challenged, female masturbation, and bisexuality," said staff advisor for the troupe, Sally Damon.

Not Ready for Bedtime Players operates through the Health Education Office at University Health Services. Originally named The AIDS Follies, the troupe's creation in 1988 was the University's way of responding to the AIDS crisis and the lack of available information on campus, according to the troupe's playbill.

"Through theater we educate on issues of safer sex, homophobia, AIDS awareness and sexuality," said Patrick Keating, a Not Ready for Bedtime Player: member.

This semester's performances included five new skits written by members of the troupe, said Vicki Teal, a Not Ready for Bedtime Players member who is in charge of dramatics and casting.

Each new skit addresses a specific issue: "Campus Cruise," written by Daymion Smith, is about bisexuality; "For Friends and Family," written by Erica Millner, is about coming out to loved ones; "Shades of Gray," written by Sonia Paz and Rob McGill, is about inter-racial relationships; "Pop A Wheelie," written by Patrick Keating, is about sexuality and the disabled; and "Masterpieces," written by Erica Millner and Daymion Smith, is about masturbation.

Some of the other skits address issues like rape, what to do when a condom breaks, gay and lesbian sex, the correct vs. the wrong ways to put on a condom, pregnancy, male virginity, the importance of discussing sexual history with a partner, STDs, and the effects of having sex when intoxicated.

"I thought [the program] was wonderful, funny and entertaining. The skits were not real subtle. I was most impressed by how [the troupe] dealt with diversity issues like GLB, disability, and racial issues. I was also impressed with how they dealt with the issue of abstaining from sex," said Alison Roberts, a senior BDIC major who saw a recent performance in Brett House.

Not Ready for Bedtime Players has 13 student performers. They perform throughout the semester in residence halls across campus.

The troupe is asked by other colleges and high schools to come and perform for students, said Damon. "We go off campus twice a year, but our primary focus is to work on our own campus," she said.

In addition to acting, every member of Not Ready for Bedtime Players has specific tasks to accomplish. These tasks include: publicity, props, gathering evaluation results from the audience, archiving information, educating the members about the latest facts and issues concerning sex, drama, casting, discussing group dynamics with Marni Schilken, the graduate advisor, and writing, said Teal.

"Auditions for interested students are held in May or September. No theater experience is needed, but students must be energetic, they must have a desire to educate about sexuality issues, and they must be available for all training and performances," said Damon.

The department of Spanish and Portuguese recently announced three University of Massachusetts graduate students as recipients of the Fulbright Award for Hispanic Research.

Janine M. Fuller, a Ph.D. student in the department of Spanish and Portuguese, will spend the 1995-96 academic year in Spain at the University of Oviedo as part of her Fulbright Fellowship. Her work will consist of transcribing one of the earliest known sixteenth century chivalric novels.

Upon completion, the transcription will be published by the seminary of Medieval Studies at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Karen Graubart, a Ph.D. candidate in the department of Economics, was awarded a Fulbright for the research she conducted on indigenous women in the economy of early colonial Perú.

She has plans to study at the Catholic University in Lima in collaboration will Peruvian historian Franklin Pease.

Ann Jefferson, a Ph.D. candidate in the department of History, received the award for the research she compiled in Guatemala for her dissertation.

She will return to Guatemala to write a social history of the peasants living in the country's eastern highland, focusing on their participation in the 1837 popular uprising led by Rafael Carrera.

She will collect materials for her research at the Archivo General de Centro América and the Archivo de la Curia in Guatemala City.

Senior Leadership Awards announced

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

Last Sunday 60 seniors received the 1995 Senior Leadership Award from the Office of Alumni Relations at a luncheon in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The award was created in 1989 "to recognize graduating seniors who had demonstrated outstanding leadership and service to the University community," said Karen Drumm, the assistant director of alumni relations.

Seniors must be nominated by faculty, staff or other students for this honor.

"I think it's wonderful that people take the time and think highly enough of our students to nominate them," said Paul Vasconcellos, who has been a member of the selection committee since 1989.

He said he was "incredibly impressed with the quality of the leadership activities that the recipients are involved in."

No limit is set on the number of people who can receive the award. Nominations for seniors are excepted from all majors, said Drumm.

In addition to being in good academic standing, Senior Leadership Award recipients have "distinguished themselves through important contributions to their campus jobs, organizations, departments of major study and overall public and community service," according to the luncheon handbill.

Drumm said seniors are often surprised when they are informed that they have been given the award.

"It is nice for the Univcrsity to recognize the work that students do for the University, though it may not necessarily be academic," said Miluska Garcia-Diaz, a psychology major and award recipient.

"I was definitely honored. I didn't think I had a chance at winning because UMass is so large; I thought there had to be people with better credentials than me," said Ben Albert, another recipient of the award.

Commenting on the importance of the award, Drumm said, "In such a large place as UMass not every leader gets the recognition they deserve. This program is meant to support the recognition of campus leaders before they graduate."

Taking advantage of UMass

Sandy Bogage

As a wide–eyed freshman at UMass — oh, excuse me ... — as a first–year student at UMass, I only had one major goal. Call me a realist, but I did not want to set my sights on something that I could never achieve. My goal was to see, try and learn as many things as were physically possible. Beginning at orientation, I was told that it was impossible to take advantage of every program, club, sport and activity that this school had to offer. I am certainly no exception to that rule, but I put up a good fight.

I came here from a town smaller than this University, entering as a math major with the larger plan of becoming a high school teacher. After roughly one semester I realized I needed to find something else to study. It wasn't the studying that I minded so much, but I didn't appreciate the time constraints that doing math problems put on my social life. I decided that since it was socializing that I liked so much, I would study that instead of math. It was a good plan, but I didn't leave myself any time for relaxation. I majored in leisure activities, and I "studied" all the time. In retrospect, this was a small price to pay for the wealth of one–time opportunities and experiences that I was smart enough to seize.

At the end of my first semester, I was spotted and picked up by the UMass Crew Club. Finally, a sport where it was actually good to weigh only 120 pounds. I became the coxswain of the heavyweight men's boat, which meant I had to yell continuously for up to 20 minutes while eight large men put themselves through the painful pleasure of rowing. I've seen the sun rise on the Connecticut River and I've rowed at night on the Charles River in Boston, using the city lights as our guide. I rowed for about two years before my growth spurt and my acquired taste for beer added a few inches in every direction.

Sophomore year I moved from Orchard Hill to a sixth floor penthouse room in Van Meter. It was a small floor with six rooms, an RA who was graduating and the most amazing sunsets I have ever seen. I could go on, but this is a newspaper, so suffice it to say we once woke up an RA two floors below. By the end of that year I had lived with an engineering major, an art major and few of the ever– present undecided majors — I was a member of the last category. Although I was still studying socializing, UMass was not offering a degree in that particular area. Luckily, somebody introduced me to STPEC (Social Thought and Political Economy) and I found a major that enhanced my vocabulary without stifling my creativity. Many of the larger social problems (the dreaded "ism's") created are re–enforced in individual daily social interactions, and one thing STPEC taught me was how to recognize and understand this unfortunate, but inherent relationship.

Junior year I moved off campus, where my backyard turned into a path up Mt. Norwottock. This was also the year that I left UMass for one semester on the National Student Exchange. My friend and I drove out to New Mexico for a change of scenery and some new experiences. The University of New Mexico was definitely a different place in many ways, but by the end I was missing home. I never quite felt right there because I couldn't use the word "wicked" in normal everyday conversation; not to mention the fact that they still serve coffee and soda in Styrofoam cups.

Now I'm back at UMass, living in the same house way out and across from Atkins Fruit Bowl. There isn't much left that I haven't done; I even have a class at Hampshire this semester. Senior year is flying by far too quickly, and I have developed the problem of only being able to be in one place at a time. Lately when I walk into the Bluewall I am surrounded by new and unfamiliar faces. It makes me sad to see so many people who I will never get to meet and talk to, which is one of the reasons I am writing this. I have spent the last four years collecting data, so call this my lab write– up.

Excuse the cliche, but words cannot describe what four years at UMass has contributed to my life. I hate to burst any bubbles, but there aren't many universal truths, except maybe that you never know half of the people at your own parties. Just remember, you can sleep or shower any time, but you have one chance to live life, so don't waste it getting ready.

Sandy Bogage is a Collegian staff member.

Taking center stage to an empty hall

Nathan Crick

I kept seeing this book.

A friend of mine told me to read it. Someone told my roommate to read it. I saw it on a few bedroom floors. It sat comfortably on the bestseller shelves in its placid green cover, taunting me. Read me, it whispered. Everybody's doin' it. Finally I got hold of a copy, and stayed up for five hours reading it straight through on a Tuesday night.

I may not be a professional critic just yet, but The Celestine Prophesy by one James Redfield is quite possibly the most poorly written, simplistic, self–promoting and ridiculously incompetent books I have ever had the misfortune to read. For those of you who missed it, Mr. Redfield developed a theory of how the human race is to evolve to a higher consciousness by our following his nine insights, (which he also helps teach through his instruction tape for only $9.95) and he puts these teachings in the form of a story about some idiot who runs around Peru bumping into philosophical strangers.

This is the number one bestseller in our country.

If I were to write a popular Bible for America, however, I do not think it could get much better. Everything we have become as a society is wrapped up in the success James Redfield's well–intentioned but child–like book.

It would be easy for me to sit here and call everybody ignorant and gullible for making this book a bestseller, and to an extent I have been doing that for a few years in relation to many other topics. The power of condemnation to make oneself feel good is all too available in this forum I have been provided. "They [being everybody but me and my friends] are stupid lemmings [animal analogy always helps] who are driving the country to ruin." Well, I am part of this place as well. I read the damn book too.

What is a little more difficult is to see why we have made James Redfield a new prophet, and even inspired him to spawn a sequel and a new set of merchandise. It is not because we are stupid, and it is not because we are sheep. It is because we are, at the most basic level of our emotions, unsatisfied and frustrated. We all know there is something wrong, and so we're reaching for something to give us hope. It doesn't matter if it's a book that claims to hold the key to human evolution, or if it's David Koresh pretending to be Jesus, or if its a bunch of middle–class men in fatigues yelling at the government. It is all a sign of our desperation, which has advanced far beyond being the quiet variety that Thoreau had once envisioned.

However, the only thing that Redfield's book has provided is yet another outlet for people to plug into and receive their weekly input of prepackaged inspiration. It is hope in a bottle, that tastes good but goes right through you.

In this culture of things, we are bombarded every day by convincing lies of need. You need this car. You need this job. You need this sex. You need this power. You need this lie. We are brought up saying "I want" as we grasp our chubby fingers up at the action figure with battle grip, and even though we age and our tastes change, we still are remain essentially stuck in the toy isle. It becomes so pervasive that we eventually forget what we really do need, and what we even value. So in our confusion we try to fill ourselves up with more things, called ideologies. Then we don't even have to decide what to believe anymore, let alone what we desire.

But it doesn't work. It leaves us with a house full of used things that keep going obsolete. It leaves us staring at an empty screen that slowly ceases to be funny. It leaves us with a festering soul, full of rusty joints and a plastic heart. Then we don't know what else to do, because the inspiration inside just won't work anymore. That's when we learn to hate, and learn to blame, and learn simply not to give a damn.

This isn't what this country should be. I have known too many good people for me to really believe that we will keep letting this happen, and yet it does. We continue to hide behind our labels, and cower within our fashions and our things, and point fingers out of different colored sheets and cry "It's their fault!" No, it's not their fault. It's our fault, because we don't care enough to really change.

We should demand more than James Redfield and his six word vocabulary to give us hope. Nobody has the answers to your life written in a book, or spoken in a lecture, or flashed on a Nike commercial, or even spewed out in an editorial. The only thing they can do is get you to look for them. Do the rest yourself, when all the crowd has gone home.

Not really caring anymore

Dave Copeland

While everybody else in this school seems to be stuck in an endless soap opera, my life is a comic strip.

A damn funny comic strip.

I have spent four years watching people bug out over exams, protests to change the unchangeable, and turn seemingly minor problems into the crisis of the day. Through all of the moaning, groaning and crappy attitudes that surround me, I have been laughing.

Laughing at you.

Finals week is bearing down on us and without a doubt all any of us will be hearing for the next two weeks is "Oh my God! I have two finals, three papers and blah, blah, blah."

Don't bother telling me. I don't care. In fact, if that sounds familiar (as in you've uttered a similar phrase before), do everybody a favor and shut up.

Don't forget that there's still another week for your rallies, protests and whining. There's still another week to write letters to the Collegian to tell them what an insensitive bastard Dave Copeland is.

Save your energy and your ink. I don't care.

I haven't made it through four years at this second rate University by getting outraged at every petty issue and jumping on every band wagon. If I had, you'd be reading my obituary for a heart attack as opposed to my column.

Why am I writing this? Because nearly everybody I have met at UMass needs to lighten up and realize that they are one of a zillion people in the world.

Especially you.

A few weeks ago my roommate Mike did a commendable thing. He blew off studying for two exams and went to have a few drinks and see They Might Be Giants at Pearl Street.

The human condition in an exploding universe would not have been affected one iota if Mike had passed those two exams. Conversely, the same human condition in the same exploding universe would not have been affected by the same iota had he failed those two exams.

But Mike's own life is a lot better because he created a memory in the closing weeks of his academic career that will last a lot longer than his ability to conjugate the Spanish verb "hablar."

Over the past year I've written a handful of columns that have been considered "controversial." But if I had actually spent a considerable amount of time hung up on the myth that I am the center of the universe, they would have never been written. That's what happens when you spend too much time worrying about what other people think of you and not enough time worrying about what you think about you.

As humans we are so hopelessly self–centered that to laugh at ourselves is to surrender you're own pride. To accept the fact that somebody actually does have a problem worse than your own measly final exam is to belittle yourself and the amount of sympathy you get for your problem.

Last weekend my world was coming to an end. I didn't have a place to live next fall, a semester's worth of procrastinating was coming to an end and I realized that I was so incredibly in debt that the unlikely prospect of winning the lottery was all that would save me.

I headed to the Spoke where I usually like to forget my problems and was all set to go into tirade about how screwed I was to my friend Katy. That was when I noticed on the wall a sign about a seven–year–old New Hampshire boy who is trying to break the world's record for get–well cards sent to him because he is dying.

Dying.

Right then I realized if I ended up living in prison next fall because of bad credit, if I were to fail every class I am taking this semester, if I were to die of liver poisoning because of too many nights spent drowning my problems and fears at the Spoke, I would have at least had 15 more years of life that a small New Hampshire boy is hopelessly fighting for right now.

And that is why I don't care.

The "pride" in pride events

Wendy Darling

As May and June arrive and the traditional pride march season begins, I am more motivated than ever to speak out to the rest of this campus, this state, this country, and the world and say that I am proud to be part of the lesbian, bisexual, gay and transgender community.

Walking around downtown Northampton after this year's LBGT pride march, I couldn't help but be swollen with pride and simple thankfulness that I have had the opportunity to experience the love and friendship of this diverse community.

People in Pulaski Park were jubilant as they arrived to rally for LBGT rights and happiness. They danced, shouted, and hugged one another in sheer joy. Little kids hugged their mommies and drag queens blew kisses to strangers.

I don't know about other people, but for me, the greatest thing about pride events is that for a brief moment, I get to feel good about myself. Nobody is putting me down or ignoring my needs. People celebrate my life and the lives of my friends and make us feel that we are worthwhile as human beings.

This is not to say that I feel rotten about myself or experience homophobic violence outside of pride events, but on a day–to–day basis, my experience is less than ideal.

I am constantly on–guard for homophobic comments, articles, and glances. I am constantly searching for others who feel like I do and will identify with my interests and concerns. I am constantly searching for places where I can be open about myself and be greeted with open arms.

It's different at pride events. When I look around me, I find people looking at me without judgement. That's something I haven't really been able to experience since I came out to myself two years ago. What a treat for me to experience that confident feeling that I'm being judged for what I am, not for the things I'm not.

I know there are some people who will read this and tell me that I'm just insecure. "You must hate what you are if you're so insecure you have to hold a rally about it," they'd say.

Yeah, right, I'm Insecure. I don't know for sure, but I think they'd be pretty insecure if they knew that they could get harassed or beat up for simply being themselves. I bet they'd be in need of some affirmation after having politicians and religious crazies and even supposedly reasonable people bash them on TV or at big homophobic rallies.

Once or twice a year, I go to a pride event and take a vacation from homophobia, and it gets these people really mad, mostly because they feel left out from the fun.

For once in their lives, these people are confronted with a club they can't join. No hugs or kisses or big rainbow flags for them; all they get is their homophobic signs and scowling faces.

Somewhere in their minds, they realize that in the area of pride, they have no power, no voice. Maybe they can beat us up in back alleys and toss us out of the military, but when it's a parade or a festival, they can't do anything to stop us.

We are strong and we are proud, and until we can get everyone to perly together, we'll have our own parties.

I'll be there.

Letters to the Editor

Response to "nonsense" letter

To the editor:

As faculty, staff and graduate students of the Department of Psychology, we wish to raise our strong objections to the letter written by Helen Cullen in the May 2 issue of the Collegian.

The letter provides a nonsensical historical theory that purports to explain the source of much of the world's problems in terms of ancient Jewish writings.

Attributing her sources to "I am told," the writer makes a series of historical and factual errors that would be comical had they not been used by her as the basis for an anti–Semitic tirade.

Such venomous attacks on a minority group represent an affront to a college community that seeks to provide an atmosphere of civility and rationality. The comments deserve condemnation from the entire University community.

Spring Concert '95 heats up campus lawn

SPRING CONCERT '95
Campus Pond lawn
May 14

DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN

Blues Traveler excited the sun–drenched crowd at yesterday's Spring Concert.

Although the sun couldn't decide whether to shine or hide behind the masses of clouds that filled the sky, thousands packed the lawn yesterday for Spring Concert '95, turning the campus pond lawn into a virtual sea of bodies, hacky sacks, and sun–burned skin.

Opening the show on the right foot, and setting the tone for the "fun in the sun" motif that the Concert is supposed to promote, local faves Knuckle Sandwich took stage. Though only a handful of people were in attendance during the quintet's set, the band threw themselves into their performance, working the crowd with their goofy style and uncategorized sound.

Dressed in everything from red capes to full Pee–Wee Herman attire (including plastic Pee–Wee Herman mask), Knuckle Sandwich bounced energetically across the stage, touching on everything from punk rock to ska to hip–hop. Highlights included the absolutely brilliant, ska–tinged cover of mope gods Joy Division's "Love Will Tear Us Apart" (flushed out by the group's brand new horn section, Brass Knuckles) and the band's now infamous anthem "K–Mart Shoppers."

Unfortunately, after Knuckle Sandwich left the stage they took most of the spirit of originality with them as the aftermath of "grunge" reared its ugly head in the form of Machinery Hall. The Boston trio banged out a set of polished, alternative–by–numbers rock that at times was reminiscent of Screaming Trees, Pearl Jam, Alice In Chains ... you know the rest.

Without the local status of Knuckle Sandwich or the drawing power of the national acts, Machinery Hall never worked up enough momentum to reach the crowd beyond a complete standstill (at one point they actually asked the audience if "they were alive"! Although kicking their set off with an eerie tape loop of spooky baby talk and reverberated guitar hardly seems to fit with the spirit of a "spring" concert, Throwing Muses amazingly pulled it off. The Muses dark and haunting pop revitalized the previously dormant audience, demanding the crowd's attention with a mixture of hooks and tortured lyrics.

Despite her petite size, head Muse Kristen Hersh led the group with her textured guitar playing and tortured howls, while drummer Dave Narcizo pummeled each song home with his aggressive playing. The set mostly drew from the band's latest album University, but also contained some stand out cuts from the band's album The Real Ramona.

After the Muses spectacular but melancholy set, the crowd was more than ready for the hardcore rap sounds of KRS– ONE. Despite a marathon wait between the Muses and KRS– ONE's set, the rapper brought the anxious audience's enthusiasm to a full boil the moment the first beat echoed across the lawn.

Dressed entirely in grey and black, KRS–ONE stripped away any of the excesses that the genre has now come to embody (jazz, reggae etc.) bringing the music back to the days of "old–school" when all that was needed was a microphone and a good beat. Drawing on every single hip–hop cliche ever ("put your hands in the air ... ," "every one say ho") KRS–ONE led the audience through a seamless 45– minute, high energy set. What lacked in creativity (most of the songs sounded exactly the same) was made up for in pure energy.

As the sun finally retired, headlinier's Blues Traveler took the stage. Fronted by lead singer/harmonica player John Popper, who with his baggy clothes, disheveled hair and furry sideburns looked more like an escaped lunatic rather than one of today's most prominent harmonica players, the band quickly whipped the enormous audience into a frenzy.

Mosh ers quickly surfaced to the to the top of the crowd as Popper and company expertly wielded their instruments, tossing off licks that kept upping the manic energy level. Unfortunately this madness only lasted for a short period of time before the band fell victim to countless extended jams that may have excited a Traveler fan, but left many neophytes bored and restless. Often the band's frantic playing reduced their songs to nothing more than a muddled and disjointed sound, losing the groove that they had originally locked into.

The group finished its set with a hyper–fast (and thankfully short) version of Chuck Berry's "Johnny Be Good" that showed off their strong points, making you realize that if they weren't graduates from the Grateful Dead school of musical wanking — just how good they might be.

Brighton Beach opens to enthusiastic crowd

BRIGHTON BEACH MEMOIRS
Student Union Ballroom
May 10

The enthusiasm level soared on the opening night of Neil Simon's Brighton Beach Memoirs as members of the UMass Theater Guild dazzled the audience, most of them with their very first performances.

Set in September of 1937, the play is centered around 15– year old Eugene — a sweet but sarcastic boy coping with his own pubescent anxieties as well as the financial and emotional ordeals of his family. Played by sophomore theater major Benjamin Stanton, Eugene is an aspiring writer who composes his "unbelievable, fantastic, private memoirs ... in case I grow up all twisted and warped, the world will know why."

Stanton plays a convincing teenage Eugene, with slouched shoulders, a cracking voice and a confused obsession with girls. When asked how he prepared for the role, Stanton said, "There is a lot of me in it." According to Stanton, the first–time actor channeled his "nervousness" into the frenzied behavior of Eugene.

Eugene's melodramatic cousin Nora was performed wonderfully by senior Katie Shorey. Nora's life is also plagued with problems as she deals with growing up and the loss of her father. Shorey's familiarity with the stage is evident in the emotional lines she delivers.

The dilemmas of the Brighton Beach family are a modern– day psychoanalyst's dream. The mother of the family, Kate (played by Kay Moriarty), is a classic co–dependent who shoulders everyone's burdens while holding the family together.

Her widowed, mother–of–two, sister Blanche (Robin Reed), lives in her home, needing not only a roof over her head, but a father for her daughters (the youngest of whom is pampered and spoiled because she has a heart condition). The man who assumes this responsibility is Eugene's father Jack (Justin W. Smith), who makes himself a work–a–holic to provide for all of the people relying on his income. Eugene's brother Stanley (Dan Friedman) is the slacker son, who just wants his father to be proud of him.

Director Robert Settembro was elated with opening night, pleased with both the acting and the audience response.

"I felt it went wonderfully," said Settembro. "It was everything we could have asked for."

According to Settembro, the cast was great to work with during the seven weeks of preparation for Brighton Beach. "They [the actors] loved to listen, and absolutely would try anything with enthusiasm."

The setting and the corny–but–funny dialogue of Brighton Beach takes you back to 1937, where you become so enthralled with this family's problems, you can forget about your own end–of–semester worries — at least for two hours.

Thurston Moore tries to break his "Sonic" ties with his solo effort Psychic Hearts.

Moore solo effort lacks Sonic diversity

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

PSYCHIC HEARTS
Thurston Moore
DGC Records

Thurston Moore has always been somewhat the "rocker" in Sonic Youth. Playing the punk to Lee Ranaldo's avant-garde experiments, Kim Gordon's poetic musings and Steve Shelly's regular guy shtick, Moore has brought a certain "pop cultural" sense to Sonic Youth's music (you know the whole Madonna/Ciccone Youth thing had to have been his idea).

That's why hearing Moore drop names from Yoko Ono to Patti Smith on his first solo venture, Psychic Hearts, is not too much of a surprise.

Unfortunately, on Psychic Hearts there are not too many surprises, period. With Shelley on drums and Renaldo actually recording and mixing a handful of the songs, the question that looms over Psychic Hearts is — just how different can it be? The answer — not very.

But what can you expect from a guy who has had a hand in creating some of the most cutting and important rock in the last 10 years? Yes, Moore may be trapped in the style that he helped create, but gosh darn it, he still does it well. Without Gordon and the rest the band's creative input, Moore is given a little more room to breathe.

He takes the opportunity to push his style just enough to make Psychic Hearts his own — but not too far as to alienate the fan base that he has already created.

Absent are the atmospheric dirges that are commonly part of Sonic Youth's repotoire (you know, Kim's stuff), instead replaced by more the standard rock fare that Moore has often dipped his feet into (ie "Dirty Boots," "Teenage Riot").

This is not to call Psychic Hearts a sell out. It's pretty safe to say that none of the 15 tracks will be making their way into heavy rotation on MTV anytime soon since Moore really has no use for any music cliches such as chorus or bridges. The songs on Psychic Hearts start, find some sort of a groove and then when Moore deems nessecary, they come to an abrupt halt.

This guerilla warfare style of songwriting has its merits, but after awhile starts to wear a little thin. Things start off well with the one–two punch of "Queen Bee And Her Pals," and "Ono Soul."

The former a raunchy, mess that threatens to become Ronnie James Dio's attempt at punk rock and the latter being a slick groove that finds Moore "bowing to the queen of noise" before launching into a mantra–like ending that raises the rock n' roll's most famous heartbreaker to new heights.

"Patti Smith Math Scratch" finds Moore locking into a riff that would make Bachman Turner Overdrive proud and pulls more mileage out of it than even the Ramones could ever dream.

Where Sonic Youth always have enough sense to mix things up a bit, Moore's hip, fanzine/pin–up boy routine grows a bit tiresome after awhile.

When he does manage to strike the right chords such as on "Cindy (Rotten Tanx)" and "Feathers" Moore proves why he has become such a respected and influential figure in rock music.

But three minutes into the 20 minute grandiose guitar sprawl "Elegy For All The Dead Rock Stars," and you realize that Moore still needs the input of his bandmates to keep the ego factor in check, meaning only one thing — hang on to the next Sonic Youth album. B–

Morphine addicted to bass, sax

Boston's atypical trio create catchy grooves on the darker side

By David Germain
Associated Press

John Coltrane's sonic sensibilities led him higher and higher, into the shrillest registers of the soprano sax and flute. The opposite is at work for the power-rock trio Morphine, whose third album, yes, continues their descent into music's guttural, subterranean netherworld, sans guitar but heavy on bone-jarring bass lines.

"We're just baritone people," said songwriter Mark Sandman, whose husky vocals and two-string slide bass substitute for guitar in the band, which also features Dana Colley on baritone saxophone and Billy Conway on drums.

In Sandman's old band, Treat Her Right, he played guitar but stuck pretty much to the bottom two strings, playing it like a bass. When he plays piano, he hangs around the baritone end of the keyboard.

"I've always been fascinated with those frequencies since I was a little kid," Sandman said in a telephone interview from Los Angeles during a concert tour. "Before my voice changed, I played trombone, which is a baritone instrument. Those are the frequencies that move us. Even the drums are tuned to that range."

The result is a brooding, desolately infectious style, a sultry, steamy, earthy music that would sound at home simmering out of a subway grate from some place far below ground.

It's insomniac music, a soundtrack for urban night owls and latter-day beatniks. One of the dozen tracks, "The Jury," is a spoken-word performance by Sandman over Colley's jazzy sax that could have been lifted straight from a 1950s poetry reading.

Sandman's sparse, often carnal lyrics mix perfectly with the sensual feel of the music: "I know it drives you crazy when I pretend you don't exist, when I'd like to lean in close and run my hands against your lips," he murmurs sardonically in "Whisper."

The music is hushed and Spartan at times, brimming with maniacal glee at others. On the opening track, "Honey White," Colley's saxophone wails like a frenzied foghorn; on "Super Sex" he plays baritone and tenor sax at the same time, a la jazz saxophonist Roland Kirk, who played three horns simultaneously.

The band came together as something of a lark in 1990, after Treat Her Right broke up. Sandman and Colley, veterans of the alternative music scene around Boston and Cambridge, Mass., were hanging out toying with bass and sax. Instruments and musicians clicked, and they decided to try a gig or two as a guitar-less trio with drummer Jerome Deupree (since replaced by Conway), Sandman's bandmate from Treat Her Right.

"It wasn't any reaction against the guitar because that's still my No. 1 instrument. I still love the guitar," Sandman said. "But we wanted to keep it as a three-piece band, and Dana covers so much ground with his sax that it didn't feel like anything was missing."

Which Faculty Would You Like To Hear Discussing Current, Critical and Controversial Issues?

The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations is planning a series of faculty conversations and panel discussions for the 1995-96 academic year.

The purpose of this series is to hold public forums which enable students to hear our faculty explore a number of timely and provocative issues.

In order to assure that the speakers and the topics reflect student interests, the Civility Commission invites students to suggest both faculty and topics for this upcoming program.

Please send or bring your written suggestions to the Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations, c/o Office of Human Relations, 206 Middlesex House.

At the April 10th meeting of the Faculty Senate, the following policy was approved:

University of Massachusetts/Boston credits and grades will be treated like any other credit transferred to UMASS/Amherst. This means that the student must earn a grade of "C-" or better to transfer the course. Letter grades earned at UMASS/Boston will no longer be used in the computation of a students' grade point average nor will the credit be counted as residence credit. This policy was approved to keep course transfer policies consistent within the five campus state university system.

This policy goes into effect beginning with courses taken in Fall 1995. Students who enroll in courses for summer 1995 at UMASS/Boston will have the grades earned calculated into their cumulative grade point averages and the credits will count as residence credit.

then scored on a Buckley grounder to short.

Both Buckley and Cardenas were solid on the defensive end. Buckley started a rundown between third and home plate which caught Stephanie Sas trying to score, and Cardenas made an extraordinary leaping catch against the fence on a Jennifer Silata foul pop-up. Shaw hit the ball hard all day. "[She] was great at the plate, poised," Sortino said. "She's really been hitting the ball lately."

"It's always towards the end of the season that I come into my own and feel like I am getting my swing back," Shaw said.

"UMass is a very good team," Canisius coach Mike Rappi said. "They executed when they had to. We had opportunities but we didn't get the job done. UMass got it done. We don't see this caliber of a team often."

After getting the NCAA berth, the Minutewomen could concentrate on using the Diamond Classic as a tune–up for the NCAAs. UMass went 1–3 in the Classic, defeating Florida State, 8–0 while losing to South Carolina, 4–2, South Florida, 5–4, and Florida State, 2–0. The mercy rule victory over Florida St. marked the only time the Seminoles have been mercy ruled all year.

"I wish them luck [in the NCAAs]," Rappi said. "If they get a good bracket, they could do damage like they did three years ago."

Three years ago the Minutewomen advanced to the College World Series, finishing third in the country.

"I definitely would love to go back there [to the World Series] and I know our team would too," said Daut, the only current Minutewomen to have played on that team.

ball and they capitalized."

LoPresti yielded a soft goal at 3:41 by Conklin, a slow bouncer set up by Massey.

Costello scored at 6:47 with a low shot from a tight angle on Cairns' left. The ball snuck under Cairns' stick, giving Costello just his second multiple-point game of the year.

But UMass was at a loss for offense. With Higgins all over Glass and Josh Miller hounding Valente, the two primary Minuteman weapons never collaborated well.

"Every time we went behind the net with a short stick, they went into a zone. They called Brown today," Cannella said. "Unfortunately we weren't patient enough to take advantage of that."

"The zone allows us to pressure the ball more because everyone's packed in," Miller said. "You know you have help, so they can't really dodge the defense."

With Jim Kennedy out for holding, Ivy League Freshman of the Year Jesse Hubbard scored the winning goal at 13:41. He whipped a 40 footer home from the left side despite good pressure by Dennis Kelly, making it 6-5.

The fourth quarter opened with promise for UMass. Murphy was called for a one minute slashing penalty at 2:46, but Princeton threw the ball away at 3:16.

But a cutting Bart Bansbach completed a great feed from Massey at 4:18, easily beating LoPresti at the goal mouth.

Cairns made the save of the day on Henry Stanziale at 6:18, when he stopped a quick stick shot from 15 feet away.

"Unfortunately I let up two or three of the worst goals I've let up this year, but I was lucky enough to bounce back with some of the best saves," Cairns said.

The Tigers took another man advantage at 7:08, when Lanning was whistled for an illegal body check. LoPresti made huge successive saves on McDonough and Jon Hess, but Hubbard scored from Hess at 7:51.

Hess capitalized on a defensive mismatch for Princeton's fourth unanswered goal only 21 seconds later. With Kennedy marking him with a short stick, Hess rushed to the net from LoPresti's left and scored through the five hole.

Glass slithered away from the pesky Princeton defense for a clean look at 8:52, but Cairns wasn't fooled.

At 11:13, Valente centered for Murphy, who put the finishing touch on his fourth hat trick of the season, goal No. 24 on the year. The assist let Valente conclude his fine career with a streak of 23 games with at least one point.

Todd Eichelberger and Derek Katz capped the scoring for Princeton, which advances to face No. 3 Syracuse at the Carrier Dome next Saturday in the quarterfinal.

Game notes: Seniors Jared Lanning, Vin Dello-Iacano, Jeremy Murphy, Tom LoPresti and Tom Healy played their final games for Massachusetts.

"When you play 4-4 halftime to last year's national champions, you prove you can play," said Murphy.

Princeton coach Bill Tierney praised the play of Massachusetts.

"It was a tough game. UMass really came to play. I thought their kids had a little more fire in them coming into the game," Princeton coach Bill Tierney said. "They were winning the ground balls, and doing what they wanted to do."

Lanning considers the season a success.

"It was a successful season," he said. "For coach's first season and what he was trying to do, I think it was a 100 percent turnaround from last year.

"This program is going to be up there soon. Give it another year or two and its going to be great."

Murphy agreed, and pointed to the Princeton's emergence in recent years as a blue print.

"This program is on its way. I think this program is going to sling-shot itself into the future," he said. "Five or six years ago, when Tierney came in, Princeton started to create a foundation. I think UMass is starting to do that now with Cannella."

Massachusetts has strong footing for Title IX

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first in a three-part series of articles on Title IX and gender equity in athletics.

Helping pioneer a college varsity sport is tough, but it was especially tough for former UMass women's soccer athlete, April Kater.

When Kater came to Amherst as a freshman in 1987, UMass was one of the "first universities to promote women's soccer as a national program along with Connecticut, and North Carolina."

Kater's recollections of cramped van rides to Rutgers while the coach drove, almost sound like some scenes from "The Bad News Bears."

"Sometimes it was surprising that we were the No. 2 team in the country and doing so well," Kater said, "and barely any of us had a full ride; we had to bust our butts to get the money we got."

Kater, the former assistant coach for women's soccer at UMass who was recently tabbed head coach at Syracuse, is quick to point out how that was then and this now. "I'm glad to see the women finally get the funding they deserve. I remember when the women's gymnastics team had to make their own uniforms and sleep eight to a room."

Today, the UMass women's soccer team flies to their games, thanks to a law called Title IX and the "University's commitment to it."

And now because of Title IX, Kater is coming back to full circle, to the cramped vans instead of the friendly skies as she heads to Syracuse this fall.

In 1972, the Office of Civil Rights passed a federal law mandating gender equity in education. The federal mandate commonly known as "Title IX" is a "suggested" compliance rule by the NCAA.

The key excerpt of Title IX is this: "No person in the United States, on the basis of sex, be excluded from the participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subject to discrimination under any educational program or activity receiving federal or financial assistance."

Title IX compliance is certified by a three prong test. It requires the percentage of male to female athletes at an institution must be within three percent of the percentage of male to female total enrollment. A school's funding in athletic programs must also be equal in equipment expenditures, scholarship money, and recruitment spending.

"I'm glad to see the women finally get the funding they deserve. I remember when the women's gymnastics team had to make their own uniforms and sleep eight to a room."
- April Kater

Title IX has been a hot-button issue for over two decades, as colleges wavered between reluctance and enthusiasm for a law that required them to increase funding for women's athletic teams.

And among them is the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Currently, UMass is within the federal requirements of Title IX. Total enrollment percentage at UMass is 52 percent male to 48 percent female, compared to 53.6 percent male athletes to 46.4 percent female athletes.

According to UMass softball coach Elaine Sortino, the latest squad lists of varsity athletes reads 466 men to 403 women.

The 1994-95 school year scholarship funding for men's and women's varsity sports at UMass "matches up well and is where we need to be," according to Sortino.

There was a $1,695,524 scholarship allotment for the male athletes, compared to $1,446,166 scholarship allotment for the women. The percentages match up with 54 percent of the scholarships going to the males, and 46 percent to the women.

"This is not a lip service program, UMass has made an enormous commitment," Sortino said, "It's (gender equity) at the top of our list and has allegiance of Boston."

Even after Kater's departure as an athlete, genders never used to be this equal at UMass.

Just four years ago, in the 1991-92 season there were 499 male athletes compared to only 218 women athletes. Scholarship funding gave $1,223,968 for the men, compared to $589,107 for the women.

According to sports management professor Carol Barr, Title IX adherence at UMass grew slowly through the 1970s and '80s until the state education budget crunch hit Massachusetts in 1989, forcing the school to cancel several varsity sports.

The list included men's tennis and soccer, along with women's tennis, volleyball, and lacrosse.

The following season, the women's tennis and lacrosse teams joined the men's and lacrosse teams joined Washington Title IX lawyer Arthur Bryant. The two teams threatened a suit against UMass on the "basis of female discrimination."

UMass settled out of court, reinstating the three varsity teams and creating a self-review committee to decide on "more options to even out the genders."

According to Barr, a member of the self-review team, the committee decided on a five-year plan that took affect in the fall of 1993.

"We are taking a proactive approach," Barr said. "We are virtually in compliance with Title IX which is far and beyond whatever many other schools are doing."

UMass added two more women's sports at the beginning of this school year: crew and water polo.

According to Barr, the five-year compliance plan will include increased scholarships along with equipment and facility improvement over the next few years.

According to Kyri Sparks, UMass field hockey captain, "UMass is now on the cutting edge in the issue of gender equity and is a great example for the rest of the country."

Sparks, former president of the Student Athlete Advisory Committee (SAAC), said that history has been to write the women off, but it's "much different now."

"By not giving the women athletes the same opportunities, it holds them back from the learning process," Sparks said. "Sometimes I think it's getting better, but other times I get frustrated about how women are still treated in the world."

UMass has committed itself to "gender equity," but may still face problems on the horizon with Title IX and will also face the challenge of a national leadership role.

Bonaventure 5 (Sat., May 13)

Ubaldo was the offensive hero in this game. The designated hitter's hot bat yielded three hits, including a solo-home run, which were good for five RBI.

Chad Paronto (5-2), got the win for Massachusetts, giving up seven hits and five runs in seven innings. Jason Bennett mopped up for Paronto, allowing no runs on three hits while striking out three in the final two innings. Starter Chad Schlee was roughed up for seven runs on 10 hits, while Mark Cullay and Ryan Radematker surrendered three runs each.

Knight added his name to the UMass record book once again. His single in the eighth inning gave him 194 career hits, the most ever by a Minuteman.

Massachusetts 10, Rutgers 9 (Fri., May 12)

Shortly after being named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year, Murphy (7-3) struggled, giving up nine runs in eight innings of work, in the first game of the tournament. But the Massachusetts bats responded for the senior ace, scoring in double figures to give Massachusetts a victory over the Scarlet Knights.

SPORTS MEETING

The Collegian sports staff will have the final meeting of the year on Wednesday, May 17, at 4 p.m. All sports staff members should attend, as well as those interested in joining the staff next fall. If you are unable to attend, please call Andrew Bryce, Matt Vautour, or next year's sports editor, Candice Flemming, at 545-1749.

Princeton knocks Massachusetts out of NCAAs

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

PRINCETON, N.J. — The No. 6 seed Princeton Tigers outscored the University of Massachusetts 5–1 in the fourth quarter, securing an 11–6 victory in the first round of the NCAA men's lacrosse tournament before 1,782 at Palmer Stadium.

Striving for its first postseason win in six years, the Minutemen quickly proved they deserved their invitation to the 12–team field, taking a 4–3 lead over the defending national champion after one quarter.

Princeton	11
Massachusetts	6

"I thought their kids had a little more fire in them coming into the game," Princeton coach Bill Tierney said.

UMass still trailed by just one after three quarters, 6–5, but Princeton added three more before Jeremy Murphy (three goals) scored his final collegiate goal at 11:13 to cut it to 9– 6, UMass' last goal of its 7–6 season.

"That's what makes a championship caliber team, one that can really turn it on in the third and fourth quarter," UMass goaltender Tom LoPresti (10 saves) said.

Senior defenseman Jared Lanning scored his first career goal in 27 games at 2:09 of the first, just after UMass killed an extra man opportunity that began when Todd Sokolowski went off for one minute for tripping at 1:33.

After Jason Buttles evened it 1–1 at 4:45, Murphy scored twice to give UMass the only two–goal advantage it enjoyed all day. Neither team built a lead larger than two until the decisive fourth.

Murphy ripped a low, twisting shot past Pat Cairns (16 saves) at 6:59 to make it 2–1, with Buddy Hoffman earning an assist.

Hoffman fed Murphy again at 8:04 for a 25–foot bouncing shot that fooled Cairns.

Chris Massey (one goal, three assists) spun free of a UMass defender and tucked a shot off the ground past LoPresti at 8:49.

Princeton's extra man offense clicked at 10:43, when Don McDonough put one between LoPresti's legs for a 3–3 tie. The Tigers converted three of seven extra man opportunities.

With just three seconds left in the period, Chris Grande beat Cairns with a long, low shot that Casey Costello assisted.

Princeton scored the only goal of the second quarter at 2:41, when Scott Conklin took a Jeff MacBean feed on the doorstep and deposited his team leading 27th goal that resulted in a 4–4 tie at halftime.

UMass had two good chances to regain the lead in the quarter's final seconds, but Cairns denied a charging Hoffman and Brendan Glass could not finish a pass over the net by Mike Valente.

"We didn't get the quality shots they did," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "I thought that their defensive scheme was outstanding. They force you to take poor shots."

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN

Senior defenseman Vin Dello–Iacono played the final game of his career in the Massachusetts lacrosse team's 11–6 loss to Princeton in the NCAA Tournament on Saturday.

Glass was held without a goal for just the third time all season, and it was the first of those games UMass lost. Senior Todd Higgins, a favorite to win the William Schmeisser Award as the nation's top defenseman, smothered Glass incessantly.

"I don't think he shot particularly well today," Cannella said. "He's still growing. Hopefully in the next couple of years he can handle the top defensemen a little better."

He still managed to walk right in just 55 seconds into the third, but Cairns made one of his many dazzling saves.

"He came up big," Valente said. "Then he'd outlet the Men's lacrosse proves its worth

PRINCETON, N.J. — When the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team walked off the field following an 11–6 loss to Princeton in the first round of the NCAA tournament on Saturday, the players were dejected, but no heads hung low.

The Minutemen walked off the field in the final game of the season with their heads held high. Despite what any media or other coaches had said prior to the game, UMass proved a point. The Minutemen deserved the NCAA bid.

"The way we performed all year I certainly thought we certainly deserved that opportunity to be in the tournament," said Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella. "The way we played here for three quarters, I think we proved that we belonged."

Senior Jared Lanning agreed, "It definitely showed that we deserved to be there," said the co–captain defender. "We worked real hard this year and we showed it today."

Against the defending national champions, the Minutemen proved that they could compete on a national level in a hard–fought battle, as the game was closer than the five–goal deficit indicated.

"If anyone saw this game, they know it wasn't an 11–6 game, their goalie just came up big," said sophomore attackman Brendan Glass.

It was anybody's game in the first half. UMass showed no signs of intimidation despite the Tigers' reputation.

"I wasn't worried about the mystique of playing the national champion," said senior goaltender Tom LoPresti. "I felt confident. The defense was doing a superb job in front of me. The offense was controlling the ball, going along with our game plan."

"We weren't intimidated whatsoever," said senior attackman Jeremy Murphy, who scored three goals in his final collegiate game. "We were ready to go today.

The Massachusetts defense matched the effort of the vaunted Princeton unit, as the two teams played to a 4–4 tie at intermission.

On offense, UMass employed a ball–control offense that was nearly flawless, as the Minutemen held the ball throughout most of the opening half.

Cannella was pleased with his teams effort at that point in the contest.

"At 4–4 at halftime, we were pleased both on the defensive side and on the offensive side," he said.

Softball, Baseball enjoy successful weekend play

■ Softball to face UConn in NCAAs

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

They had been working for it all season, and now they have it — an NCAA Tournament berth.

The University of Massachusetts softball team will be playing Northeast Region rival Connecticut in the first round of the NCAAs at Princeton next weekend. The first rounds of the tourney will take place May 19–21 with times to be announced.

UMass needed to defeat Canisius on Friday in a best–of–three series to gain the spot in the NCAAs. The Minutewomen did just that, beating the Golden Griffs by identical scores of 3–0 at Totman Field.

Senior hurler Kelly Daut pitched back–to–back shutouts in the play–in series. In game one, Daut allowed only four hits while striking out five. With her second strikeout of the day, Daut set the UMass record for career strikeouts. The previous record of 471 was held by Lynn Stockley (1983– 86). Daut also had five K's in the second game to push her to 480.

"Kelly did a great job," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "She came right out after them."

The Minutewomen got their first run of the first game after Sam Cardenas reached on an error, and then later scored on a Kelly Buckley (1–for–3, one run batted in) fielder's choice. UMass picked up single runs in the fourth and fifth innings. Buckley started things off in the bottom of the fourth with a double to left–centerfield and moved to third on a Kim Gutridge (1–for–3) fly to right. Buckey then tried to score on a Michele Shaw grounder but was thrown out. With Shaw on first, Daut (2–for–2) helped her own cause smashing a triple to centerfield scoring Shaw.

The Minutewomen scored their final run of the game in the fifth when Tracey Osier (1–for–3) scored on a Chris Martens fly to center.

In the second game, Daut carried a no–hitter into the bottom of the fifth before Danea Ciotoli broke it up with a single. The game was scoreless until the top of the fourth. Martens (1–for–2) led off the inning with a double, moved to third on a Buckley (1–for–4, one RBI) sacrifice, and then scored on a Shaw (2–for–4) single. UMass would get another run in the fifth when Heather Dorsey scored on a Stephanie Martena hit.

The Minutewomen scored their final run in the seventh when Cardenas led off with a double that hit the warning track in centerfield and

■ Baseball earns A–10 Tourney crown

By Andrew Bryce and Matt Vautour

While the University of Massachusetts campus was packed with thousands of students and friends attending the annual Spring Concert yesterday afternoon, the baseball team had other business to take care of elsewhere.

The Minutemen, regular season A–10 champions, did just that as they were crowned the A–10 Conference Tournament champions yesterday, defeating Rutgers (28–29) in the final game, 10–3 in Boyertown, Pa.

With the victory, Massachusetts improved to 36–12 on the season. The Minutemen return to their home diamond on Thursday, when they host MAAC champion Siena (1:05 p.m.), in a three game NCAA play–in series at Earl Lorden Field. The teams will play a doubleheader on Thursday, and one game on Friday, if necessary.

Massachusetts jumped out to a 3–0 lead in the bottom of the first inning, as junior designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo smacked a two–run homer, and senior catcher Andy Pelis had an RBI single.

Leading 4–2 after six innings of play, Rutgers placed runners on first and third with two out. Rob Windows took Jeff Michaels (5–1) deep into centerfield, only to have sophomore Nate Murphy make a diving catch over his shoulder at the warning track. The catch took away an extra base hit from Windows, and preserved the Minutemen's 4–2 lead.

The bottom of the seventh inning saw a six–run barrage by Massachusetts. Bill Knight hit a solo homerun, his 18th of the year, junior first baseman Justin Kelly, sophomore third baseman Ryan Thistle and Ubaldo went on to deliver RBI singles.

Michaels threw 7 2/3 innings, allowing only three runs to improve his record to 5–1.

Ubaldo, who went 2–for–4 with a homer and three RBIs yesterday afternoon, was named the tournament's Most Valuable Player. The Cambridge native went 9–for–13 with two dingers and nine RBIs over the weekend.

Police raid Japanese cult headquarters, arrest group's leader

By Eric Talmadge
Associated Press

KAMIKUISHIKI, Japan — Police began simultaneous raids Tuesday on compounds of the Aum Shinri Kyo cult to arrest the group's leader and 20 members in connection with the Tokyo subway gas attack.

Police said they planned to charge Shoko Asahara and a score of his followers in the attack that left a dozen people dead and 5,500 others sickened.

Asahara was believed to be hiding at the cult's compound here at the foot of Mount Fuji, although his presence had not been confirmed. Hundreds of officers raided the compound Tuesday, and 130 other sites were simultaneously being raided nationwide, said Shigeaki Ishikawa, a Tokyo Metropolitan Police spokesman.

"We have obtained evidence that the sect has produced sarin within its compound and discovered its members who were involved in the attacks on the subways," said Ishikawa, a chief detective. Sarin is the nerve gas that permeated the subway.

Television footage of the raid at Kamikuishiki showed police cutting into the prefabricated buildings of the cult compound with circular saws. After cutting their way in, several dozen police rushed in, but had not come out yet several minutes later. More than 200 of Asahara's followers have been arrested since the March 20 subway attack, but all on charges unrelated to the attack.

Media reports said a total of 41 warrants were issued Monday night charging Asahara and others with murder or attempted murder. They said some of those named already were in custody on other charges.

The arrests would cap the biggest Japanese police investigation ever. During almost-daily raids and searches, Japan has been shaken by a continuing series of violence that has profoundly changed its self-image as a safe nation.

In the latest scare, five people suffered coughing fits Monday night from fumes at a train station in Yokohama, just south of Tokyo. Three people were being treated at hospitals, but their condition was not serious, authorities said.

Joyce White Deer–Vincent, Program Coordinator for the Native American Cultural Center, stands outside her office in the basement of Chadboume Residential Hall.

Respect for culture important to Vincent

By M. Isabel Tereso
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Program Coordinator for the Native American Cultural Center, Joyce Vincent said she believes "it's important to have more respect for living cultures and have this respect be a part of a balanced educational system."

"One shouldn't have to give up their cultural way of life," she said, as the combination of cultures will make students more self–confident and thier lives more well–balanced.

Vincent said in the traditional Native American community everyone recognizes individual strengths within the community and their responsibility to serve their community. She said she believes mainstream society relinquishes knowledge and responsibility by relying on experts offering a possible solution.

Vincent refuses the label "activist" because she her activist work is something she does naturally and culturally, without a political agenda.

Vincent is Cherokee and Blackfoot and from southeast New York. She said the diversity of the city helped her see how issues of class and oppression originate and their effects on peoples from all over the world.

Due to the low and poor response of Native American issues on a national level, Vincent said the issues of Native American peoples have been taken to an international arena —in Geneva. She said these issues pertained to North American, Canadian, Central and South American and Caribbean Native American peoples.

International law allows for expansion of human rights' laws as compared to North America's national law, which focuses on physical attacks or crimes, said Vincent.

Sacred findings

In 1985 Vincent helped develop and plan a New Hampshire bill to protect unmarked graves and goods found in old burial sights. Up until that point, she said, any human remains and artifacts found by anthropologists or archaeologists would often wind up in a museum or library.

Two years later the bill was passed and now ensures that the AIDS cases on the rise among minorities, youth

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

The number of reported AIDS cases in the United States among women, Blacks, Hispanics and children continued to increase in 1994, according to a report released by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC).

A report published in the February 3 issue of the CDC's Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report records that women are making up a greater percentage of people with AIDS than ever before (18.1 percent).

Blacks made up a disproportionate number of AIDS cases relative to their numbers in the general population. Although they make up only 12.3 percent of the U.S. population, Blacks accounted for 39 percent of all cases in 1994, the CDC reports. This number represents an increase of 3 percent over 1993.

AIDS cases among Hispanics also increased from 1993 to 1994, from 17..7 percent to 18.7 percent.

More than 1,000 children, most of them black or Hispanic were diagnosed with AIDS in 1994. 92 percent of these children have mothers who are HIV positive and contracted HIV prenatally, the CDC reported.

The largest decline among any group occurred among gay and bisexual men who contracted the disease through homosexual conduct. In 1994, gay and bisexual men accounted for 43.3 percent of all reported cases of AIDS.

While the 80,691 cases represented a decrease of 26,000 cases from 1993, the CDC attributes this decline to a revised definition of AIDS. The agency expanded its definition of AIDS in January 1993 and allowed thousands of previously reported cases to be registered as cases of AIDS.

In 1993, AIDS–related illnesses became the leading cause of death among all Americans aged 25 to 44.

Job–hunting graduates offered 'Second Chance'

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Graduating seniors who are having difficulty finding jobs because they do not have enough experience are being offered a second chance.

The Maither Career Center at the University of Massachusetts has established the nation's first post–graduate internship and cooperative program, said Jeff Silver, associate director of the career center.

Recent graduates can sign up for the program as late as six months following graduation.

Because members of the program are no longer students officially affiliated with the University, they must pay $300 to enter the program.

Silver said if a graduate does not receive an internship within six months, then they will receive $200 back.

The Second Chance Program provides graduates with the same services as the undergraduate field experience program.

Graduates have access to the career center's library, and counseling services for resumes and interviews.

Graduates can take summer or semester long internships, and summer or six month cooperatives.

"Despite a good job market, people without experience are having difficulty finding jobs," said Silver.

Silver said he has not only spoken with liberal arts graduates who are having difficulty because they lack experience, but business and engineering majors are having difficulty as well because they never had an internship.

The program was developed to assist graduates who attempted to volunteer their services to companies when they could not find jobs, said Silver.

"industry reaction to the program has been exceptional," said Silver.

Julie Lichtenstein, a communications major who graduated in January, said it was impossible to find a job in the record industry or in broadcasting because she never had an internship.

"I was told it is illegal to have an internship without credit according to 'The Ricki Lake Show,'" said Lichtenstein.

The Second Chance Program provides graduates with three continuing education units which cannot go toward graduate work.

Lichtenstein is the first graduate to join the program since it recently began, said Silver.

Silver said he does not expect the Second Chance Program to interfere with the opportunities the field experience program offers undergraduates because the Second Chance Program will be popular when the undergraduate program is not.

"Hopefully the companies will allow graduates to move right into regular jobs when the internship ends," said Silver.

Silver said graduates should at least search for jobs before they apply for the program.

Lichtenstein said after graduating she was told about the program when she went to the career center to receive assistance on résumé writing.

Weekend revelry escalates beyond fun

Violence, crowded buses often mar students' good times

By Amy Parodysz
Collegian Staff

On the weekend of April 21 a 21–year–old student was hit over the head with a beer bottle outside one of the downtown bars, Time Out. Although this degree of violence is unusual, at least one fight a weekend can be expected downtown, according to an Amherst police officer who wished to remain anonymous.

"If [police] weren't there driving or walking around, there might be a lot more violence, because things might not escalate to what they could have been," said Shari Zigelbaum, a waitress at Delano's.

There is at least one police officer downtown every night, but on weekends during the school year there are one or two extra officers. In addition, they can call for extra cruisers if a problem arises, said Officer Sam Epiceno.

"We have a walking beat," said Amherst police Chief Charles Sherpa. "They know when the bars get out and when the problems occur."

According to Mike Burns, a bouncer at Time Out, the bottle incident in April occurred because the student asked a woman for a cigarette and the woman's husband thought he had asked in a disrespectful manner. The man told the student to ask her again, which the student did, just before he got hit over the head with the bottle. The wound required six stitches, Burns said.

Fights downtown

Mike Murphy, who has been bartending at Time Out for a year, said he could summarize the problems downtown in two words: "Testosterone, beer."

"You get somebody macho looking for any little reason to start a fight and 40 people jump in," Burns said.

Time Out has a capacity of about 120 people and there is usually a line to get in by 10:30 p.m. on weekends, Murphy said. There are usually about 400–600 people congregating outside Antonio's Pizza by the Slice between 12:30 and 1 a.m., when the bars close. Antonio's is open until 1 a.m.

"Every time there's a scuffle outside the cops seem to be right there," said Amy Snow, a former employee of Delano's.

Burns agreed with several police officers, bar workers and students when he said most of the violence happens

New Hillel RA emphasizes community

By Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

Before he spent last year in Israel, Kim Richman didn't see any relevance of Judaism to his identity. After his year there, he realized Judaism "can play an integral role in who I am."

Richman will be using the experiences he picked up while in Israel and before in his duties as the resident assistant of the Jewish Living Community (JLC) in Hillel House next year.

Richman, who was named after a Rudyard Kipling book, grew up in Manhattan, where he "had a standard Jewish education" in Hebrew school and then had his Bar Mitzvah. After that, he stopped going, like most of his friends.

Shaping an identity

Seven years later he went to Israel where he "experienced the three major institutions responsible for shaping Israel: Kibbutz, army and religion."

Richman spent the first seven months studying Hebrew and Israeli politics and working on Kibbutz Hazorea, one of many communal enclaves in Israel.

He then did the Marva program which he characterized as being for tourists who are thinking about Aliyah, or immigrating to Israel, to let them know what being in the Israeli army is like. It was basically 3 months of basic training, said Richman, describing it as "the most intensive Zionist experience I had."

Richman then finished the year in the Old City in Jerusalem studying in a program called the Israelite Institute.

During this time, the 21–year old psychology major realized that even though he had planned to stay in Israel he was an American Jew and wanted to return to finish his schooling. He applied to UMass from Israel with plans to return when he finished school.

Richman said his experiences in Israel, which showed him how Judaism can be part of his identity, are a big reason he wanted to be an RA for the JLC.

He chose to live in the JLC because he liked the strong sense of community in Israel and wanted to recreate that feeling. During his time there, Richman was the student representative on the house council which runs the community.

Richman said his ideas on consensus come from even earlier than his year in Israel, however. The year before his trip. Richman participated appropriate tribe or clan will be notified of any findings, said Vincent. She added that respect and acknowledgement of Native cultures' significance to history and development of nations was upheld.

Many of the artifacts found were sacred items and were paraded to promote tourism, but indigenous peoples didn't view these parades as a promotion of their history and culture, said Vincent. She said anthropologists and archaeologists in Washington D.C. told her they didn't realize the inappropriateness of their behavior and said their beliefs were part of their own formal education.

Forced education

Vincent said sometimes Native American students can't go home again because of their education. Some Native American students are first generation college students, she said, and have difficulty viewing education as a tool, rather than cultural genocide.

Historically education was forced on Native Americans in order to "civilize" them which, Vincent said, resulted in the loss of language, traditions and ceremonies. Vincent said students now view education as a necessary tool to interact with others and increase others' awareness of Native American cultures and issues.

In some ALANA (Asian, Latin American and Native American) communities, education was denied or forbidden for others it was forced on them. Vincent said ALANA students' ties to their cultural history and background affects them emotionally and personally.

Vincent questions what foreign students perceptions are of indigenous peoples' struggles. She said she believes ALANA courses would be ideal and allow for teaching how ALANA communities adapted and/or changed regarding their cultures, traditions and history.

Vincent said she would like to see faculty open up and see ALANA studies as non-threatening and as an opportunity to expand the information they already have, but this would mean the process of education would have to be analyzed and revised.

Vincent said the formation of the current class system would also be more adequately understood as a result of this education.

One comment Vincent said she often hears that upsets her is, "these people no longer exist," which is she denies wholeheartedly. As an example, Vincent said there are approximately 25 Native American students on campus, 15 of which are active with the Native American Student Association (NASA) and the Native American Cultural Center.

There are also five staff, four faculty members and seven graduate students who visibly indicate their Native American heritage.

The resources and activities at the cultural center, located in Chadbourne, serve undergraduates, graduates, faculty, staff and the local community.

Vincent said the Native American Cultural Center also provides programs that integrate contemporary and traditional aspects of Native American culture and history.

The continuance of these programs, along with performers and speakers, helps students practice and maintain and share their own traditions and cultural experiences.

Vincent said that all cultural centers on campus are located in dormitories. She said she would like to see all cultural centers have classes in their centers to discuss diversity, utilizing faculty, staff and students.

in a program called the Audubon Expedition Institute. He and around 20 other students lived on a school bus and traveled from Montana to Arizona, studying environmental science and human dynamics.

Jewish Living Community

"I feel [the Jewish Living Community] has potential that is not fully realized at this point," Richman said. "I chose to be an RA so I can institute more change and make the JLC more communal — integrate Judaism more into everyday life."

According to Richman, students who are looking for an environment of Judaism, consensus and community should apply for one of the 26 spots in 13 rooms at Hillel.

Besides services, there will also be a Friday evening dinner and Sunday brunch at Hillel's kosher kitchen for students to eat together. Consensus will be used as the "tool with which JLC will build itself." It will be how students govern themselves and plan what they want to do. Lastly there will be bi-weekly community meetings so students can interact.

Sophomore Daria Peskin, a current resident of the JLC, said, "I've enjoyed living here, it's a change from the dorms. I mainly liked it because of the environment. It makes me more comfortable to be in a Jewish environment setting."

Candidate visits University

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The first candidate to replace Ron Story paid the University of Massachusetts a visit last week speaking to both faculty and students during his two-and-a-half day stay.

Pierre Allaire is the associate vice president of development at Clemson University. He is also the first public candidate for the position of vice chancellor of University advancement, a position held by Story who will be stepping down to return to teaching.

The University is conducting a national search for a new vice chancellor and Allaire is one of several prospective candidates, according to Virginia Rees, member of the search committee.

While here, Allaire spoke with deans, vice chancellors, the advancement department and both graduate and undergraduate student leaders. Rees said.

James Leheny, head of the search committee, was unavailable for comment.

Allaire, who also serves as executive director of the Clemson University Foundation (CUF), is responsible for any fund-raising activity over $100,000, for corporate and foundation relations and leads a staff of 35.

As executive director of the CUF, he is responsible for handling certain donor information, communication between separate CUF committees and the active recruitment of minorities and women.

Allaire received his bachelor's degree in science and education at St. Edward's University at Austin, Texas. He received his master's in biology at Stephen F. Austin State University at Nacogdoches, Texas and his Ph.D in biology at the University of Louisville at Louisville, Ky.

SHINICHIRO SUZUKI / COLLEGIAN
Dr. Pierre Allaire is the first known candidate for the position of vice chancellor of the University Advancement.

A recipient of a special merit award in the CASE III competition, he has published more than 35 articles and one book in the areas of ornithology, general science and education.

The vice chancellor for University advancement is responsible for alumni relations, state and community relations, the news office, the Campus Chronicle, and University photography.

Story, a history professor at the University since 1972, took the vice chancellor position at the request of Chancellor David Scott in the spring of 1994. Story said he plans to return to teaching history this fall.

"He took the interim administration position always with the intention of going back to the history department as a professor," said his wife, Ellen Story, "which is what he always wanted to be."

Death toll surges as virus sweeps Zaire

KINSHASA, Zaire (AP) — The death toll from the killer Ebola virus surged Monday as health officials hunted for two people who may have brought the epidemic to the Zairian capital, a crowded city of 6 million.

Authorities fear the two — a riverboat captain and a nurse — could frustrate their attempts to contain the virus to the region surrounding Kikwit, the city 370 miles east of Kinshasa where the outbreak began in March.

Seventeen new Ebola deaths were confirmed Monday along with four new cases of Ebola, all of them in Kikwit, the World Health Organization (WHO) said in Geneva.

That brought the total of confirmed cases to 84. Of those, 77 have died, including a fourth Italian nun who was caring for Ebola patients at Kikwit General Hospital.

There is no vaccine or cure for Ebola, which kills 80 percent of those who contract it, usually within days. Victims suffer from violent diarrhea and vomiting, and finally die with blood pouring from their eyes, ears and noses.

"WHO experts expect a significant increase in cases during the next two to three weeks among people who are incubating the disease having been exposed to it in the care of relatives or neighbors," said WHO spokesman Richard Leclair.

Health workers were moving into the area around Kikwit to teach people how to avoid Ebola and to search street-by-street for new victims.

■ Police often needed to control crowds outside the downtown bars after closing.

According to Murphy, some fights start inside Time Out just by pushing and shoving.

"They get pushed out and that's when people get arrested," he said. "Whether it starts with two people or not, it never ends up that way."

"The quicker we can stop the fight, the less chance there is of anyone getting injured ... including innocent bystanders," Epiceno said.

According to Amherst police officer Bill Koski, they usually don't have to call in state troopers, but "if they want to find some excitement, it's happening in downtown Amherst."

One officer on duty Friday night said if there was a fight he would "announce" his presence by interacting and separating the parties, then charging them as disorderly persons if they continue to fight.

"I don't think [police supervision] should be necessary, but it most likely is," said Doug LeBlanc, owner of the Spoke. "If you're 21 and you're old enough to drink, you should be old enough to discipline yourself."

In 11 years, LeBlanc said he has seen only five episodes of violence, but says things are different further uptown.

"The bars uptown are basically all students after a certain time of night," he said.

"I've seen a progression of violence [uptown]," said Step Snyder, a bartender at The Spoke.

Police as bus monitors

As a bus stopped Stockbridge Road around 11 p.m. on Friday night, passengers who wanted to get off were trying to push past people in the aisles to the exit. People in the back were yelling to the driver to open the back door. In response, the police officer standing by the front exit said, "Everyone has to exit from the front." A male grumbled, "This is a mad scene."

According to Koski, the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) pays the police overtime — three officers on Friday and two on Saturday — to monitor the buses from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. or whenever the last run ends. Amherst police have been doing this for three years. Previously, the registry police monitored the buses.

"Sometimes there are 100 or so [students] outside the Newman Center waiting to go downtown," Koski said. "[Without the police], there are fights and the driver gets abused. With a cop on the bus, people tend to behave."

People bring open containers of alcohol on the bus, which is illegal. These offenders get kicked off the bus, Epiceno said.

Sometimes 150 people are "packed like sardines" into buses with seating capacities for 45 people, according to Epceno.

When the "standing room only" passengers cannot fit behind the white lines at the exits, the driver will not admit new passengers, Koski said.

The worst routes early in the night, according to Epiceno, are from the Stockbridge Road stop at the University of Massachusetts heading toward Crestview, Hobart or Puffton Village or Main Street, "if there's a party." Then, about midnight, it's crowded going from Puffton Village or Crestview Apartments toward campus, as students go back to their residence halls, said Epiceno.

"If something were to happen ... I don't know what that cop could do because he couldn't move," Zigelbaum said.

The usual problems are people running around or yelling, according to Koski. "They are asked to leave if it becomes a safety issue," he said.

The meaning of a columnist

E.C. Thomas

By the end of these 90 lines, three years of a Collegian life will have come and gone — both a sad and exhilarating notion. Sad, because the Collegian has played a big role in my collegiate life, and exhilarating because having always been one to need the last word: this is mine.

Over the last three years, more than a few individuals have puzzled over my existence as Collegian columnist. It seems to spawn curiosity in many, with the top questions being: What does E.C. stand for? And: What is it like? Answering the first has always been easy. The second is always more complicated (I still struggle understanding it myself). To have 20,000 people know who you are — but not know who you are — is a strange concept, and one that takes some getting used to.

To most, being a columnist is to simply write a few lines a week on whatever is on your mind — no problem. Well, the last three years have been anything but "no problem." To be both an editorial editor and columnist is to be a warrior in a never-ending battle over freedom of speech.

Most of you have no idea about the campus revisionists wreaking havoc on the constitution, or the fight on behalf of the Collegian to stop them. If you think this doesn't apply to you then we've already lost half the battle.

Over the last three years I've fought with countless faculty and students over words on the Ed/Op page. I've sat behind a desk where daily an individual or two would come down to preach to me about tolerance and sensitivity and then leave calling me a host of names. To be a columnist or an editor is to have been called racist, homophobic, sexist (my favorite), irresponsible and ignorant. Although after receiving hate mail I usually come home to messages of congratulations, some of those times will never leave me.

I have to admit that being called a racist has become somewhat of a joke between friends. And during the times where I've tried to express how hard it is to hear something like that, most have laughed and said, "Don't worry about it, they don't know what they're talking about." But it is something to worry about, especially when the term is used simply because someone disagrees with your opinion, and because they disagree with your opinion they feel your right to print it should be taken away.

To be a Collegian columnist and think that you will not ruffle a few feathers from time to time is sheer naivete. I have to say that I appreciate many of the dialogues some of my columns and others under my editorship started. If anything, college should be a time where you question everything and learn from the questions. Unfortunately many have already decided the answers, and if you don't agree — well, then you're racist, sexist or what have you.

I have no regrets whatsoever over my work at the Collegian. I've learned more down here than in any classroom. And I certainly leave here with many great memories. But the ones that will stick with me for as long as I'm alive are memories whose remembrance still stirs an emotional chord with me. No matter how many times I remind myself that people will always read what they want to read, or how easy the First Amendment now falls from my lips, the memory of the man with AIDS who wept at my desk one afternoon over a column still breaks my heart.

The memory of a professor's letter accusing me of irresponsibility, ignorance and associating my name with the Ku Klux Klan for printing a conservative viewpoint still frustrates me. The memory of the countless calls for conservative viewpoints to be taken off the editorial page, and the endless encounters with the "multiculturalists" calling me the "ism" of the day, still leaves me flustered.

After three years of Charles Santiago [Collegian, May 2], and his little following of self-righteous fools who feel the need to spout off their holier-than-thou conclusions about us honkies, one becomes tired and drained of defending oneself to their hypocritical notion of multiculturalism. Santiago and friends live under a belief that only they have a heritage of persecution and prejudice, which gives them the right to alienate and discriminate on the basis of color. I'll never understand that logic and I suppose that is for the best.

To all conservatives out there: make your voices heard — you have the power to generate meaningful discussion on this campus. don't be discouraged. To Santiago and friends: "No Irish need apply" to your theories on diversity. Many thanks to Jon, for getting me down here, Darienne for teaching me once I was; to past editors, Dan Wetzel, David Rivera and Michael Morrissey, for their inspirational courage and strength. Most importantly thank you to the Mike's posse, 12J, Anna and A.J. and #180, for putting up with the threat of having your exploits printed in my column each week — you've been a tremendous source of support and creative ideas.

As for the other question: E.C. is for ... naaah, it just wouldn't be the same.

The importance of sports

Matt Vautour

Somebody asked me once. Why be a sports writer? There are so many things in the world that seem so much more important. Why be a sports writer?

Sports aren't important?

You can't tell that to the family of Jason Leader.

Leader, a 10-year-old cancer patient was a huge Red Sox fan. A few months before he died, he met his hero, Red Sox first baseman Mo Vaughn, with one wish.

He asked Vaughn to hit a home run for him that day. Vaughn promised he'd try.

When Vaughn's shot cleared the fence at Fenway, it was perhaps the best moment of the 10-year-old's all too short life. Athletes arrogant? Spoiled? Not Mo Vaughn.

You can't tell Dick Hoyt, the father who runs the marathon with his son Rick in the wheelchair every year, that sports aren't important.

"When we're running I feel like I'm not handicapped anymore," the handicapped son said to his father.

Sports are important.

Every summer there are millions of Americans whose first act everyday is to pick up the newspaper to check the sports page to see how their favorite baseball team did.

In Boston alone, fans young and old live and die with the Red Sox. It is said that the mood of Boston in the summer revolves around the fortunes of the boys of summer.

In a time where most of the newspaper and the 6 p.m. news are filled with depressing stories, sports is a release, a chance to forget about all the bad stuff and just watch a game.

Even scientific studies have shown that kids who played sports as children learned teamwork and other valuable life skills.

Sports have been effective in helping to get some inner-city youths off the streets and away from crime. Instead of gangs, they join teams. Instead of fighting, they play games.

This University is a perfect example of what sports can do. For three hours, twice a week in the winter, the campus forgets about tuition hikes and budget cuts. People forget about racial tensions, and everything else in the world as the UMass unites to cheer on the basketball team.

So maybe finding a cure for cancer or Middle Eastern peace talks might carry a little more weight on the grand scale of things, but there certainly is a niche for sports and everything associated with it.

This University is a perfect example of what sports can do. For three hours, twice a week in the winter, the campus forgets about tuition hikes and budget cuts.

The esteem which sports is held in has fallen lately. Rising salaries, labor disputes and a general feeling that athletes are brats have contributed to the image problem, but sports exists more than on just a professional level, and are about more than money.

Sports are important.

In my haphazard reading I found the best quote to sum up what I feel is the essence of sports:

"Sports. They demonstrate the scope of human possibility, which is unlimited. The inconceivable is conceived, and then it is important."

In my short time as a writer, I have seen several UMass sports teams celebrate after big upsets, and for the short period of time after them, the entire campus feels a little better about itself.

Unlike almost any other institution, sports offer a chance to see people's dreams come true, and during those special moments, there is a no better job anywhere than that of a sportswriter. I should know, I've been there.

COLLEGIAN ART BY JEFF WILSON

Defending free speech

Evan Young

The now infamous Helen F. Cullen is an anti-Semite who voiced her opinion in a letter to the editor of the Collegian. The response, as you may have gathered by now, was overwhelming and countless people were hurt and disgusted at the fact that she has taught her messages of "discrimination and hate" for 43 years. Many have said something to the effect that the administration should "strip this individual of her bestowed honorable title of Emeritus."

What I would like to know is where some of these students, writers and faculty get off in saying something as ridiculous as the above. If the University of High and Mighty Massachusetts were to fire every teacher who held either racist, sexist, homophobic or anti-Semitic views, exactly how many teachers would be left?

Would it be right to fire someone purely on the basis of their beliefs, no matter how wrong or asinine they might seem? No.

I am personally not anti-Semitic and don't agree with Helen Cullen's broad statement about the Jewish identity, but she has as much right to hold that opinion as anyone else does. As long as her views do not affect what or how she teaches (and as far as I can guess, math and statistics have nothing to do with Jewish history), or her attitude towards Jewish students, then there is no legal reason to strip her of her job or title.

Sadly enough, we now have no way of knowing whether or not she discriminated in the classroom, and if she did, then she does not deserve to keep her title. But if she didn't, then not a single one of us would be justified in saying that she should get the boot purely on the basis of a hateful belief.

The reason is this: Democracy and the First Amendment allow U.S. citizens to write whatever they want through freedom of the press. But this goes deeper than merely an article in a paper; we all have a freedom to think whatever we want also — there are no laws prohibiting free thought or anti-Semitism. Freedom of thought, according to most Americans, is a basic human right. Will we now go so far as to controlling a person's very opinion — will we try to shut off a part of this country's underlying philosophy that has molded it into the very essence of what it is? The essence of a country where everyone has a voice?

America is supposed to be a place where anyone can be free of persecution on the basis of their beliefs. Would we now negate that by taking away Cullen's title? Will we soon have Thought Police controlling our minds and institute Newspeak as our national language?

Many people argue, though, that anti-Semitism, racism, etc., are purely hateful points of view and should no longer be protected under the Constitution. They say that a certain border must be drawn between what is OK and non-hateful and what is bad and hateful. Who can draw the line that they are asking for? Imagine Bill Clinton addressing the nation after the new legislation: "OK, America, here's the deal. The First Amendment, which has worked pretty well for the first 200 plus years of this country, umm ... we've decided ... doesn't work well anymore. So we've thrown it out. Uh, sorry."

As I have said, I do not agree with the opinion that Helen Cullen voiced. It is anti-Semitic and hateful, and does not mix well with the UMass atmosphere of diversity and acceptance. This is obvious in light of the response that she has invoked. But she is entitled to that opinion, is entitled to voice that opinion, and is entitled to keep her title. No matter how "wrong" or ignorant or worthless her opinion may seem to most of us, she is allowed to be anti-Semite as is any other professor at any other university, as long as her views do not invade the classroom.

In America, the multicultural melting pot, we are all forced to deal with the issues of diversity. Also in America, we are allowed to be racist, sexist and anti-Semitic. If someone chooses to hold up any of these beliefs, then they open themselves up to public criticism and condemnation.

We are allowed to criticize Helen Cullen for her views, we are allowed to debase what she said. By American ideological standards, she is wrong in her opinions. But hateful opinions do not constitute a stripping of her title because this would be a violation of her basic right to hold any belief that she wants. This would violate the freedom of thought that America supposedly gives to all.

Appreciating a mother's gift

Tara Ruelle

Every Mother's Day I'm reminded of all the women who have given so much to create and maintain a family. They are the figures we look for as children to dry tears, ease minds and plant dreams in our heads. Often times we forget or displace the idea that those dreams are part of themselves, things they weren't able to do in part or as a result of the constant tasks of motherhood. This is a small aspect of the sacrifices mothers bear for their children. In a world filled with despair and uncertainty they must distill hope and security into small, impressionable minds.

Being a mother seems like a thankless job 90 percent of the time. This work generally entails excessive worrying, constant giving and sleepless nights. There are no rules of instruction, no problem solving manuals, just a lot of trial by error and surviving by one's wits. I must give credit to these women who jump into motherhood blindfolded, with both feet. I can only begin to understand now what my mother has done for me, what dreams she put on the back burner for me, what aspirations she had that she replaced for mine. She did a lot more than change diapers and put hot meals on the table. She put her happiness, her hopes secondary to my own. These are the barely acknowledged factors of motherhood.

As little gratifying as the job sounds, so many women throw their gloves into this ring every year. I wondered if they ever anticipated becoming so selfless and absorbed in someone else's life. I wondered if my own mother ever thought she'd be giving so much of herself to two bald, toothless, uncoordinated people. I was dying to know how my mother did it. I'd suspected she'd say something about how hard it was or how she would've done something different in her life. Surprisingly enough though she couldn't put all her thoughts into words. She'd said basically that she couldn't imagine her life without my brother and I. She thought that we were one her biggest achievements, one of the best parts of her life. This was incredulous to me, for all the pain and burden she suffered for us, she found happiness in this. I hoped that someday I could feel something close to that for another human being.

These ideas inspired me to thank her in some small way for just being a mother, but so much more than that. The umbilical cord doesn't really get severed until you leave the house and start making your own dreams; even then the sleepless nights subside slowly. I don't know how or why women pull off this master performance, but I do know that there is no one comparable to a mom. There is no one I would rather call about a problem, talk about my life or share my life with than someone who knows me well enough to appreciate it. I would never be bold enough to say that I could fit into my mother's shoes, I just hope that one day she'll try mine on.

My mom's talking about heading back to school this year. Now that I'm out of the house, she can finally have a life. I can't possibly thank her enough for giving me mine. At least one day a year though I can tell her what it means to me to have her there.

Sayonara!

The staff of the editorial desk bids a fond farewell to our readers. As we leave UMass and enter the "real world," we'll try not to shudder as we think about our Collegian experiences.

Additionally, seeing that tomorrow is our last issue, letters to the editor received from this point on will not be printed. Sorry, we just don't have time. Like sands through the hourglass, so are the editorial pages of the Collegian.

Thank you all for taking the time to send in your letters and columns. We love you all.

Letters to the Editor

China's problem more than numbers

To the editor:

I was more than a little astonished, to no small degree, by the misinformed views of David K. Chan regarding China's population dilemma. In his column, "The inhumanity of China," Chan claims that China does not have a population problem. His only "fact" supporting the claim is his comparison of a few countries' average population densities. If countries with population densities substantially higher than China's can subsist, he argues, so can China. Mr. Chan leaves out one tiny detail: food. Somalia and Ethiopia, countries with chronic histories of starvation, have average population densities approximately one-tenth and one-fourth, respectively, of China's.

The real fact of the matter is that most of China's vast territory is arid, with the fertile land concentrated in small areas which also happen to be where most of its 1.2 billion citizens are concentrated. China's population has increased by 647 million in less than 50 years. Even under the new stringent child-birth policies, according to the president of the Worldwatch Institute, China's need for grain has not only exceeded its own food-growing capacity, but will also be nearly three times larger than world grain exports by 2030.

Without taking into account the growing grain demands of other countries such as India, Iran, Nigeria, Mexico and even the United States (whose population is expected to increase by 95 million over the next 40 years), China's situation alone will have global impact, resulting in rising food prices and dropping consumption, even in the United States.

As objectionable as the idea of China's "one-child policy" and the means by which it is carried out may be, I cannot help but emphasize the human needs of education, housing, employment and not least of all, food — all fundamental needs which are denied human beings unfortunate enough to live, and starve, under the conditions of over-population. Unless Mr. Chan has an innovative idea as to how to grow rice on the moon, I suggest he might consider the lay he's in in his "backyard playing with a litter of about three or four little David Chans" to be a luxury, and not a God-given right.

Biology faculty respond to article

To the editor:

As faculty of the Biology department we with to respond to the article which appeared in the Collegian concerning the allegation that students taking biology classes are required to perform dissections. We feel that this issue is an important one which deserves full and balanced discussion. Students in introductory classes are never required to dissect live animals. Students in these courses are responsible for knowing the material presented in practical labs, but can get this information from watching others dissect prepared specimens.

Students who elect to take advanced courses in a concentration within our major which requires knowledge of animal physiology or anatomy need the experience and insight for which there is no alternative to the humane dissection of higher vertebrates.

No students at the University of Massachusetts is forced to dissect even dead invertebrate specimens in order to fulfill a science requirement. Students who need to take courses in natural science and mathematics in order to fulfill distributional or general educational requirements have a wide range of courses to choose from which do not require dissection.

We define as the curriculum of our courses those subjects to which students must be exposed in order to be educated in ours discipline. It is no more reasonable to expect that biology majors will not need to be exposed to dissection than to mandate that English majors need not be exposed to the writings of Shakespeare.

The statements of the members of the animal rights coalition correctly identify the central issue as the morality of the use of animals to serve human ends. Most people feel that it is ethical to use animals for food and other purposes.

The remarkable progress in biology and medicine which has lengthened the span and improved the quality of life for both humans and animals would not have been possible without the use of animals in research and teaching.

Certainly we have many challenges ahead of us, including the conquest of cancer, AIDS, mental illness and heart disease to name but a few, which will not be solved without the continued humane use of animals.

We follow strict guidelines in his work and must continue to utilize animals in this way to train the students who will become physicians, nurses, and researchers who will provide health care and make the medical breakthroughs of the future. We have met with representatives of the ARC to discuss these issues and will continue to do so. We cannot redefine our discipline in order to meet all of their concerns. Since these students have alternatives to the courses which require dissection, we feel that by maintaining the requirements in introductory biology courses we respect their viewpoint without capitulating to their demands.

Letter attacks Jewish community

To the editor:

Helen Cullen's letter to the editor, published in the May 2 edition of the Collegian, is a vitriolic and anti-Semitic attack on Jewish people, which the editors claim they published as the right of "free speech."

While one may or may not question whether this is free speech, one can certainly question the "wisdom" of the Collegian staff to publish such an outrageous letter without any editorial comment condemning Ms. Cullen's attack on Judaism. To make matters worse, the Collegian staff became a pander to Cullen the day before by writing a letter to the "Members of the Jewish community" dated May 1, stating they "expect, and look forward to, a large response from members of the University and the Five-College community." They even offered to provide "extra space if needed to accommodate the response."

One such response, in the May 3 edition of the Collegian, was the antiseptic, benign letter from Chancellor David K. Scott which basically said nothing and in particular never dealt with the issue of anti-Semitism. As a proud alumnus I expect more from the chancellor!

Once again an attack on the Jewish community is being used as a means to an end. In this case, it's the Collegian stirring up controversy in order to bring attention to its paper. In the past the Collegian has diverted attention from those anti-Semites who write and speak more cleverly than Cullen.

Cullen responds to editorial

To the editor:

You have been grossly misinformed about my discussions with the student-editor Lisa Tannenbaum. Her editorial, on page 4 of the Collegian for May 3, was a total surprise to me. In no way did she, at any time during our conversations, let me know that she was experiencing any of the emotions that she refers to in her editorial. The only attitudes evident were firmness. She was firm and I was firm. That is all. It was a small room full of people. There were no raised voices. Here is what happened.

I came up to the front counter and told the woman there that I wanted to buy space in the Collegian.

She sent me to the classified ads department. I told the student who was there that I wanted to buy space for the printing of the letter and I handed her my copy.

She responded negatively and I asked for someone in charge. Soon, Lisa Tannenbaum came, very much in charge. I handed her the copy. She scanned it quickly and said that she would not accept the letter because it "targeted one group."

I had no idea what those words meant, constitutionally, so I said that I had the right to free press under the Constitution. She then said that the Constitution stated only that Congress shall pass no law interfering with the freedom of the press.

Her implication was that other people could interfere with freedom of the press, and then she proceeded to do so. She told me that she would not sell me space for the letter. She had a silver "star of David" around her neck, so I asked her whether she was Jewish. She said that she was. I then told her that only 3.5 percent of the population of the United States was Jewish.

She said that had nothing to do with this matter. I then said, "You are Jewish, and are emotionally involved. You cannot be objective. May I speak to someone who is not Jewish?"

She went and fetched a male student and told me that he was Irish-Catholic. He then proceeded to repeat her statements.

At this point, I believe I said "Do I have to go to a lawyer?" At about this time, the letters editor appeared and said that the letter should be given to the editorial department. I left with her and went to the editorial desk. This editor was Tracy Monahan. I explained to her that the reason that I wanted to buy space was to ensure that the letter would not be shortened. Tracy told me that the letter did not have to be shortened and that it would be published. I thanked her. On my way out, out of consideration and courtesy, I stopped to speak to Lisa Tannenbaum again. I asked her whether she had a Rabbi. She said that she did. I then said "Would you like to give him a copy of this letter?" She said "I would love to." I then said "I am really trying to help. You are young and you may not understand but I am trying to help." Then I left.

On my record of 43 years in the math department, the above is what happened, as best I can recall it. Consequently, I consider Lisa's column to be something for the drama class — mostly fabrication. In the column, she writes that she wanted "to punch me in the face." I never at any time had any hint that she was that close to violence.

Finally Provost Patricia Crosson, I was shaken to the very foundation of my American identity, when I read your letter to the Collegian. The students are young, still learning, still green and not too knowledgeable, but you are none of these things. For you, the chief academic officer of the university, the defender of academic freedom and the communication of ideas, to write "I am surprised that the Collegian would choose to publish such a letter" is appalling! What will the students think? What will the University community think?

The letter contained a listing of the historically recorded accounts of the interpretations of parts of the ancient Jewish writings by three important groups — the Mormon Church leaders, the Southern Baptist Confederates, and the South African, Dutch-Reformed leaders. All these groups have publicly gone on recorded stating that these ancient Jewish writings supported their racism. Most knowledgeable people know this! The letter had nothing to do with my opinions or my knowledge! Why shouldn't this letter have been published? The treatment of the Jews, or their antecedents, by these ancient writers is well-known and the story of Eve is known throughout the world!

So, Provost Crosson, I suggest that you go somewhere, sit down and think in a very concentrated manner and then try to come up with one serious reason why, under our Constitution, that letter should not have been published. I think you are going to be surprised!

Editor expresses gratitude

To the editor:

All of us here at mOthertongue would like to extend our deepest gratitude to all those who were present at our poetry reading last Thursday night at Cafe Mediterranean.

It means the world to us to learn that in only one short year our audience has expanded so much that we packed the place with over 70 people.

What means even more to us is knowing that all who showed up had a genuine interest in opening their minds to the culturally diverse poetry published in mOthertongue.

In a country that is presently dealing with the senseless and inhumane bombing in Oklahoma and at a University that is still feeling the aftershocks of religious slanderings it is very refreshing to know that many people here in our community still want to learn, and hear first hand, about their fellow students' culture.

I think I speak for all the editors of mOthertongue when I say that our feeling of gratitude extends from a warm sense of unification.

The demonstration by all who joined us at the reading of UMass' only multilingual journal proved that people do want to understand and get a sense of life (if not a huge serving!) from different cultures from around the globe. It also proved to us that our community here at UMass is not one that is solely interested in itself, but rather one that is interested in different cultures, people, and people's sense of original expression.

Above all, our poetry reading proved that our goal and purpose of mOthertongue, which was to provide a forum for students of varying cultures to express themselves in languages other than English, whether it be their native tongue or a language which they are exploring, was not only achieved, but was achieved with a sense of hope for our world, our community, and next year's edition of mOthertongue!

Thank you everyone!

Paper not at fault for running letter

To the editor:

I'd like to respond to a letter printed on May 9 by David Cashdan which stated that the Collegian was irresponsible in printing the highly publicized letter by Helen Cullen on May 2. I disagree with his perception of the effects of printing Ms. Cullen's letter on each of his three points.

First, Mr. Cashdan says that "printing an opinion gives it more power, whether it is true or not." How does this reasoning work? I don't see how a printed argument can be any more persuasive than the exact same argument put forth in conversation or in a speech. In fact, I think printing an opinion makes it less persuasive, since the person is not able to rebut his or her original point in the face of those who write in to disagree.

Secondly, how can Mr. Cashdan possibly justify the argument that the Collegian is "sending out a strong signal, intentionally or not, that UMass' main newspaper is anti-Semitic." If printing one letter sends that signal, then don't the dozens of letters that the Collegian printed in response send a stronger message that it isn't anti-Semitic? Even if they hadn't printed a single response letter, I think the vast majority of the people who even bother to read the Op/Ed page are smart enough to understand that any crackpot (myself included) can get an envelope and a stamp and write whatever they damn well please and have it printed.

Lastly, Mr. Cashdan seems to be saying that the best way to deal with anti-Semitism, and by extension, intolerance in general, is to pretend it's not there. I think the events of the past week have shown conclusively that this is not so. By printing Ms. Cullen's letter, the Collegian opened up a heated and (in my opinion) healthy deluge of enlightened debate. The best way to confront intolerance is to meet it head on. By turning our back on it, we allow it to fester in the underground. We don't solve anything by combating ignorance with the vast majority of us who are reasonable to analyze Ms. Cullen's flawed arguments and learn a little about the mindset that can justify such opinions. That is the best, and possibly only, way to deal with intolerance.

Letter opens reader's eyes

To the editor:

I would like to extend my gratitude to Helen Cullen for opening my eyes to the beauty that exists at the University of Massachusetts.

As a result to her absurd interpretations, a myriad of culture communities united in opposition. Intelligence battled Cullen's ignorance.

Controversy has surrounded the publication of Cullen's fiction. I commend the Collegian on its dedication to free speech.

This year I wasn't aware of Holocaust Remembrance Week; it was Cullen's parody that brought it to my attention.

Her rage echoes Hitler's dynamic hatred, but in this case, the UMass voice overpowers it.

Thanks to Helen Cullen for the reality check.

Others should follow China's lead

To the editor:

I am writing in response to "The Inhumanity of China," published on May 12. Overpopulation everywhere will be the downfall of the environment and a civilized way of life. All countries should follow the example of China and make some effort to save the quality of life for the future. The rate at which the population is growing is itself increasing.

As people find more places to spread, and the spawn of humanity infests every corner of the earth, the environment will be doomed. It is refreshing to know that at least one country is taking a step to avoid the inevitable cannibalism that will result from unrestricted breeding. Crushing babies' skulls with forceps is a small price to pay for a viable environment.

Queerfest met with opposition

To the editor:

As was reported in the May 4 issue of the Collegian, Queerfest met with opposition from a number of organizations and individuals on campus. More than once, protestors used the Bible to substantiate their claims that homosexuality is an abomination.

Signs were hung on campus stating "Adam and Eve not Adam and Steve." These are not new arguments. It is to the use of the Bible to condemn homosexuality that I would like to respond.

First, the assumption that the Bible is or should be the moral basis for all people completely ignores the fact that there are hundreds of thousands of people who do not recognize the Bible as such. However, I am one who does believe in the Bible and in Christ and, for that reason, I have done some research into the passages that are most commonly used to denounce who I am. There is not enough space here to go into depth with all of the passages, so I will consider only one.

One of the most common stories cited from the Bible is that of Sodom (Genesis 19). In this story, two angels arrive in Sodom. Lot invites them to stay with him, and later the people of the town come and rape them. God then destroys Sodom. This story has been used to say that homosexuality is an abomination that God will destroy. However, there is no evidence to say that the town's people were gay. The act of rape was used as a means of humiliation. Just as rape today is not considered a sexual act, neither were the actions of the Sodomites. It was for these sins that the town was destroyed and not because of a sexual act between two men.

This is only one example of how Biblical passages are taken out of context and given whatever meaning suits the person using them. Just as statistics can be easily manipulated to have a given meaning at a given time, so can the Bible. This fact needs to be remembered when listening to people who try to use the Bible to denounce other people.

In closing, I would like to say that the people who point to isolated passages to judge those who are different from them are missing the point of what is really being said. For those of us who look to the Bible for guidance, the message is that we are all sinners, but through prayer and practice, we can be given the grace to follow Jesus' example. He, by the way, never uttered a recorded word about homosexuality. Rather, He preached love and understanding.

Former GEO steward speaks

To the editor:

Now that elections are over, I would like to raise a non- electoral concern about the comments of Shyamala Ivatury (Collegian, May 2). She alluded to a white "clique" that supposedly runs GEO with the express purpose of keeping minorities out.

By its very nature, despite anything that Ivatury or any staff member can say, GEO is a union and the only "clique" that has final authority over everything it does is its membership. She, who holds the responsibility that I held over the last semester, that of GEO steward and organizer, is one of the people in charge of making sure that membership is an active presence at GEO meetings.

If there is anything undemocratic about GEO, it is due to our shortcomings as organizers, not some sinister conspiracy by a clandestine caustic Caucasian clique.

Nor is the strength of the union a moot issue. We may talk about institutional racism at UMass (and there is some to talk about) all we want, but in a strong union with its members support lies our only hope of forcing institutions to correct this racism.

If there is serious racism in GEO (something I do not detect, but that could be), then the answer still lies in a powerful union with an active membership. Ms. Ivatury's efforts have, to my knowledge, been primarily directed toward the opposite goal.

If Ms. Ivatury only sees fit to rail against a completely democratic institution like GEO, I would urge her to step down as steward of the chemistry department and allow somebody who does not see evil agents under every UAW button to represent the department.

At any rate, I urge the chemistry department to appoint an additional steward so that they may be represented by somebody who intends to help run GEO rather than attack it in libelous invectives against its staff.

McGrath misses point

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Mark McGrath's Op/Ed piece (Collegian, May 5) titled "Amendments used by idiots." I think Mr. McGrath is missing the point of the first and second amendments.

I agree with the idea that there are some people who do hide behind the First Amendment. One example is Professor Cullen's letter, which has been debated since it was printed on May 2. Professor Cullen's views are controversial, yet she does have every right to say them. In the same respect, I have the right to refute her views publicly. As Robert Underwood said in his letter to the Valley Advocate on May 4, "I will stay here and run the risk of being racially 'slurred,' it is much better than censorship."

Like Mr. Underwood, I would rather hear what someone else thinks and then go in and try to educate them rather than hear and read nothing but good things. In fact, if everything that was written or said was limited to things that would not offend anyone, his article never would have been printed. No one wants to be called a "lunatic" or an "idiot," no matter how much the rest of us think they deserve it.

As for the second amendment, I am all for gun control, as it seems Mr. McGrath is. However, the reason the Second Amendment exists is so that each state can have a citizen militia, which is one of the rights that Mr. McGrath says people don't even know they have.

And as for James Madison, I think he'd be pleased to see that his first amendment is being interpreted and used often. Mr. McGrath, if you want to limit the so-called idiots who hide behind the Constitutional amendments, you'd better be able to give up some of your own fundamental rights.

Grad student impacted lives

To the editor:

I send this letter on behalf of all the men and women locked away in this state. But mostly those of us who have had the privilege of knowing Bob Schapiro.

First, allow me to give thanks for allowing us the honor and opportunity to be an extension of your esteemed university. Our minds, eyes and hearts have been opened to the opportunities (other than crime) that we may explore upon release from the Gulags we are held captive in.

Second, and most important, is our sadness for the loss of Bob Schapiro. Though he is gone, he still lives in each of us whose lives he had touched. His caring was something that incarcerated men and women, rarely if ever, experience. He was not only our teacher, but someone who was accepted as a real human being. He never once accepted the perception of us that the Department of Corrections expected him to.

Instead he came to learn from us, as much as we learned from him. His learning came from understanding that we, like you, are people – not the vermin politicians tell you we are. We attend classes because we want to, not because we are told to and we were and still are eager to learn.

Myself and those I represent are deeply indebted not only to Bob himself, but also to his parents, who raised him never ignore or doubt human potential, but to encourage those in need of guidance to look inside themselves, because that is where true knowledge resides. For this we can't thank him enough.

We thank UMass for sending him to us as part of the Prisoner Education Project.

If only you knew how much of a difference he made in the lives of us who would have been relegated to the status of non-feeling, uncaring or not worthy of existence on this planet, you would understand why this letter had to be written.

In this place where humanity, dignity and self-esteem are usually only found in the dictionary, Bob opened the cover and allowed us to find not only the words and their meanings, he helped to show how they applied to us.

This was the joy of knowing such a person and we vow to never let this joy disappear, because if we did, it would be in our eyes, the most disrespectful thing we could do.

So we live to honor the man and continue through the door he has helped us open.

By doing this, he will always live through each and every one of us he has touched and we will strive to continue his work, both inside these prison walls and once we are back among the masses.

We ask all who knew and loved him to honor him by doing the same. We believe that is what Bob would want. I thank you all for your time.

Thank you UMass.

Thank you Bob Schapiro. You will truly be missed.

ANGRY SOUTHERN GENTLEMAN
Terrell
Pointblank Records

Why Pointblank recording artist Terrell decided to call his debut release Angry Southern Gentleman is a bit baffling. Nowhere on the album does Terrell every sound angry, southern or very much like a gentleman at all.

It is clear what image Terrell is in fact striving for — that of the debonair, but still rough, tough and manly six-string genuine blues man, but the fact of the matter is — it just doesn't work. Clearly stuck between a classic rock and a hard place, Terrell is more akin to the likes of Joe Cocker or even at times Bob Seger, than he is any notable Blues legend.

Throughout Angry Southern Gentleman Terrell spins tales of good times, hard times and fast times but rarely does any of it sound convincing. It's not that Terrell doesn't have the ability to pull the whole singer/songwriter schtick off, it's just that the album is marred by a crisp production that suffocates the "down n' gritty" feel that Terrell is aiming for on tracks such as "Strawdogs" and "Dreamed I Was The Devil."

Don't write off Terrell yet — he has the potential to take off and do much better things. Let's just consider Angry Southern Gentleman a false start. C (Matt Audette)

THE BLACK DOG
Spanners
Warp/Elektra

The Black Dog's release Bytes propelled the trio to the forefront of the British ambient techno scene, and despite their own self-conscious anonymity, the Black Dog collective, often working under pseudonyms, were lauded by such luminaries as renowned Scottish mixmaster Drew "Drummerman" Muir and Icelandic chanteuse Bjork, for whom Black Dog remixes garnered attention. With Spanners they fashion an absorbing, low-key listening experience consolidating the challenge innovators like themselves have posed to techno, and wider musical conventions.

The album opens with "Raxmus," featuring a female vocal fed through the computer mixer over a languid trip-hop beat, merging into the first of the quite lunatic sample-soaked "Bolts" which, uh, bolts the album with an assortment of impressionistic aural images. Rejecting Orb-ish self-indulgence, only "Psil-Cosyin" exceeds 10 suitably epic minutes, and is followed by "Chase the Manhattan," a haunting compendium of space conspiracy samples mingled with ineffable sound-effects which would indeed have grace the Orb's groundbreaking Adventures Beyond the Ultraworld.

"Further Harm" features inhuman sighs for all your chemical highs, whilst the closing "Chesh" is a minimalist finale, ambience in extremis. But as you have probably realized by now, trying to explain these sounds in words is like trying to communicate with Kato Kaelin. Just listen to, and be bitten by, The Black Dog — a bug in your system, and a Spanner in your works. B (Martyn Bone)

The three deans of Arts and Sciences and Nu Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are pleased to announce new members elected from the Junior and Senior Classes. Phi Beta Kappa is the oldest and most prestigious American honor society in the Liberal Arts. It was founded at the College of William and Mary on December 5, 1776. Yale's chapter was formed in 1780, Harvard's in 1781. During the next century additional chapters of Phi Beta Kappa were added and in 1883 a national organization called the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa was created. At present, only 237 liberal arts colleges or universities have been accredited by the national organization and permitted to form chapters. In New England only six public institutions are so recognized.

Candidates do not apply for membership nor is application made on their behalf. They are nominated by the chapter's faculty members on the basis of their academic records as shown on their transcripts. Candidates must be majors in one of the three faculties of the College of Arts and Sciences and must satisfy certain grade point, foreign language and distribution requirements set by the national organization. Approximately 3% of Seniors with the strongest academic records are elected each year; one half of 1% of Juniors are selected.

Jackson rides wave of success

By Ric Leyva
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Riding a tsunami of success, Samuel L. Jackson is most concerned with simply keeping his balance.

Prolific talent, an Academy Award nomination and a seemingly unending string of film roles haven't gone to the man's head.

There's always somebody else they can hire other than me, someone else they can plug right in," he says. "I know because I used to be that guy, the guy they could come get for one-third the price of the guy they wanted."

Jackson, who is making his macho action-adventure debut in Die Hard With a Vengeance, stays humble by maintaining a healthy distrust of fame.

"I'm convinced there's no such thing as 'made it,'" Jackson says. "And I'm still nowhere near being a huge blockbuster kind of star, anyway. I'm still just a worker bee."

Talkative and easygoing although he admits he's craving a cigarette, Jackson, 46, appears fresh despite the early hour in a brownish-charcoal suit. His driving cap is on backward, its kangaroo logo hopping across his forehead with each animated response.

Life has changed in many ways for Jackson after the Oscar nomination he received for his portrayal of Jules Winnfield, the Bible-quoting hitman in Pulp Fiction. But some essential dilemmas remain.

"I'm still fighting the same battles I used to fight," he says, leaning forward in his chair, the kangaroo doing a trampoline act on his eyebrows.

"I'm not the guy who sells tickets. The acting stakes go up when I'm in something, but not necessarily the box-office stakes. So it's hard to bargain for huge dollars based on that. It's just the opposite of what it should be."

His telephone may never stop ringing, but the Oscar recognition hasn't been all bad, bringing him higher profile scripts — and occasional fringe benefits.

"I don't have as much privacy as I used to have, but my golf game is getting better," Jackson says with a grin, eyes pulled into blissful slits. "People are inviting me to play at better golf courses. I don't have to play on the public courses like I used to."

Transformation has been Jackson's trademark throughout his career, so taking up golf in his mid-40s shouldn't sound particularly odd.

"I got out to California and some friends of mine told me I was going to start playing golf and I was like, 'Yeah, right,'" he says. "But they took me out there, and sure enough, I got hooked."

It was all part of moving from New York to Los Angeles, where Jackson lives in Encino, the San Fernando Valley suburb a certain reclusive, one-gloved pop singer's parents call home.

"I went from being a Harlem guy to a Valley guy, which was kind of a trip," he says, giggling now. "The only Black families out there are the Jacksons and the Jacksons, because I live right around the corner from where the Jackson compound is."

When he's not working, which isn't very often, Jackson stays grounded by resuming a "normal" suburban existence with his wife, actress LaTanya Richardson, and their daughter, Zoe, 13.

"It's easy for me to fall right back into driving my daughter to and from school, having dinner together, washing dishes, making up the beds, the whole thing," he says.

Preserving friendships that pre-date his success is another priority.

"I still sit around and watch basketball and football games with the same guys. We play golf together," he says. "We're still the same people, we just have different kinds of trappings around us."

Jackson's film career skyrocketed after doing Jungle Fever, playing a scheming junkie in a performance that impressed Cannes Film Festival voters so much they created a category to honor him.

Other credits include GoodFellas, Jurassic Park, Patriot Games, Sea of Love, Juice, Menace II Society, True Romance, Fresh, Losing Isaiah and Kiss of Death.

Grant disappoints in 'The Englishman'

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

THE ENGLISHMAN WHO WENT UP A HILL BUT CAME DOWN A MOUNTAIN Directed by Christopher Monger with Hugh Grant, Colm Meaney
Playing at Mtn. Farms Four Theaters

The first thing that indicates the makers of The Englishman Who Went Up a Hill But Came Down a Mountain lack creativity is the ridiculously long title which gives away the entire plot before the movie even begins.

Written and directed by Christopher Monger, The Englishman plays more like a mildly humorous fairy tale (which they deem an "epic") than a hilarious British comedy. The humor disappointingly takes the form of cuesy cliches (uh, refer back to the title) instead of typical dry Brit wit entertainment. Granted, Monty Python and Benny Hill are not expected, but this does not even come close to Hugh Grant's last film, Four Weddings and a Funeral.

Set in Wales in 1917, Grant plays an English cartographer, Mr. Anson, who travels with his partner, Mr. Garrard, to measure the town's so-called "mountain." Mr. Flynnon Garwu is the only pride and joy of the quirky people of this quaint little town.

The criteria for Flynnon Garwu to be placed on the map as a mountain and not simply be passed over for a hill is that it must reach an elevation of 1000 feet. When Anson and Garrard discover that it is about 20 ft. shy, the already present tension between the Englishmen and the people of Wales erupts into animosity, and the mountain-obsessed people become determined to put Flynnon Garwu on the map.

Colm Meaney's character, Morgan the Goat (everyone in this peculiar little town is identified by one of his redeeming qualities) leads the mission to make the hill into a mountain. Meaney is the most energetic of the cast, who adds color to his character and life to the film. Morgan also finds unique ways to keep Anson and Garrard in town for several days.

It is unfortunate that Grant spends more time flashing his huge grin than opening his mouth to deliver a few lines or jokes. His meager dialogue is occasionally funny, but most of the time he is awkwardly quiet.

The Englishman is a gentle little film that does not do much to keep you glued to the screen. While Hugh Grant devotees will flock to the theaters, true Brit wit genre fans will feel dejected by this film which will probably go down in the annals of cinema as "that movie with the really long title that wasn't worth it." Union Jack.

First track "Dog Tribe" then bursts in with the refrain of "primitive" — a devastating juxtaposition of racist rant and response which reverses the colonial epistemological propaganda so that the white man is recognized as the Neanderthal savage.

This epitomizes Fun- da-mental's anti-colonial perspective, in which they claim kindred with all non-whites, and in which the English and American imperialists are interchangeable paradigm.

Ah, yes, the music. Featuring blisteringly militant and intelligent raps, this cannot however be simply classified as rap or hip-hop.

Traditional Indian music brings a whole new dimension to those genres, whilst the sitar is reclaimed from '60s hippy chancers like George Harrison. "Fatherland" shows the influence of Anglo–American techno drumbeats, whilst "Mother India" is a refutation of alleged Islamic sexism featuring an enchanting spoken-word incantation by guest Subi Shah.

"Bullet Solution?" underscored by Malcolm's "Bullet or the Bullet?" speech, considers the image of Black youths assaulting an old White woman simply for being a "honky" and recognizes how so-called "reverse racism" is easily engendered by a racist White society. The song goes on to rail against the White colonial genocide of Afro–American slaves and Native Americans as effectively as the English oppression of Indians is derided on "English Breakfast." File under fundamental listening. A- (Martyn Bone)

PETER MURPHY
Cascade
Beggars Banquet/Atlantic

If anyone is recapturing the spirit of the '80s, it's Peter Murphy. Then again, he's had that spirit since his days fronting the ultra-goth Bauhaus.

Since going solo, Murphy has kept that underlying gloom while giving new meaning to the title "manic impressionist." With more intricate pop songs layered by densely, textured sounds, Murphy continues to experiment with sound in more accessible terms as evident on Cascade.

Murphy's perception of accessibility seems always to have been that of cheesy and memorable. On Cascade, he augments such characteristics to new heights as the album plays like a soundtrack to an '80s movie.

"Sails Wave Goodbye" and "The Scarlet Thing In You" fit that mold while "Wild Birds Flock To Me" is just plain memorable and "Gliding Like A Whale" is just plain cheesy.

Other things are still intact. "Disappear" is Bauhaus–esque in its morbidity while "Subway" shows the ethereal, warm side of Murphy.

For those who remember Bauhaus' cover of "Ziggy Stardust," the Bowie influence has maintained and progressed to Low–period muzak.

Cascade isn't exactly feel good music but, then again, Murphy has never been hip to the masses. With eras and styles running in perpetual circles, time may just catch up to Peter Murphy. C+ (Wayken Shaw)

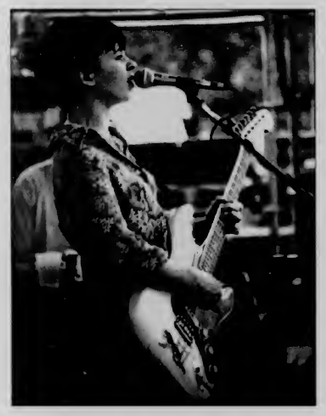
Spring Concert '95

This year's Spring Concert boasted five bands and sunshine, the combination of which drew thousands of students to the Campus Pond this past Sunday. The show opened with local favorites Knuckle Sandwich, who energized the growing crowd. Boston–based Machinery Hall took stage next, hitting the audience with something a little harder.

Throwing Muses gave a stellar performance, and despite their melancholy music, emerged as a crowd favorite. KRS–1 brought everybody back to the old school with his basic but bodacious rap. Headliners Blues Traveler made the final stage appearance of the day, delivering their much anticipated performance with energy and style.

DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN

Crowd surfing and stage diving were again the sports of choice at this year's Spring Concert.



HOLLY ANDERSON / COLLEGIAN

Lead singer Kristin Hersch performs with the recently reunited group the Throwing Muses.

EMILY REILY / COLLEGIAN

Machinery Hall, best in performing in small venues, tried in vain to motivate the audience.

At the April 10th meeting of the Faculty Senate, the following policy was approved:

University of Massachusetts/Boston credits and grades will be treated like any other credit transferred to UMASS/Amherst. This means that the student must earn a grade of "C-" or better to transfer the course. Letter grades earned at UMASS/Boston will no longer be used in the computation of a students' grade point average nor will the credit be counted as residence credit. This policy was approved to keep course transfer policies consistent within the five campus state university system.

This policy goes into effect beginning with courses taken in Fall 1995. Students who enroll in courses for summer 1995 at UMASS/Boston will have the grades earned calculated into their cumulative grade point averages and the credits will count as residence credit.

HOLLY ANDERSON / COLLEGIAN

Pioneering west coast rappers, KRS–1, pumped up the crowd with classic old school rhymes.

DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN

Thousands of people from all over the Happy Valley flocked to the Spring Concert for a day of music and enjoyment.

"The 15th place is disappointing, but the performances just didn't add up to points on the board."

There were other UMass competitors who just missed scoring additional points for the Minutemen.

Sophomore Matt Behl placed seventh (31 minutes, 19.98 seconds) in the 10,000, which was a minute improvement off his season best, and senior Paul Doyle (5,451 points) with a seventh place finish in the decathlon.

cross country season.

"Very rarely do you have everyone running at their best on the same day. If we had, we might have finished second. At a championship meet like this, everyone has to be at their best to do what we're capable of doing."

Julie Morcau showed few signs of trouble as she cruised to a fourth place finish in the 10,000 (38.58.03).

Rebecca Donaghue had a solid afternoon, as she placed fifth in the 1,500 in only her second running of the event. Donaghue's time of 4:39.59 placed her behind only a quartet of national caliber runners. The 4x800 relay team finished second, with Donaghue running the anchor leg.

Roberts, Forrest, Liljeblad, Meeks, Martin and Brown will represent UMass on May 20 at the ECAC Championships in Fairfax, Va.

their preliminary heat with a time of seven minutes, 2.1 seconds. The Minutewomen continued on to the finals where they crossed the line in 6:50.9, edging out second place Georgetown by three seconds while Williams placed third.

The second varsity eight boat also won their preliminary heat clocking in at 7:09.9. Later in the day, UMass won the finals with a time of 7:03.2, seven seconds ahead of second place Navy (7:08.8) and George Washington (7:13.6).

The UMass lightweight eight placed sixth in their opening heat with a time of 7:46.2. The crew went on to place fifth in the petite race clocking in at 7:41.5, ultimately finishing in 11th place.

Rounding out entries from the UMass crews, the novice eight placed third in their preliminary heat with a time of 7:14.7, behind Georgetown (7:12.3) and Iowa (7:04.6). The Minutewomen continued, winning the petite race thus finishing in seventh place overall.

Once again, UMass coach Jim Dietz was pleased with his crew's results. "We went in seeded No. 1, feeling pretty confident about our speed. However, both races were contested heavier than we expected," he said.

The Minutewomen now look to continue their winning season into the postseason with competition in the Intercollegiate Rowing Association Regatta (IRA's) in Camden, N.J. on June 1–3. Later that month, UMass will travel to the invitation only Cincinnati Regatta.

"The crew has momentum and wants to see how far they can go with it, especially the seniors. For them, this is their last hurrah," Dietz said.

Women's hoop team tryouts Thursday

By Chuck Schoffner
Associated Press

Teresa Edwards and Lisa Leslie make a comfortable living playing pro basketball overseas. Not that they are making NBA salaries, but they don't have to count every penny.

Now they're about to try for something that would force them to take a pay cut, and they couldn't be more excited about it. Edwards and Leslie are among 24 players who'll try out for the U.S. women's national team, which is expected to become the Olympic team next year. The trials begin Thursday in Colorado Springs, and the team will be announced May 25.

This will be a first for U.S. women's basketball — a national team that will play together for a year prior to the Olympics and also be paid. It's a rare, welcome opportunity for the players, whose only venue for making decent money in basketball is Europe — far from home, family and friends and completely out of the national media picture.

That will change with this team. For once, the nation's top post-collegiate players will be showcased in their own country. "In a lot of respects, we're pioneers in the same way Jackie Robinson was," said Tara VanDerveer, who's taking a year off from her coaching job at Stanford to coach the national team. "This is a whole new thing. It puts women's basketball on a whole new level in this country. Basically we're saying, 'Look at us and watch us play.'"

While the salary, expected to be around $50,000, is less than what top players can make overseas, the tradeoff is staying in this country for a season. For Leslie, that's a no-brainer. "Even if they put us in the worst state in the country, it would be a whole lot better," said Leslie, a former Southern Cal star who played in Italy this past season. "We can speak English. We can eat American food. I think this is probably the greatest thing that could happen for women's basketball."

The reason for picking the team now is to win back the gold medal at the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

After winning the gold in the 1984 and '88 Games, the United States settled for the bronze in 1992 with what was billed as its strongest team yet. U.S. teams also failed to win the gold at the 1991 Pan-Am Games and the 1994 world championships, getting the bronze in both competitions.

All of those teams were chosen only a few weeks before they had to play. Most national teams from other countries are together for years.

"It's definitely about time we start looking for a different direction, just for the sport to grow," said Edwards, who has played in three Olympics. "The foreign players are definitely getting better, due to the fact they are playing at a professional level during the season. They are getting professional coaching and they're playing international competition the whole year."

The competition for spots on the U.S. team will be stiff. It starts with Edwards, 30, the only U.S. basketball player, male or female, who has competed in three Olympics. Then there's Katrina McClain, who played alongside Edwards in the 1988 and '92 Olympics and is a veteran of 11 USA Basketball teams. Jennifer Azzi has been on nine U.S. teams, Dawn Staley eight, Leslie and Edna Campbell seven, and Shanda Berry and Ruthie Bolton-Holifield six each.

The trials also will have four players who have just completed their college careers, including Connecticut's Rebecca Lobo, the national player of the year. For Lobo, Alabama's Niesa Johnson, Tennessee's Nikki McCray and Stanford's Anita Kaplan, it'll be a big step up on the competition scale.

third in the country. The 1995 squad is confident that they can go again.

"The World Series is so doable we can taste it," UMass senior rightfielder Heather Dorsey said. "I'll say right now that this team is World Series–bound. We're in an ideal situation."

If the Minutewomen are to make it to the World Series, it would be extra special for Dorsey, who missed all of the 1992 season after a near–fatal car accident.

The only current Minutewomen to play on that squad is Kelly Daut, and the senior hurler would love to go back.

"I definitely would love to go back to there [to the World Series] and I know our team would too," Daut said last weekend.

Material from the Daily Hampshire Gazette was used in this report.

experience he missed early in college, but his size, attitude and underrated skills will keep him in the lineup.

• For fans of Eastern Conference (and more specifically American) teams, the playoffs have showcased some terrific hockey featuring Western teams and the east's Canadian clubs. The Chicago–Toronto series has played out in four of the most entertaining games this season. No traps, intense hitting, sparkling play in net, you name it.

On Sunday, a national audience watched the Diaper Dandy of Francophone goaltenders, Jocelyn Thibault, deny the Rangers a series win in dramatic fashion. That wasn't the story line Fox had hoped for: it expected America's Team to pull the upset and delight its core audience in the eastern United States, instead a foreign–born star ignited a foreign team to victory, an occurrence that seems, well, foreign to a lot of fans. Remember, hockey is Canada's game.

• Best goal of the Playoffs: Eric Lindros deflecting the puck off former teammate Garry Galley's skate into the net, which was vacated by Sabres' goalie Dominik Hasek.

• Worst goal: ask any Bruins fan.

• Imagine if the Blackhawks advance past the Maple Leafs and Jeremy Roenick is able to return to the lineup? Ten will get you 20 that no two teams in the same city saw their stars make surprise appearances and turn them into instant contenders.

• That may be a fake team playing in Vancouver, but it took a real grinder like Trevor Linden to wallpaper St. Louis' Jeff Norton through a pane of glass.

Men's sports programs face axe because of Title IX

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second in a three part series of articles on Title IX and gender equity in athletics.

Title IX has not gone without its victims.

Many universities throughout the country, in order to comply with Title IX (a federal law that requires equity among genders in college athletics), have cut men's athletic programs.

Among the sports that have found themselves in trouble of falling victim to Title IX cuts is the nation's entire men's gymnastics program. Currently, according to NCAA Legislation 18.2.10.1, a college varsity sport must have at least 40 teams in order to have a National Championship. In 1976, NCAA men's gymnastics had 138 varsity teams. Currently, only 33 varsity squads compete.

After a protest filed by the College Gymnastics Coaches Association (CGCA), led by president and UMass men's gymnastics coach Roy Johnson, the sport has gained a two- year extension.

"I am in full support of creating more athletic opportunities for women, which UMass has done a great job of," Johnson said, "but Title IX needs to adopt a proactive status for men as well."

According to Johnson, the way Title IX reads now, it eliminates "highways of athletic opportunity."

"How are we going to keep our kids busy and off the street when we're eliminating opportunities for them? I see it as a societal problem," Johnson said, "when we're eliminating men's Olympic sports. We're eliminating highways."

Johnson does not feel "threatened" that UMass will cut any of the men's varsity sports in order to create gender equity.

"UMass has a broad based commitment here," Johnson said, "but some colleges are cutting corners. You can't create equity at the expense of eliminating the men's opportunities."

> "I am in full support of creating more athletic opportunities for women, which UMass has done a great job of, but Title IX needs to adopt a proactive status for men as well."
> —Roy Johnson

UMass coaches and athletes share Johnson's position on achieving gender equity.

According to softball coach Elaine Sortino, UMass has never cut any men's varsity sports in order to conform to Title IX.

"During the whole process of increasing funding for women, we have not cut any of the men's sports, and that makes me feel the best," Sortino said.

Nikki Ahrenholz, a member of the UMass women's soccer team and Atlantic 10 All-Academic team said, "the last thing the women want to see is the men get cut."

"In order to equalize us, nothing should get taken away from the men," Ahrenholz, member of the Student Athletic Advisory Committee (SAAC) said.

"Gender equity is not affirmative action," said Kyri Sparks, a member of the UMass women's field hockey team and former president of the SAAC. "We just want to level the playing field."

Many schools in recent years have dropped non-revenue men's varsity sports such as gymnastics to achieve equity, claiming that there is no interest in the sport.

However, according to a poll taken by a sports marketing group in Dallas, men's gymnastics ranks as the eighth most popular sport, ranking ahead of NCAA men's basketball and football.

Besides gymnastics, other men's sports are on the brink of not having a national championship. Men's water polo and wrestling only have 41 participating teams, one above the NCAA requirement. Wrestling alone has lost 120 programs in the past 10 years.

According to Anne Goodman James, women's swimming coach at Northern Michigan University, there is a growing concern about the "stability of men's non-revenue sports in collegiate institutions."

James said that men's swimming, gymnastics, wrestling and volleyball are being cut from university budgets at an "alarming rate."

"Women's opportunities are not being increased much because 'proportionality' is being achieved by dropping men's sports rather than creating opportunities for women," James said.

At UMass, the number of male athletes has been cut from 499 in 1991 to 466 in 1995, but scholarship funding has continued to increase by more than $400,000.

According to Carol Barr, UMass sports management professor and a member of the university's gender equity compliance committee, UMass has no intent in cutting any men's programs.

UMass is coming closer to moving into Division 1-A football, which will require the University to increase its player scholarships from its current 63 scholarships to the minimum 85 for Division I-A.

"If football goes to Division 1-A, the athletic department will look at what women's clubs have the strongest participation and make them varsity in order to level the increase in funds for football," Barr said. "It wouldn't be right to cut other sports all together just the fat."

James, president of the College Swimming Coaches Association, agrees with Barr.

"Remember that when men's sports are dropped to achieve proportionality, nothing is done to help the 'under- represented gender.' We end up complying with the law, but not with its intent."

Bruins lack strength Tkachuk could bring

• A friend told me the Boston Bruins proved a lot this season, but the sad truth of his view is every team proves something every year, and the 1994-95 edition of the Black and Gold failed to prove it had the personnel and mettle to defeat a tougher, more tactical team.

The New Jersey Devils will go as far as their bruising, amoebic defense can take them. But I thought Brian Sutter might match wits with Jacques Lemaire and finally figure out a way to crack it, yet it was Lemaire's clever scheming that etched the last words on the Bruins' tombstone.

Ted Kottler on the NHL

It turned out they missed Al Iafrate more than anyone thought, as phase one of Lemaire's mission — driving back the power play point men to no end — severely burdened Ray Bourque and exposed Alexei Kasatonov and John Rohloff as weak links of the man advantage unit.

Don Sweeney had an excellent series, but he couldn't find room for his shot and neither could most of his teammates, which is why Iafrate might actually be a charter member of the new Minnesota franchise, bringing Melrose native Keith Tkachuk to FleetCenter.

The Bruins would also have to part with some draft picks to get Tkachuk, who would at last give Adam Oates and Cam Neely the left wing they need. Barring a lottery miracle, Boston owns the No. 9 and 21 picks in this year's July 8 entry draft, while the Flying Jets will select in the sixth slot.

• The Bruins must get in the habit of putting more pucks on net, and Tkachuk is comfortable taking 300 shots a year. Too many times in this series they were too patient and would end up with no good looks, particularly on the power play, which went 2-for-20. And the more physical presences that fill the Bruins' lineup, the more goals will come from their tireless effort that was so fruitless against New Jersey.

• One man who proved plenty to the entire league: Blaine Lacher. He was the second best netminder in this series, but that says a lot, as the man who upstaged him, Martin Brodeur, could have pitched one or two shutouts with two pucks on the ice.

Brodeur might not be doing his thing off Exit 16W much longer. This is the option year on his contract, and he's making $140,000, less than every other player in the NHL. But as any intelligent athlete would do, he followed his Calder Trophy winning season with an equally sensational year, and he will be rewarded in the millions.

But who will sign his new check? He's expressed a great desire to return home to play for the Montreal Canadiens, whose own French-Canadian goalie, the granddaddy of them all, Patrick Roy, just completed his worst NHL season.

Roy is a saint, but saints are old, yet Roy still carries enough value that Montreal could deal him for some defense, sign Brodeur and all might be forgiven on St. Catherine's.

• The Hockey News mentioned Mighty Ducks of Anaheim GM Jack Ferreira "thinks the team might have a find" in UMass' Brian Corcoran, who will play for Anaheim's new AHL affiliate in Baltimore. Corcoran must improve his skating and acquire the Women's crew wins National Championship

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, the University of Massachusetts women's crew were declared Division II champions after winning the Champion International Regatta in Worcester.

This victory marks the continuation of the crew's undefeated season, as it is the second time the Minutewomen have won the regatta in its short three-year existence.

The field of the Champions consisted of crews from schools throughout the nation representing Divisions II, III, and I-AA. Of the field, UMass was one of three Atlantic-10 schools competing, accompanied by George Washington and Temple.

With the development of Title IX, the congressional act which has pushed collegiate athletic programs to develop their women's teams, there has been an increase of new varsity women's crews. However, it will be a number of years before an Atlantic 10 crew conference develops.

UMass softball pleased with seedings

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

After the pairings for the NCAA Division I softball Championships were announced late Sunday night, the University of Massachusetts softball team had to be pleased with its seeding.

Massachusetts was seeded in a regional featuring three other Northeast Regional teams, Princeton, Connecticut and Hofstra. UMass will play UConn while Princeton faces Hofstra. The four teams will participate in a double elimination tournament with the winner advancing to the World Series. The four teams met up with each other two weeks ago for the Princeton Tournament, so everyone will be familiar with each other.

The Minutewomen were indeed happy with their seeding.

"It's good that we're playing close to home," Massachusetts junior catcher Michele Shaw said. "That way we can get more fans there. I know a lot of my friends will be showing up."

"The kids are excited because they know the field and they know the teams," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They know what they have to do. A week from today we could be looking to go to the women's World Series."

That is a realistic goal for UMass. The Minutewomen, although losing the season series 3-2 to the Huskies, played well against Connecticut. UMass defeated UConn, 6-0 before losing, 3-0 in the second game of a double dip in Storrs, Conn. In Amherst, the Minutewomen split once again, losing the first game 1-0 before taking the night cap 7-4. At the Princeton tourney, UMass lost 1-0 to the Huskies.

UMass was most successful against Hofstra, claiming the season series 3-1 with a doubleheader sweep in Amherst (2- 1, 4-3) and a semi-final win in the Princeton tourney 8-0. The one loss to the Flying Dutchwomen came in the round- robin portion of the Princeton tourney, 7-1.

The Minutewomen faced Princeton once this year losing, 10-5.

UMass is looking to reach the NCAA World Series for only the second time in school history. The Minutewomen went to the World Series in 1992 where they finished

Track teams compete at New Englands

■ Women finish in fourth place tie

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

After a two week hiatus from competition, most of the University of Massachusetts women's track and field team returned to the track, competing in the New England Championships at Holy Cross, in Worcester, Mass., on Saturday.

The Minutewomen finished with 51 points, in a fourth place tie with Boston University. Connecticut won the New England Championship with 157 points, followed by Northeastern (79) and Rhode Island (58).

Janey Meeks shattered her own school record in the triple jump, set just two weeks ago at the Penn Relays. Meeks' 40 feet, five one-half inches jump was six and 1/4 inches farther than her record setting leap at Penn, and good for second place. Meeks was unable to compete in the high jump though, as the two events ran concurrently, preventing her from competing in both events.

Kelly Liljeblad and Heather Brown both won events for UMass. Liljeblad capured the 5,000 meter title in 17 minutes, 3.5 seconds, while Brown won the javelin with a 142' 10" heave.

The solid results were a surprise given the wretched weather conditions that greeted the competitors.

"The whole situation wasn't good out there," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "[The weather] wasn't conducive to good results."

A multitude of other problems plagued UMass runners on Saturday. Lagging from a tough academic week, Anya Forrest seemed a little flat, despite finishing fourth in the 100-meter hurdles in 14.63 seconds. The time was well behind her 14.38 school record time, set two weeks ago at the Penn Relays. Forrest is now focusing on the upcoming ECAC Championships.

Nicole Roberts also has her eyes set on the ECACs, after a rough day at the New Englands. Not feeling well physically on Saturday, Roberts did not compete in most of her usual events, but did run the final leg on the 4x100 relay team that finished fourth (49.08).

Christie Martin shunned vicious cross winds, and a wet thrower's circle, to finish fifth in the hammer throw. Martin entered with the 12th best mark, but her excellent technique enabled her to weather the storm that hindered her competitors, and score for the Minutewomen.

After spending her spring suffering from bronchitis and other ailments, Katie Greenia ran the 5,000 in a solid 18:15.

"[Greenia] had a rough spring, health-wise. Her performance on Saturday was an excellent effort," LaFreniere said. "I'm proud of her and looking forward to a healthy

■ Tom Galligani defends his crown

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

In competitive sports, only the top athletes are crowned as champions, and it is a special athlete that can repeat such a performance.

Defending New England Champion in the triple jump, Tom Galligani, successfully defended his crown as he topped the competition with a jump of 47 feet, eight inches. The jump is just two inches short of last year's mark, when the weather conditions were much better.

Galligani placed second in last week's Eastern Conference Championships when he jumped only 45 feet, four inches, and his marked improvement can be attributed to his approach to the more competitive meets.

"Tommy is a big meet performer and does his best jumps under pressure," Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien said. "His mental approach to the championship meets, and his sharpness in training, is the difference in his distances from previous meets up until now."

The Minuteman captain will continue on to the IC4A Championships to be held next weekend at Fairfax, Va. He will be joined by two fellow Minutemen. Sophomore Ron Tauro will be competing in the 110-meter high hurdles, and junior Michael Masone will be throwing in the javelin competition.

Tauro placed sixth in his race with a time of 15.33 seconds, a large turn around from his performance of a year ago.

"Ronnie was 100 percent better this time around," O'Brien said. "His 15-second performance in the trials was just a great accomplishment, and he will get great experience as he competes at the IC4As."

Masone also grabbed sixth place with a throw of 189 feet, which was just three inches short of his season best.

Also scoring points for the Minutemen were junior Ethan Nedeau in the 1,500, and freshman Scott Price in the 200.

"Ethan ran the best race he has run since coming here," O'Brien said. "He put himself in position at the start of the race sticking to third position, behind the top two runners. He was right there to the end, but just ran out of gas."

After capturing the Eastern Conference Championships, the Massachusetts men's track team placed 15th at the New England Championships this weekend. In a day filled with great individual performances by several Minutemen, they could only muster 14 total points.

"As a whole, we competed well. I was very pleased with the effort and performances on the day," O'Brien added. "Our team as a whole is built on depth, and as the competition gets deeper and deeper, the guys who normally grab the second, third, and fourth places get pushed out of the scoring."

Serbs attack Old Town in heavy shelling

By Samir Krilic
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Vendors in the Old Town abandoned their goods to run for cover as the heaviest shelling in two years hit the Bosnian capital Tuesday, leaving streets usually deserted except for those who dared to dash across them.

While shells landed at a rate of up to three a minute, government forces and rebel Serbs battled for the city's front lines in five parts of Sarajevo. A 12-year-old girl who was outside when the fighting began was killed and her older brother critically injured.

By nightfall, 10 hours after the shelling began, officials reported the girl and four others dead and 25 people wounded — the latest victims of a conflict that has left 200,000 people dead or missing since Bosnia seceded from the former Yugoslav federation in 1992.

A French peacekeeper was slightly wounded by flying glass near fighting south of the city center, and a Russian peacekeeper was seriously wounded by an explosion in his barracks, U.N. officials said.

An armored vehicle manned by Russian peacekeepers was set afire by heavy machine-gun fire. The occupants escaped without casualties.

The usually packed streets of the Old Town area were deserted but for those who dared dash across streets looking for shelter or on business important enough to risk their lives. Shopkeepers abandoned their goods on the stands to seek cover.

Fighting subsided in the evening after both sides pledged to stop attacks and "react only in self-defense," said Maj. Myriam Sochacki, a U.N. spokeswoman. By 7:30 p.m., only occasional explosions were heard.

The Serbs attacked about 9 a.m. when government forces fired four mortar shells into Lukavica, a Serb stronghold southwest of the city, a U.N. official said on condition of anonymity.

The United Nations said Bosnian Serb forces apparently had been preparing an attack in the area of Debelo Brdo, a hill confrontation line south of the city, for some time. The Serbs wanted to eliminate government gunners targeting an important Serb supply road.

The government army said it repelled two infantry attacks during the day. The Serbs said two of their soldiers were wounded and claimed government forces suffered heavy losses, a report denied by the government.

Caliparis honored for continued support of library

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Basketball Coach John Calipari and his wife Ellen were honored yesterday for their continued support of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library.

The Library Instruction Room was renamed the Coach John and Ellen Calipari Instructional Room at a dedication ceremony yesterday morning. Since 1991, the Caliparis have annually donated $10,000 to the library.

With the help of the Champion clothing company, this year's donation will total $20,000, according to Julie Brigham-Grette, a representative on the research library council.

"These two people really support academic excellence to the highest degree," Brigham-Grette said. "It was felt it would be appropriate [to rename the instruction room]."

Generous donations

The money the Caliparis have given to the library is important, but the spirit and enthusiasm they have brought to this campus is critical, Brigham-Grette said.

During the ceremony, the Caliparis were presented with a miniature decorative quilt signed by the UMass basketball team. The quilt was designed and sewn by library staff members Nancy Bates and Janet Uden.

The quilts' artistic blocks were created by Lucy de Gozzaldi, Kathleen Dion and Lucinda Lucey, also library staff members.

"I'd like to frame it," John Calipari said. "It looks like something I should put in my office."

During the ceremony, Ellen Calipari expressed her disagreement with the media's recent allegations that Coach Calipari is unconcerned with the education of his athletes.

> "I know that [education] is one of the most important things he discussed with recruits," Ellen Calipari said. "It's a real concern he has for their future."

"I know that [education] is one of the most important things he discussed with recruits," Ellen Calipari said. "It's a real concern he has for their future."

John Calipari expressed embarrassment at such public acknowledgement of his donations. The library asked him to accept such additional publicity so the library's financial plight could gain a national spokesman through him, he said.

"I'm just thankful for the University of Massachusetts for giving me the opportunity to coach here," John Calipari said. "If the library thinks us doing things in a public way can help them, we'll do it."

Loss of staff

The donated money goes into the Friends of the Library fund which the Library draws money from as needed. The fund collected nearly $100,000 this year.

Although the library is receiving donations, 17 staff members are retiring early under the University's retirement incentive program even though a library the size of the Du Bois library needs about 50 more staff members than it currently has, said Jeanne Koesis, associate director for collection development.

The budget for books next year, which is $3.7 million, should be raised by $300,000, Koesis said.

"We've always had a problem with the book budget but now we have a staffing problem and that doesn't seem to get as much attention," she said.

According to the American Research Libraries report, the Du Bois library is ranked 77th in the nation, up from last year's standing at 94. However, before the major budget cuts of the late '80s, the library was ranked 40th, according to Chancellor David K. Scott.

Scott said the library is improving and "working its way back" to being a model of excellence.

SCERA phone-a-thon 'cancels' financial aid cut

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

In response to last week's phone bank held by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) "both the Senate and the House have cancelled plans to cut work study and Perkins loans," according to Marc Kenen, director of SCERA.

"[The cancellation] is a great tribute to students all over the country who have been working very hard on this issue," Kenen said. "The phone bank was very successful, students made over 500 phone calls. The phones were in use nearly all of the time."

Although the phone bank made some headway, the proposal to cut in-school subsidized Stafford loans remains alive in the House, according to Kenen.

"The Senate has proposed only cutting subsidized Stafford loans for graduate students, not undergraduate students, so we are making progress," Kenen said.

The phone bank focused attention on the two Republican Congressmen in Massachusetts, Peter Blute and Peter Torkildson because they were "borderline, and could go either way," according to Kelly Chamberlain, SCERA intern.

Torkildson is a graduate of the University, and is still paying his student loans from when he attended UMass, according to Mike Armini, representative for Torkildson.

"Peter Torkildson has not hesitated to break with Republican leadership on several issues, and [financial aid] is one of the issues," Armini said. "He supports keeping the status quo, which allows students to defer interest payments until after graduation."

Kenen said he was pleased with the response from Torkildson.

"That's our goal, to get Senators and Congressmen to support financial aid," he said. "I am thrilled that one of our Republican Congressmen is taking a stand.

SCERA had some trouble getting their message to Blute, according to Kenen.

"[Blute's] staff didn't seem to either understand or be aware of proposals to cut financial aid," Kenen said. "I am hoping they are more informed after the phone calls."

According to Chamberlain, most of the Senators contacted were already in support of financial aid issues.

"The general feeling was we had a lot of support in Washington," she said. "I don't know how much of a difference we made, but I know we had a voice, an impact down there."

The calls showed that this is something the students are not going to let pass, according to Chamberlain.

"Students are not going to take the backseat," she said. "A lot of students were very receptive because they felt they made a difference, and they did."

UMass Labor Council formed

Four University campuses come together for common goals

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Staff

Earlier this month, members of the labor unions from all four campuses of the University of Massachusetts joined together to form the UMass Labor Council.

The purpose of this council is for the four different campuses to be able to reach out to each other, so that the communication between all of the unions can improve, said Tom Coish, an officer of the UMass union, SEIU Local 509.

The council is made up of graduate employees, blue-collar workers, clerical workers, faculty and professional staff. It represents over 7,500 workers, Coish said.

"Our union initiated it," Coish said. "It was perceived that it was a great need. UMass was playing us against each other for layoffs and budget cuts."

According to Ferd Wulkan, a field representative for SEIU Local 509, the labor council's success on the Amherst campus incited them to expand.

Another reason for the forming of this council is because the unions are in salary negotiations for the different groups to join together and share information, Wulkan said.

> "Our union initiated it. UMass was playing us against each other for layoffs and budget cuts."
> — Tom Coish

The objective is to get a decent contract approved and certified, Coish said.

"The President agreed to a contract with the faculty, but it didn't go through the governor's office. So, we are waiting to see what happens with that contract," Coish said.

Coish said that he hopes that what they have accomplished on this campus, can happen elsewhere.

"We will be able to help the other campuses build coalitions with the Student Government Association," Coish said.

"It will benefit the unions as a whole."

The council will be meeting again in June, to further discuss the issues brought forward earlier this month.

According to Wulkan, the main issues of the council are the threats of privatizing food services, the increasing use of temporary employees and the opportunity to be able to work more closely with students.

"I hope that the administration won't be able to use 'divide and conquer' anymore," Wulkan said.

"If there's an issue affecting more than one union, we want to be able to develop strategies together, so that each union isn't off on its own."

BSU elects Lizana new president

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Current Black Student Union Vice-president Daniel Lizana will assume the presidency in the fall, supported by the also newly elected Kola Olasunde and Joanne Costard, who will take over as vice-president and secretary, respectively.

In a press release, outgoing BSU President Shomwa Shama pande attributed Lizana's narrow margin of victory to "the lack of leadership I as president have displayed during this semester," specifically citing graduation pressures.

"Remember, you do this job without pay," he added.

"The only thing you have to keep in mind is that you must defend the Black community against any assault, you must work to increase the number of ALANA students at the University, and you must work to unify the voice of the Black community on this campus."

UMass police looking into series of intruder incidents

By Tim White
Collegian staff

This past weekend the University of Massachusetts police department has reported three incidents of intruders entering a room while the resident was asleep.

This past Saturday at 2:44 a.m., the police received a call from an individual reporting she woke up to find a male in her room, touching her, police said.

The victim screamed and chased him from her room in Washington Residence Hall, police said. The case is still under investigation.

At approximately 4 a.m. the same morning, an individual reported being awakened by an intruder in her room in Brown Residence Hall in the Sylvan Residential Area, the assailant fled when the victim screamed at him, police said.

Approximately 20 minutes later police received a call from MacNamara Residence Hall also in Sylvan, of an individual being awakened by an intruder in her room who left when the victim confronted him, police said.

All cases have not yet been linked, according to police, and the identity of any of the assailants has not been found.

A similar incident happened this past Friday when a woman reported a man entered her room in Coolidge Residence Hall who also fled when the resident woke up.

UM restaurant Amherst's best kept secret

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN
The University's own restaurant, the Faculty Club, is one of the Valley's best kept secrets.

For 60 years, the Faculty Club at the University of Massachusetts has been "Amherst's best kept secret," according to club manager Dennis Scott.

The exclusive members only club is comprised of 400 members, with approximately 1,000 other non-members patronizing the club throughout the year, Scott said.

According to Scott, the reason for allowing non-members to frequent the club is that the restaurant is a "self maintained and self perpetuating organization."

The University gives the club no financial support, so the added community business gives the club much needed funds to survive, Scott said.

While club members are allowed to make reservations for lunch or dinner, non-members are only able to reserve for dinner. All are able to go to the club and be seated on a walk-in availability, Scott said.

In addition to being an esteemed dining establishment, the club also hosts many receptions for both students and staff.

The Faculty Club will have special Commencement Dinners from Friday, May 26 through Sunday, May 28. These dinners will feature expanded menus and reservations will not be required except for on Sunday.

The cuisine served by the club is highly touted by both staff and diners.

"My chefs here will equal any in the Valley," Scott said of his staff. "The food quality does equal that of any in the Valley."

Many professors are club members, and also the most regular patrons. Several said they share Scott's high opinion of the club.

"It's one of my favorite places," said Ed Connors, a professor of Math and Statistics.

Scott said he attributes the high number of professors belonging to the club to the fact that it has an atmosphere of "oasis" during the work day.

"Professors can get a great lunch or dinner away from their students and work," Scott said.

On an average day, groups of about three or four professors from the same department will sit at smaller tables for lunch. However, there is a group of regulars who sit at the "common table," said Dean Ware, a professor of History and member of the "common table" group.

This common table is a rotating group of about 20 or so regulars, all from different majors and schools around campus, Ware said.

"The table is well known among the faculty," said Oswald Tippo, retired Chancellor of the University of Massachusetts.

Tippo is renowned as the oldest member of the "table," and is the only member to have his own seat.

"No one would dare eat [at Tippo's seat]," Ware said.

Tippo said the best aspect of the table is that "it brings professors together from all departments and schools, and conversations are free and open."

Chancellor Scott's presentation put on hiatus

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The chancellor's recently released report which has stirred disagreement amongst faculty will not be presented to the Board of Trustees until the fall.

Although concern was expressed in last week's faculty senate meeting that there would be a premature presentation of the report's contents to the board, in a phone interview yesterday Chancellor David K. Scott assured that the report would not be on the agenda for the board's June meeting.

The report entitled, "Strategic Thinking at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, 1995-2000," presents its readers with an overview of the University's mission and an outline for its future objectives.

It was released in draft form two weeks ago, and many faculty were concerned that if brought to the June 7 board meeting, most would not have sufficient time to debate and discuss its contents, said John Bracey, secretary of the faculty senate.

"People need time to go over it line by line," Bracey said. "[These issues] are not going to get resolved in a couple of months — they haven't been resolved in the past 20 years. We're going to have to disagree on somethings, I guess."

According to Scott, the agenda will be connected with the development of criteria for the university system's investments and priorities.

"The process will continue on and hopefully we'll get an interim president in office soon," Scott said. "There are going to be continuous modifications every year to coincide with the campus' changing conditions.

Town meeting delayed until later this summer

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Town Meeting has been adjourned until June 19 with four warrant articles, 31 and 40-42, still left to be voted on. A special town meeting has been tentatively scheduled for June 21 in the hopes that the state budget will be completed by that date.

The issues on the town warrant include a vote of confidence from the town to better University relations, the future of the Amherst bicycling committee and the local Greenpeace chapter is seeking town support.

"The problem is that we have a special town meeting in June," said Bryon Harvey, chairman of the Amherst selectboard. "Knowing that, we decide J to push [the remaining warrants] to the same time."

Jon Hite of Amherst is petitioning the Town Meeting "to see if the town will adopt a resolution to the effect that the town strongly supports the select board, the Town Manager and our State Legislators in their efforts to obtain from the University and the Commonwealth far compensation to the Town for the unfunded services provided by the Town of Amherst to the University."

According to Hite, the petition is an attempt to try to settle differences between the University and Amherst.

"The town, as well as the University, is severe financial difficulties," he said. "The kind of relationship the town and the University have right now is not the kind of relationship that good neighbors should have."

Also on the agenda for the special meeting is a warrant which could require town school officials to report to the select board at the beginning of every school year.

"It was felt the school was going year to year with out any long term goals," said Marie Wickey, administrative assistant to the selectboard.

The resolution Greenpeace is sponsoring is essentially a show of support — a petition onto which entire towns like Amherst sign, rather than just individual people, Harvey said.

"There is no force of law in this," he said. "This is just a petition to the state and federal government."

The resolution calls for Amherst to oppose the placement of any nuclear waste in or around Amherst. It would ask that the state require town approval before any waste is brought in.

Article 31 will direct the future of the Amherst town bicycling committee. The Amherst Committee on Bicycling may be merged with the town Transportation Committee, a move that may have both positive and negative results, said Marianne Jakus, bicycling committee member.

"There might be a little bit of conflict," Jakus said. "But the process of working out on the conflict will be productive to working for change."

The bicycling committee is responsible for increasing public awareness of biking safety, reviewing all bylaws concerning biking, recommending bike routes and reviewing plans for town sidewalks and roads, Jakus said.

Although the special meeting agenda is still being compiled, the town hall renovations, purchase of local property and the sale of the Cushman school are several issues that may be addressed.

Opinion/Editorial

Big–mouth minority leader

I never came to this newspaper looking for popularity. I never wrote something I didn't believe in, at least at press time. Even if I rescinded on my ideas, the reader was the first to know I had changed my mind. The power of the pen is mighty, but not half as strong as the printed word.

I've been on limbs and bandwagons, fighting for what I believe in and what I've learned at the University for four straight years. I had always been a part of the silent majority — the Collegian allowed me to become a part of the wise- ass, smart aleck, big mouth minority here on campus. I became a person who wrote with his heart as much as he did with his head, and before I go, I need to fire off some parting shots to the Happy Valley.

• I wasn't good enough for the University of North Carolina–Chapel Hill out of high school, or at least that's what they told me. Instead, I came here. Now, the president of this institution might tell this University that it isn't good enough for him, he may pay his last respects and catch the next bus to Tobecco Road. Talk about coming full circle.

Then again, for the Minuteman basketball team's sake, I'm glad Hooker's the one who may be departing for greener pastures and not Marcus Camby.

One final thing, Mike — thanks for the aspirin at the UMass baseball game two seasons ago and, if you have any pull left at this University, can I have your job?

Art Stapleton, president of the University of Massachusetts ... it has a nice ring to it, I don't have a job yet, and I could really use the free press passes to basketball games for a few more years.

• Respect the students who feel comfortable enough to fall asleep on the couches in the Campus Center, despite how dirty and worn–out they are (the couches, not the persons). It is the ones who bring their blankets and pillows to take a nap in between classes you should laugh and make fun of, for they truly are the lowest of the low.

Rest is one thing, but planning is another. If you have that great a need to sleep on campus, go back to the dorms.

• For all the people who keep wondering how that Internet romance thing worked out and insist on asking friends of mine for updates ... get your own damn computer.

• That's it. My UMass experience is over, and I think I'm about to shed a tear for every drunken night, every weekend crush, every disappointment and every accomplishment.

Diversity. The University preaches it, and, although there is a selected few that does not accept it, I believe, after four years, that I've experienced it.

I've made friends with people who always underestimate themselves, no matter how cocky they should be. I've met women who can out–drink and out–dip men on any given night, I've met guys who don't always look for the one– night stand, despite popular belief.

It's that time of the year, when seniors get emotional and talk about leaving things for those who meant something in their life. It's my turn, now ...

For Timmy, I leave the ointment for that rash. For the sports desk, I leave my ability to write on deadline. A 70– line story in 30 minutes is key at midnight.

To my Notes from the Basement partner, Mono, I bequeath the need to mention John Calipari's name in a column. Oops, did it again. To the rest of my friends whom I can't mention by name, I leave you alone, because I truly know I was a pain in the ass.

Finally, to Marino, I leave a piece of my heart. You know you will always have it.

My four years at this institution are dwindling as I type, so without further adieu, thanks for the memories.

Arthur Stapleton Jr. was a Collegian columnist.

Notes from the Basement

"One more day. Of the Collegian."

So here it is, the last edition of "Notes" for the semester and my last installment as the columnist behind the never- changing headline. I'd like to bestow some gifts upon the University before I grab my diploma and run.

To Chancellor David K. Scott I give a spine. The letter about Helen Cullen was very speedy, but sadly lacking in anything beyond rhetoric. Oh, also I'd like to say thanks for the letter you sent after we printed the editorial stating that women are biologically inferior. I'm sure that the LBGA would like to thank you for attending Queerfest. Oh, wait, that wasn't you.

To President Michael K. Hooker I give a calendar and a copy of James Taylor's "Carolina in my mind." Gee Mike, your sense of time is all screwed up. In September of 1992 you said you planned to hold the position of University president for the next 10 years. Unless, we're talking dog years, you've been here less than three years. Go Tar Heels.

To Keith and Marcie Williams I give all my frequent flyer miles and two cushy jobs. Oh wait, you already have the cushy jobs, despite the fact that Keith is bailing ship. So you can keep the frequent flyer miles, to go from room to room in your "house." Sorry Marcie, but the concept of the world being a big house and everyone just being in different rooms is beyond me. I have buddies in Indiana, and they are in Indiana. They're not in the kitchen of my "house."

To Grant Ingle, the director of human relations, I give a copy of Backlash by Susan Faludi. Don't ever tell me that sexism just isn't the same thing as other "isms."

To the Student Government Association I give a copy of Robert's Rules of Order. What? Everyone in SGA already has a copy? Alright, instead I'll give the hopes that the new leadership is better than the old guard. Remember this: you're elected by students — think of their best interests.

To smokers who bum cigarettes off other people, I give directions to the Newman Center. Get your own damn cigarettes.

To the bars uptown I already gave all my money, so I have nothing left to give you. Save me a seat though, if I ever come back into town.

******

I'm tired of giving presents, no one else really deserves them. Instead, I'll tell you the most important thing I learned from my four years in Amherst. The so–called liberals that abound in the Valley are more narrow–minded than any conservative I've ever met.

As the editor of this page I have met more people who want me or my columnists to apologize for an expressed opinion. Just because you don't agree with an opinion or it offends you doesn't mean that someone should apologize to for their beliefs. This is a University community where intelligent discussion is talked about, but never happens.

By the way, I am offended by people who hold viewpoints like this and I really would like a public apology, or else I'm going to form my own task force to study the problem.

Incidentally, the First Amendment protects freedom of speech and of the press from interference by the government. A Supreme Court case involving the Miami Herald stated that no one is guaranteed access to a newspaper. You do the math.

Another tip for the campus community. The Collegian is independently run, meaning that when people come down spouting how it's their newspaper — save it.

******

Time to hand the keyboard over to the Collegian Business Manager Michael McRae.

MM: In case you didn't know it, it's summer in almost every other college town except Amherst. Even during the semester UMass has about one–tenth the school spirit of the average state university. If you'd like to know what a real college atmosphere is like, take a trip to Michigan State. Maybe you can carpool with Keith and Marcie.

Every restaurant, bar, liquor store and gas station in East Lansing is emblazoned with green and white, and various other pieces of Spartan memorabilia. You never forget where you are or who you're rooting for, as opposed to this area, where you see UMass tortilla chips side–by–side with UConn chips. It's about time that this town recognizes what makes it special. Go Minutemen.

******

Alright, here is the sappy senior part. I'd like to say thank you to everyone who meant something to me at this University. If you're not sure if that includes you — too bad — it probably doesn't.

Tracy Monahan was a Collegian columnist, will always be the Collegian Temptress, and had to call Michael McRae Collegian (lame duck) business manager to get his input.

It's more than just one person

And so it has come to this. It's time to write my last Collegian column. It is with some sadness, regret and in truth, a little relief, that I pen these final lines. In the two years I have written for this page, I have learned a lot about this place, and also about myself. But before letting this column denigrate into sentimental musings, I want to clear up a few misunderstandings.

It is important to remember that the paper is put together by people. You would think most readers would understand this, but too often the Collegian is seen only as an institution, as mysterious as some secret organization. Whenever I am introduced to someone new, the fact that I spend a few hours a week at the paper is inevitably mentioned. Even a few of my professors have treated me differently after realizing my employer. The Collegian is a brand, for better or worse, and it is a hard label to shed.

I am constantly at the center of praise and blame for the state of the paper. I can't possibly recall the number of times I have heard 'the paper just isn't as good as it used to be.' Or someone will comment on a comic they think is hysterical. The truth is, I am merely a small cog in the wheel. I don't make grand policy decisions, or draw comics, or design crossword puzzles, or take photos, or write headlines. I write editorial pieces. If you want to talk about them, fine, but don't ask me about Helen Cullen anymore. The fact she exists is simply not my fault.

That said, it has been an odd little ride at this paper. Anyone who knows my involvement at the paper can recognize that it has never been a perfect fit. I am secretive and paranoid by nature, which is hardly endearing to large groups. Though I have been lucky to forge a few friendships, I always feel that I am dancing to my own music, embarrassingly out of step with the rest of the staff. Everyone else is bumping and grinding, while I still can't do The Hustle. In truth, I have only been comfortable being a Collegian staffer lately, and that as a result of my role in the business office, not the ed–op page. People viewing this paper from afar don't see the personalities, and so they are missing the complete picture.

I had the opportunity last year to write on the same page as Michael Morrissey. If nothing else, it meant that people would see my work. In my humble opinion, he was the most important writer this paper has had in my two years. Personally, I didn't agree with a single thing he wrote, but he made people take him seriously, something not easily achieved at a college newspaper. What I will remember is the friendship. Morrissey is one of the nicest people you will ever meet, image notwithstanding, and is usually entertaining. I will never forget the night he smuggled his own beer into Delanos. It was sort of amusing getting tossed from a bar at 12:50 a.m.

But it was E.C. Thomas, the person who hired me, who became the biggest reason I stayed here at all. After a few weeks of writing, I wanted to quit. I felt like I was swimming through a school of barracuda with meat tied to my body. But she made sure I made my deadlines and that I realized the Collegian is not one person, but many. Even if there were a few people who gossip and backstab, there were others who find meaning in their writing and who ignore the inevitable infighting. She told me that if I could stay focused, the conflicts would lessen and things would work out fine. She was right.

She was a fine editor, as is my current one. I have been lucky in that regard. But it is the friend I will remember when she is gone. I don't understand why our relationship works, all I know is that it does. She is just motherly enough to keep me out of serious trouble (usually). At times, she can be nothing short of wonderful. Things will be very strange when she's away.

I don't want to gloss over the other fine people I have met. The friends I have here know who they are and how much they mean to me. I don't want to know, it's nothing if not blatant. Next semester I will play with numbers and deal with the paper's business. But I will miss writing. I will miss the death threats, the arguments, the deadlines. And I will miss the throng of Collegian groupies (you'd be surprised). But most of all, I will miss having so many people to talk to. Trying to come up with something people will read is a daunting task, but also a very gratifying one. I thank my readers for their continual patience and encouragement.

A.J. Stewart is a Collegian columnist.

The legend–making power of the pen

"I swear, in one year, you will be a legend here at UMass. Seriously," a former Collegian editor in chief, sports editor and, of course, opinion/editorial columnist said with a smile about a year–and–a–half ago.

What's funny is his legend still lingers on.

The name Mike Morrissey pops into many a conversation when the Collegian is discussed. The jerk who wrote the conservative editorials in this liberal world we live in here at UMass. That ass who was the target of a ton of letters sent to the paper is disgust after reading it. The instigator who sparked up a flood of political conversations.

And as the last week has passed, I have heard his name several times and have read about how he has affected people. A year has gone by, and Mike's name is still apparent on the op/ed page. Hell, when I mentioned to my editor that he would be in my column, she snarled at me.

But, to me, it isn't about Morrissey. It isn't about how his views, nor is it about his courage to express his thoughts on such issues. In regards to his pieces and the people who read them, or what kind of person he was, or how he affected my writing career, or how he is remembered.

It is about how he is remembered.

Mike Morrissey is just one example of many who affect people through writing. It exhibits how a person can put pen to paper, and touch people. How each morning, a person can immediately grab the paper, turn to the op/ed page, and see what the bastard has to say. They looked for him. They still talk about him.

The power of the pen.

Last year, I met this girl who used to live in my dorm. To make a long story short, we met one night, and she led me up to her room. As I entered, I looked over at the wall on the right side. In one strip from top to bottom were all of my columns lined up in a row. Every one.

You know how if you know someone pretty well, and they save your articles just to be nice? I didn't know this person, and yet I affected her so much as to post my columns, that stunning picture and all, up on her wall.

The power of the pen.

I was surprised, and flattered, when I saw the wall. It shocks me when people come up to me in class, in the dining commons, in the library, in the campus center, and in various other places. It makes me wonder when I get messages left on my answering machine or my mailbox. But then I think of the power of the pen.

I read particular people in books, newspapers and magazines, and it affects me just the same. If I enjoy something or can relate to it, it stays on my mind. If it pisses me off, it still sticks with me. Some have the knack of making their point vivid to the readers, and it is natural to remember something that affects you.

For instance, that is the only way you can put me, Andrew Bryce, in the same boat as ol' Helen Cullen. The power of the pen is just as evident in the loads of letters sent back to the paper objecting to her frighteningly ignorant, anti– Semitic views as it is for my no–brainer, attempt–at–making– a–few–people–chuckle columns. The rage that was felt by much of the student body and faculty was expressed in writing just like the distorted viewpoint of Cullen.

With my pen, I want to make the reader smile while reading my column. I want people to relate to the things I talk about. And if they don't like it? That's fine. They may crap all over it by making their own judgements, but they read it. And that's the only way you can display the power of the pen.

I don't know if Morrissey knew what he meant when he said I was going to be a legend. Did he mean I was going to be a popular student on a gigantic campus? No, I don't think so. Did he mean I was going to be loved by all who read me? Of course not.

I think he was attempting to tell me how powerful writing on a college newspaper's op/ed page can be. Here we are at a college along with 23,000 other students, feeding the brain with and seeking valuable knowledge. They soak up the page of expression, and some actually rubs off on them.

The others you see on this page today are writing their last columns at UMass. They were regular writers you have read for the past few years. You have agreed with them, you have disagreed with them. But, most of all you have read them. You have been affected.

That's the power of the pen.

Crimson Tide barely keeps its head above water

By Jon Lupo

CRIMSON TIDE
Directed by Tony Scott
with Gene Hackman, Denzel Washington
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Crimson Tide is about penises.

It's also a Cold War thriller, but it's mostly about the masculine might of two distinctly different heroes: Gene Hackman is the old guard, a trigger–happy cousin to Jack Nicholson in A Few Good Men while Denzel Washington is the sensitive new guy, who wants to know for sure if he's about to annihilate the world. So basically it's a contest of wills trapped deep inside that sleek phallic submarine with time running out and the fate of the world in their hands.

Only in a summer movie could this dual quest (save the world/who has a bigger dick) be wrapped in the guise of matinee entertainment. And considering it's practically the only genre Hollywood can do well with any sort of regularity, we should be thankful for what we get, right? But while Crimson Tide has a stellar hook as well as two great actors to duke it out, there's a pretty big problem with all these macho thrills: it's too macho and not thrilling enough.

The trick with using nuclear holocaust as your big gun is that since no Hollywood movie in its right mind (read: $$) would end a movie with the world blowing up, it needs to have plenty of other bells and whistles to keep the audience from continually remembering (and caring about) this fact. Since the brunt of Tide's plot hinges on whether or not we're supposed to launch our missiles against Russia (the key communiqué was cut off during an attack), it's a fool's quest. (If I'm truly spoiling the end for anyone — well, you need to see more movies.)

A similar problem faced this spring's Outbreak; there was no way a virus was going to wipe out America. The producers knew this and were clever enough to throw in enough suspenseful diversions to offset the eventual predictability. Whether or not you approved of the diversions (I was one of the few who did), Outbreak was slick enough to enable the audience to suspend their disbelief for a couple of hours while Hollywood delved into its bag of tricks.

Crimson Tide isn't nearly as successful. Its backup hook is the tug of war between Hackman and Washington. While there's initial distrust and some discord between them, they both seem professional enough to get the job done. But when the temperature is raised, they clash — big time. There's so much testosterone flying here (a scorecard to keep up with the mutinies may be needed), you just want them to whip their uh, euphemisms out — right there on the bridge — and see whose is bigger.

But the conclusion is a bit of a wash: to find out that they're both right and wrong isn't exactly the finish we're looking for (especially in contrast to the weak nuclear war plot resolution). It's less a nerve–splitting finale than a reverent passing of the baton. Which may be precisely the point, however, this unsun between apocalyptic thrills and mediated ambiguity is a shaky allegiance indeed. Crimson Tide doesn't follow through on either idea enough for it to register on the screen — they both end up seeming like cop– outs.

The true intention of director Tony Scott (Top Gun, Days of Thunder, True Romance) may have been to create a slick but thoughtful summer actioner. However, Crimson Tide just ends up reminding of other, better movies. Obvious debts to The Hunt for Red October, The Caine Mutiny and A Few Good Men notwithstanding, it's most interesting how Tide comes dangerously close to playing like a serious riff on the satirical submarine sequences in Dr. Strangelove (with Hackman in the Slim Pickens role). This is not a compliment.

While the movie careens back and forth between its gut and its conscience, Hackman and Washington thankfully remain constant. Actually, Hackman is getting good at portraying sort–of sociopathic bastards. In Unforgiven and the recently underrated The Quick and the Dead, Hackman has a way of making his meanness commendable, even honorable. And Washington, with the tougher role since he

'Mr. Lupo' reminisces on four critical years

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

The French filmmaker Jean Cocteau once wrote that film "is a petrified fountain of thought." While it's a nice sentiment, I shudder to think that there's a forest somewhere with petrified Indecent Proposals and Forrest Gumps. Nevertheless, if film is indeed this eternal, you'd think a movie review (or reviewer, for that matter) would at least have a hearty half–life.

While I won't hold my breath, I certainly hope my reviews over the last four years have guided some positive moviegoing and averted some bad film experiences. Hey — if I prevented someone, somewhere from seeing Hoffa, I feel my job has done some good. Because, if I didn't see The Crush, Cop and a 1/2 and Jack the Bear in one day and live (barely) to tell about it, who would?

But this job has also allowed be to see some truly great movies and to have the chance to write about them. When it all comes together, it's the best job in the world. And it's always been interesting to follow things through. For example, when I put the then–unknown Reservoir Dogs on my 10 best list for 1992, proclaiming Quentin Tarantino as the best new American director, who would have thought I'd be spending endless column inches two years later slamming Tarantino as an insular hack who, with only two films has already become creatively redundant. (You can't believe the flack I got for my sort–of negative Pulp Fiction review and even when I placed it number eight on my 10 best list, people were complaining it was too low on the list.)

I also never thought at this moment in time, the TV column takes a final bow

Tarantino–directed 'ER' & Miss Universe highlight week

When I was nine years old, my crowning achievement was my ability to flawlessly recite a grueling ten-minute Sports Illustrated commercial, complete with recreated grunts and groans from Super Bowl XVII. That was my "hobby" during the early '80s — memorizing and rehearsing the best (and most frequently replayed) ads on television.

From Folgers coffee to Camay soap — I knew them all. In those days, Tuesday was THE night to watch — with "Happy Days," "Laverne and Shirley," "Three's Company," "Too Close For Comfort," and "Hart to Hart" comprising ABC's totally cool prime-time lineup. And then, of course, Fridays were reserved for "The Greatest American Hero," during which I and my best pal Mark would usually be crashing enthusiastically into my mother's couch — both of us pretending we were clumsy series star William Katt.

A psychologist might tell you that what you remember from your childhood is the key to deciphering the mature adult figure you've become. We're all haunted, to some degree by painful remembrances of childhood violence, neglect, or isolation — but some of us experience them first-hand, while a lucky few of us only recall being freaked out by the "Diff'rent Strokes" episode in which Dudley was nearly molested by "WKRP's" Gordon Jump. Diagnosis: You watch too much TV. And I always have, ever since I was nine and even before that.

Tube Notes
By Tracy Gavel

Writing this column has given me an excuse for the past year, but even after this last article is finished and my career as a Collegian columnist is but a memory, the TV will continue to be my constant companion through good times and bad, graduate school and beyond.

But before I wrap it up for good, perhaps a word about last week's episode of "ER," as directed by overrated filmmaker Quentin Tarantino. Frankly, I wasn't all that impressed. I mean, admittedly, Tarantino's work in Pulp Fiction frequently left me more annoyed than captivated, but I still expected a few surprised from a guy who some critics have hailed as a modern movie genius. Unfortunately, while Tarantino's contribution is as slick and fast-paced as most of the series episodes, it never manages to become anything more.

Now, more than ever, I feel that for a truly absorbing look into the routines and personalities of health care workers, "Chicago Hope" is the medical drama to turn to. Like NBC's "Friends," "ER" flash and quick wit makes it watchable, but the show frequently fails to penetrate beyond its own superficial surface.

On the other hand, sometimes the quality of superficiality that naturally accompanies a sweeps month is vastly underrated. Take the Miss Universe pageant, which aired on CBS last week. Sure, it's tacky and sexist, but when Miss USA won the title for the first time in God knows how many years, I cheered anyway. Even the usually tiresome "Late Show" got a jolt of absurd energy with its temporary relocation to London, thanks to first–time Letterman guest Elton John and the return of Dave's mom as his cheerfully goofy foreign correspondent/tour guide. I think Letterman will have to work harder, though, if he wants to maintain his status as late night king — Conan O'Brien already has a funnier hairstyle, and the quality of his skits is catching up fast.

By the way, even though I won't have an opportunity to review these shows officially, I'm still going to recommend NBC's "Elizabeth Taylor Story" (May 21) and NBC's thriller "Gramps" (May 20, starring long–time lovable TV staple Andy Griffith as a sinister grandparent) for the unintentional laughs that I hope will make up for their lapses in good taste. They should at least be more entertaining than all the boring wedding stuff that nearly every show is passing off as their dramatic season finale.

Which reminds me, don't anyone forget to say farewell to "Blossom" on the 22 — what I'll do without Joey Lawrence to fulfill my most secret leftover adolescent fantasies, I just can't say. And while I'm celebrating my birthday on the 23, the rest of the country can also rejoice over seeing the smarmy, long–running sitcom "Full House" come to a long — awaited end. Now that's a gift in itself, if you ask me.

At this point in my column, I was going to offer a few suggestions to ABC about placing "My So–Called Life" in a workable slot in the fall schedule. I was going to remind them that even such classic shows as "Cheers" and "Cagney and Lacey" flopped during their first seasons. I was going to talk about the benefits of using established hit series to build up little–seen, but high quality projects like "MSCL." I was going to say a lot of things, until fellow devotee and Collegian film critic Jon Lupo informed me that the show wasn't being picked up for next season. This is the dark side of network television — the insatiable hunger for ratings — that I can't say I'm proud of.

But, I guess, even television can't be perfect. Maybe it shouldn't be. I'll tell you viewers a secret: while I yearn for programming that features a delicate blend of strong acting and compelling story–lines, as a critic I would be lost without such a wealth of bad shows — such as "Saturday Night Live" and "Ricki Lake" — to provide me with stuff to make fun of. I'm not ashamed to say that all of these shows — from the sensitive and witty to the ridiculously lame, make up a huge part of my life.

But some of you out there probably don't understand this. Maybe you haven't watched "Siskel and Ebert" for so many years that you hold opinions of movies you haven't seen, and maybe you don't have a little "General Lee" car that sits in a place of honor on your desk — reminding you of those good ole' nights long ago with "The Dukes of Hazzard." Maybe you even have a life. But, if there's even a grain of truth in that Woody Allen quote that appeared in the Collegian last week, about how life imitates bad television, then maybe I'm actually ahead of the game, after all.

'Melrose' wedding all–day affair

By Anh Bui
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — An invitation to be an extra on the season finale of "Melrose Place" gets you 10 1/2 hours of wandering around a sprawling San Fernando Valley estate, taking inventory of an eye-popping assortment of munchies in the garage and watching decidedly glamourous people do decidedly unglamourous things like read golf magazines.

On this balmy, picture-perfect day in April, the bride would be the first to tell you that all that's glitzy is not gold.

In Aaron Spelling country, Kristin Davis plays Brooke, the conniving, spoiled-rotten young lady who's pulled all the strings to rope her man into this wedding. (The episode airs 8 p.m. EST Monday, May 22, on Fox.)

"I played a bride in Shakespeare, but I've never been like a big Spelling to-do bride," Davis cheerfully confided to a gaggle of reporters-turned-wedding guests.

Once the camera started rolling an element of elegance took over. The perfectly manicured garden with its pond and abundance of flowers, chirping birds and bower of white and lavender blossoms conjured up dreams of fairy tale nuptials. It's a by-the-book wedding in which groom Billy (Andrew Shue) and best man Jake (Grant Show) wear dark gray tuxedos with tails. Maid of honor Amanda (Heather Locklear) demurely holds the bouquet without a hint of her trademark cattiness.

But because this is "Melrose Place" and it is the two-hour season finale, the wedding can't go off without a hitch. Suffice it to say that extras were given plenty of time to rehearse shocked expressions and outraged gasps.

In between takes, the regular cast exchanged the stiff-backed glamour for relaxed nonchalance. Actress Josie Bissett replaced her 3-inch platforms with a pair of sneakers, Locklear slipped a denim jacket over her bare shoulders and chuckled over a copy of Jerry Seinfeld's book SeinLanguage.

Show retreated to a corner to flip through Golf Digest and chew on a Bit O'Honey from the Garage O'Plenty.

By the time filming of the ceremony began, extras who got seated on the sunny side of the wedding scene were enviously eyeing those who got put in the shade. Crew members busily put up and took down screens to keep pace with the sun.

Still, the fun and palaver of being an extra on a hit prime-time soap definitely tickled some.

Greg Butts is a real-life neighbor to the folks who loaned their house to the "Melrose" crew for the wedding. He and his fiancee initially got invited to watch the proceedings, then, to his evident delight, to join in.

For the reporters who were faring about as well as some of the flowers after 10 hours in the sun, producer Chip Hayes had some reassuring words.

"This was a short day," he said robustly. "Usually it's a 12-hour day."

best new American director (in my uh, humble opinion) would be Richard Linklater, the same guy who impressed (if not too much) with his 1991 debut, Slacker. But through Dazed and Confused and Before Sunrise, Linklater proved to be the only new director who, instead of retreading the new violent chic (popularized by my good buddy Tarantino), created a string of films filmed with humanity. How many movies and new directors can you say that about?

Okay, okay, enough criticizing. Over the last four years of classes and numerous regimes of the Collegian, I've met an extraordinary amount of people who have made a difference in my life, both as a writer and a journalist. And while I'm not too much for sentiment, it's hard not to list these names in vain without really gauging my debt to them. Anyway, here goes:

As for my academic career, I owe uncalculatable thanks for helping me grow as a writer and individual to Carolyn Anderson, Tim Shary, Helen von Schmidt, Doug Whynott and Carol Donelan as well as offering gracious gratitude to Jack Cameron, Richard Stromgren, Marty Norden, Don Levine, Susan Doyle, John Shields and Katie Lebesco.

As for the Collegian, I tip my hat (you can tell I'm running out of euphemisms) to Paul DeGeorges for giving me my first shot (on the first day of my freshman year) as well as my many editors: Lisa Curtis, Emily Marino and Matt Audette. I thank Emily and Tara MK Connelly for enduring long, sometimes vicious editing sessions (I fought for every long dash). I also thank my critical colleagues: Ed Humphries for his always clever turn of a phrase, Dan Pelligrini for putting the "friction" in our Pulp Fiction debate and Laura Stock and Mike Pessah for intrepidly taking the reigns.

For their support and sense of humor, I thank, in no particular order: Binary woman herself, Tracy Monahan; Christina Orwicz; Caleb Cochran; Mike MacLean; Matthew Justin Feerber; Adam Goulston; Martin Brown; E.C. Thomas; Adam Scott Roberts; Brian Babineau; Marni Helfner; Art Stapleton; Chris Conner; fellow lifer Darienne Hosley and honorary Collegian–ite Jeff Clouter as well as everybody else I forgot.

It's been fun. Thank you.

■ 'Crimson Tide'

isn't allowed the gruff scenery–chewing Hackman's character swims in, proves steady and assured. However, all of this posturing (no matter how good) comes at the expense of other characters, none of whom are distinguishable from another, all shouting out commands like "Up 2 on Level 9; Alpha, Delta, Zero bubble!" that sound like tense dialogue but end up just sounding vaguely funny.

Not even polished dialogue from Quentin Tarantino can rescue this ship from sinking, undone by a schizophrenic script unable to decide what kind of movie it is. While most of America won't care, it's movies like Crimson Tide that prove how hard it really is to make action pictures (like Die Hard or Speed) that know how to be both pulpy fun and sort–of intelligent entertainment (even if you've got Keanu Reeves). Sometimes, you can have it both ways. With Crimson Tide, however, all you get is a phallic morality play in summer movie drag. And it's pretty limp. C+

'Trek' books get mixed reactions

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

STAR TREK: VOYAGER THE ESCAPE
Dean Wesley Smith and Kristine Kathryn Rusch
Pocket Books

The first original novel based on the "Star Trek: Voyager" series, this book brings the reader back to the basic concept behind "Star Trek" — exploring the galaxy.

The Voyager, in need of routine maintenance but without access to a Federation starbase, is in search of raw materials. After an unsuccessful attempt in an astroid belt, Neelix leads Voyager to what appears to be a starship graveyard, a planet full of broken down and deserted ships with the rumor of being haunted.

While trying to retrieve parts, Neelix, Ensign Harry Kim and Lt. Torres find themselves inadvertently transported to an alien culture 300,000 years in the past. Unknowingly, they commit the capitol crime of inter–period travel and must throw their hopes upon a bureaucracy spanning a billion years.

Captain Janeway begins a search on what has become of them when the three disappear. While searching, the new team encounters a would be poltergeist trying to thwart their efforts. Tuvok and Lt. Paris soon find out their ghost is flesh and blood and it informs them about a race that has conquered time travel without ever leaving their planet.

The culture created within the book is both believable and genuine. All levels of their society are brought out in this book. Simple things, such as explaining how paradoxes are avoided, law based on time–travel and culture specific vernacular are all included.

The characters in the show remain true throughout the book. B'Elanna Torres stays passively violent, Tuvok remains exceptionally Vulcan and Kathryn Janeway is still the indomitable captain attempting to deal with an out–law crew 70,000 light years from home.

While the "Star Trek: The Next Generation" book series has begun printing recycled, grandiose plot lines where the entire galaxy could explode during every novel, the first of the Voyager series brings a fresher, more personal story dealing with the rescue of three characters which is more than enough for this book.

STAR TREK: DEEP SPACE NINE WARPED
K.W. Jeter
Pocket Books

Too much, too technical and too ridiculous — this books initial potential was shot into deep space with stupid one– liners and a plot that was a fuzzy reflection of the second season finale.

The first hardcover of the "DS9" series, Warped puts Bajor in danger of yet another coup from an anti–federation faction of the Bajoran provisional government. Added to this is the presence of illegal holodeck technology that even Quark, the unscrupulous Ferengi, stays away from. The psychologically addictive technology entices almost everyone, including Jake Sisko, the commander's son.

Enter Bajoran politician and coup supporter, McHough, a past "business" partner of Quarks, who plans to turn Bajor into a frontier town complete with brothels, casinos and the addictive holodeck technology. Throughout the book, McHough becomes the object of everyone's frustration and the author attempts to write both witty and puerile one–line fantasies on how everyone thinks up ways to cause McHough various forms of bodily harm in diverse and creative ways. It get's old real quick.

No "Star Trek" fan could ever take this book seriously. The mind reading abilities of the holodeck technology has been stated in the series to be non–existent; the scientific explanations, albeit "Star Trek" explanations, lacked the traditional grace and make–believe authenticity of the series; and the political struggle is played out yet again to the extreme.

Its one saving grace is its clear political statement which can be correlated with casino gambling on Indian reservations. Reflections of our own society and exposing us to others is another vital ingredient of good "Star Trek." A bit more of these ingredients and this book might actually have been readable.

At the April 10th meeting of the Faculty Senate, the following policy was approved:

University of Massachusetts/Boston credits and grades will be treated like any other credit transferred to UMASS/Amherst. This means that the student must earn a grade of "C-" or better to transfer the course. Letter grades earned at UMASS/Boston will no longer be used in the computation of a students' grade point average nor will the credit be counted as residence credit. This policy was approved to keep course transfer policies consistent within the five campus state university system.

This policy goes into effect beginning with courses taken in Fall 1995. Students who enroll in courses for summer 1995 at UMASS/Boston will have the grades earned calculated into their cumulative grade point averages and the credits will count as residence credit.

Bike trips aim to put end to cycle of abuse

•Pair hopes trek raises money

By Perri-Lyn Cohen
Collegian Correspondent

In Massachusetts a woman is killed by her batterer every eight days. Across the country the statistics show that four women die each day at the hands of their abusers.

A bike trip entitled "The Ride Against Men's Violence" is being made this summer to help end this cycle of abuse.

On May 31, two University of Massachusetts school of education graduates will leave Amherst for a six week, cross country bicycle trip ending in Seattle.

Jason Boronski and Tom Landis-Schiff, both said they hope to raise money and awareness about domestic violence and the Men's resource Center of Western Massachusetts (MRC).

"Part of the hope of this trip is to inspire more men to step forward and take responsibility for the violence" said Landis-Schiff, who is one of the directors of the MRC.

The money raised by Boronski and Landis-Schiff will go to help fund and support two specific programs at the MRC.

One of the programs, Men Overcoming Violence (MOVE), is the first comprehensive state-certified batterer intervention program. It offers counseling for both court-referred and self-referred men to end the cycle of violence and abuse in relationships against their wives, partners and children.

The trip will also benefit the High School Education Project, a prevention based program for male high school students. The program deals with issues of respect and abuse in relationships, date rape and sexual harassment.

Along with MOVE and the High School Education Project, the MRC also provides information and referrals about men's groups and counseling services, college and multicultural outreach programs, father–son retreats and support groups.

During the "Ride Against Men's Violence," Boronski and Landis–Schiff said they plan to stop in such cities as Buffalo, N.Y., Madison, Wis. and Spokane, Wash., to meet with community organizations and groups doing similar work.

The two also plan to do weekly segments with local radio personality Buddy Rubbish of WRSI, giving updates as the trip westward progresses, Landis–Schiff said.

•Senior to pedal across country

By Amy Paradysz
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts senior will be taking to the road this summer to benefit two local charities vested in improving education in public schools.

Don McNaughton, a senior Civil and Environmental Engineering major, will be riding his bike across the country next month in hopes of raising $50,000 for two Springfield charities — Multicultural Community Services and the Environmental Center for our Schools.

McNaughton, 32, will be riding his Cannondale 18–sped for at least seven weeks starting June 5 as he travels from Charleston, South Carolina to Vancouver, British Columbia. He will bring only his tent, sleeping bag, rain–gear and bicycle repair tools, he said.

Money donated to Multicultural Community Services will fund an adult education program which will provide tutoring services in basic math and reading for adults with learning disabilities.

The other charity, Environmental Center for our Schools (ECHOS) at Forest Park is a program which gives 4 to 9 grade students in Springfield a chance to get some hands–on experience in the woods, McNaughton said.

They teach students to "tie knots, build shelters, build safe fires, read topographic maps and use compasses," said McNaughton. Money raised through the bike ride will be used to renovate the existing environmental center and purchase field supplies such as compasses and soil borers, he said.

McNaughton, who bicycled from Philadelphia to Portland, Oregon ten years ago, trained regularly from January until April. The past month he has mostly been trying to take care of bills before the trip, he said.

Several businesses are sponsoring McNaughton, including Bay State Gas, Valley Bicycle, Road House Restaurant, New England Waste Systems and Jan Luzzi, a massage therapist.

Dube to receive status hearing in death of former UM student

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

SALEM — The man charged with the death of a former University of Massachusetts student will be going to court this Thursday for a status hearing.

Bernard Dube, 52, of Amesbury, will have a status hearing in Essex County Superior Court at Salem for his charges of vehicular homicide while driving drunk, leaving the scene of an accident after property damage and driving to endanger, said Steve O'Connell, spokesperson for the Essex County District Attorney.

According to O'Connell, a status hearing is done to evaluate the case before the actual hearing.

A source that wished to remain anonymous said a plea bargain giving Dube two and a half years in prison would be pursued.

O'Connell said he could not comment on the possibility of a plea bargain.

The charges follow a Feb. 1 incident when Dube's truck allegedly slammed into the side of a car that 18–year–old Joseph Liguori, of Amesbury, was driving, killing him instantly.

Tests show that Dube had a .20 blood alcohol level from samples taken after the accident, police said. The legal limit is .08 for persons 21 years old an up.

The second charge, leaving the scene of an accident after property damage, occurred earlier that evening when Dube allegedly rear–ended another vehicle in Wenham, then left the scene.

The registrar's office said Liguori was enrolled last semester as a freshman business major. Friends said he also played in the Minuteman marching band as a snare–drummer.

At the time of the accident, Liguori was enrolled in North Essex Community College, waiting for a transfer to Salem State College.

UMass ROTC cadet honored as recipient of Pallas award

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

An ROTC cadet from the University of Massachusetts has been honored as this year's recipient of the Pallas Athene award.

Cadet Captain Louise Correia was presented with the award at the ROTC military ball on April 21 by a member of the local Lion's Club.

The Women's Army Corps Veterans Association presents the Pallas Athene award annually to the top senior female cadet in each of three regions, west, central and east, according to Lt. Col Jerome Muldowney, a UMass professor of military science.

Awardees are presented with a bronze medallion and a $500 cash award.

"It's an honor to recognize people throughout the country for their accomplishments in the military and academically," Correia said.

Eligible cadets are nominated by their respective ROTC units and military science departments and winners are selected by a board made up of Army officers in each of the three regions.

The award is "in honor of all women who have served in the military," according to Muldowney.

Correia was selected from a field of approximately 500 other candidates, Muldowney said.

Correia is a graduating senior whose specialty training is in the field of nursing.

"I especially feel fortunate that I'm in nursing because there are no jobs for nurses right now, so I know I have a job waiting for me," she said.

After graduation, Correia will be attending Officer Basic Camp (OBC) in San Antonio, for three months of training, before heading to Germany where she will be stationed. The San Antonio OBC is the training camp for medical personnel, according to Correia.

After receiving her commission, Correia will have earned the rank of 2nd Lieutenant.

Correia plans on making the Army a career, at least for now.

"I can't predict the kind of future I'm going to have," she said.

COLLEGIAN FILE

The men's lacrosse team returned to the NCAA tournament after a year away this season.

Athletic conference champion Sienna College, for an NCAA appearance.

Major contributions to the success in baseball go to senior Bill Knight who broke three Minutemen records and is currently attempting to add to the All-time home-run and runs batted in record as well as the single season homerun record. Knight blew away his competition in capturing the Atlantic 10 player of the year award.

Junior Ryan Jette has batted lead-off all season. With his lightning speed and base swiping ability, to complement his batting and on-base percentage, run production has amassed.

Keeping opponents off the scoreboard has been the ace and backbone of the pitching staff. Senior Jay Murphy has not lost an Atlantic-10 game this season. He possesses a curveball that falls off the table, and earned A-10 pitcher of the year honors.

On the smaller diamond also enjoying a regular season and Atlantic-10 tournament titles is the softball team. This years crown makes it five consecutive for the Minutewomen.

Senior captain Kelly Daut has pitched over 20 wins this season and is one of only two people ever to win Atlantic-10 pitcher of the week for five straight weeks.

Help at the plate has been sparked by freshman Kim Gutridge and sophomore Sam Cardenas. Gutridge sported a 25 game hitting streak, second in school history, while Cardenas posted a 23 game hit streak.

Gutridge along with sophomore Chris Martens have batting averages lingering around .400 and four Minutewomen, including the three mentioned and freshman Kelly Buckley have knocked in more than 30 runs.

The team's record now stands at 40-20, and they have earned the right to compete in the NCAA tournament and will face the University of Connecticut in their first match- up.

Men's lacrosse finished off their season as the fourteenth ranked team in the nation, and were able to pull off an NCAA berth, but the big story this spring came from the front office.

Greg Canella was at the helm in his first season as the UMass coach and it is the first time in many years that a guy named Garber has not been the boss.

Dropping the nickname of Gorilla's, and changing the home bench at Richard F. Garber field, Canella and his Minutemen were out to prove they are a national power.

The strength of schedule was enough to put the Minutemen into the NCAA tournament. UMass faced Princeton, and put a scare into the defending national champion, trailing by only a goal after three quarters, before succumbing in the final period.

Sophomore Brendan Glass lead the team in scoring, and scored at least two goals in eight games this year, and is on pace to become one of UMass' top 15 scorers of all time.

Senior Mike Valente is one of college lacrosse's premiere set-up men standing sixth on the UMass career assist list with over 80. Valente had four multiple point games this year.

Junior Dennis Kelly, who quit the team last year, returned with a vengeance to the Minutemen midfield, playing stellar defense and leading the team with over 50 ground balls.

Women's lacrosse had a nail-biting season with six of ten losses coming by three goals or less. Coach Francesca McClellan had a very young team this year with 10 of 18 players being freshman. The team did post three wins with the help of freshman Joanna Bignazio scoring 33 goals and a solid save percentage from freshman goaltender Kate Brew.

The men's tennis team finished their season at an even 6-6. They finished seventh in the Atlantic-10 tournament and fourth at the New England Championship.

Freshman Alex Aller had the best personal performance posting an 8-1 record at No. 6 singles. Senior Tim Lipsky had a solid season at the always tough top spot, but all lights shined on the performance of junior Justin Lewis who won the No. 4 singles flight at the New England Championship.

Coach Judy Dixon's other team, like the women's lacrosse team was dominantly freshman. The UMass women's tennis team had a season with a steady incline ending with a fourth place finish at the Atlantic-10 tournament.

UMass started off slow with less than expected performances from captain Liesl Sitton and the fab-five freshman. The team suffered through losses against tough opponents such as Seton Hall and Cornell early in the season, but finished up strong thanks to Sitton and exchange student Catalina Mejia.

Sitton won the Atlantic-10 No. 1 singles championship in convincing form and former clay-courter Mejia stepped in to win all but one of her matches all season at the sixth spot.

You got to love it when your team doesn't lose. The UMass men's track team did just that posting an 8-0-1 record this spring with the tie coming against the University of Maine.

Team leaders included senior Tom Galligani (triple jump), junior John Johnson (long jump and 4 X 100 relay), and senior Ron Tauro (high hurdles and high jump).

Women's track proves that track at UMass is a force to be reckoned with. The Minutewomen also enjoyed an undefeated season posting a unprecedented 12-0 record.

Junior Nicole Roberts headed the pack, winning an overwhelming majority of her 200 and 400 meter races. Roberts, also a soccer All-American, set school records at the 100 and 200 meters.

Also contributing were NCAA qualifiers senior Kelly Liljebald and Heather Brown. Liljebald, who ran well in long distances, set the school record at the 10,000 meters in her qualification for the NCAA berth. Brown who will join Liljebald at the NCAA's, also set the school record at her event, the javelin throw.

This year marked the first season as a varsity sport for the women's water polo team at UMass. Like an expansion club, the team started off slow dropping tough matches to powerful west coast style squads in California. After taking licks, the team returned home where they played well throughout the season eventually climbing to a national ranking of 20.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen were sophomore Vicky Baymond, who lead the team in scoring, and the backstop, junior Jessica Griffith, who was solid minding the net all season.

Another first year varsity sport at the university was the women's crew team as they were queen's of the Connecticut river, and every other body of water they encountered. The Minutewomen rowed themselves to an undefeated season finishing off the year as the Division II National champions.

They won the crown at the New England Rowing Championships in Worcester, MA., where they entered as the No. 1 seed.

Other accomplishments for the boat squad include winning the California Cup in San Diego, California. That victory qualified the Minutewonen to row for the prestigious Whittier Cup held next April.

In a nutshell, the spring has gone well. UMass teams are riding spiritual and emotional highs that could carry over into 1996.

while Siena's Eric Anderson was touched up in the loss.

"(Siena) did not play their best game against us," said Stone. "But maybe we didn't play our best game either. We didn't see their best pitchers, but they didn't see ours either. You just never know what will happen in the game of baseball."

The Minutemen will hurl ace Murphy in the opener. The senior workhorse will bring in a 7-3 record with a 4.85 earned run average. He has also completed seven of ten games started this season.

Paronto, a sophomore (5-2, 4.50) will take the hill in game two for UMass. If game three is necessary, Michaels (5-1, 5.08) will likely get the nod.

For the Saints, Jeremy Clausi (6-2, 4.96), Tim Christman (4-4, 5.18) and Ira Tilton (6-2, 5.59) have handled most of the starts, and will likely see action against UMass.

"We have to play the way we are capable of playing," Stone said. "That means we need solid pitching, good defense, and we have to hit the ball the way we are able to.

"Perfection doesn't always happen, but when you are a deep ballclub you can get through those times."

DNA testimony heard in O.J. case

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A glove found on O.J. Simpson's property contained blood matching Ronald Goldman's and may have been smeared with the blood of Simpson's ex-wife, a DNA expert testified Tuesday. It was the first testimony about DNA tests on the crucial piece of evidence.

The left-handed mate to the glove was found near the slashed bodies of Goldman and Simpson's ex-wife Nicole.

Goldman's blood matches blood on the inside lining of the ring finger of the glove found behind a guest house at O.J. Simpson's estate, Gary Sims told the jury.

Sims said the genetic pattern of the glove blood was the same as that of Goldman's blood sample.

Sims, a DNA expert at the California Department of Justice, didn't say what percentage of the population shared the genetic pattern. However, with the type of sophisticated testing used, odds are high against anyone else having the same genetic makeup.

DNA tests also showed that blood from inside the glove's index finger "could be" a mixture of Goldman's and Ms. Simpson's, Sims said. That was the first testimony about the intermingling of both victims' blood on evidence.

Sims, building on another DNA expert's testimony, told jurors his tests also revealed that blood on a sock in Simpson's bedroom matched Ms. Simpson's.

He also revealed that when he examined both black socks under a microscope, he found about 10 blood splatters on one and about 19 on the other, bolstering the prosecution's claim that Simpson wore them while committing the murders June 12.

"The thing that's interesting about these socks is that the more time you spend with them ... under the stereo microscope, you really do see a lot of stains there," he said.

He suggested blood specks were on areas of the socks where the blood could have splashed up from the ground. His testimony was designed to cast doubt on a defense claim that blood was planted by police.

Sims, whose lab looked at the socks after the Los Angeles Police Department analyzed them, also said he saw no evidence of blood passing through one side of the sock to the other, as it might if blood were placed on it while the sock was lying flat.

The socks are the only items of bloody clothing found inside Simpson's home, and his lawyers claim they were planted.

Sims said the socks arrived at his lab on Sept. 26 and were subjected to repeated review and tests, but the small stains did not become apparent until Oct. 25.

NCAAs. Three of the four teams are in the NCAAs: UMass, Florida State and South Carolina.

"It was a tremendous advantage for us," Sortino said. "To me, the reason why we scheduled it was in hope that we would be going to the NCAAs."

Of the 32 teams in the tourney, only five of UMass' 20 losses have come at the hands of teams that are not included in the 32-team field. Arizona St., Purdue, Virginia, South Florida and Rutgers are the five teams not in the NCAAs that the Minutewomen have lost to.

"That's a testimony to the schedule we play," Sortino said. "We have a great record."

Sortino is not concerned with the outstanding records of some of the teams in the 32-team field, among them being No. 1 nationally ranked Arizona, 60-5, Southwestern Louisiana, 45-7 and Nicholls State, 55-7, the only three teams in the tourney with under 10 losses.

"When you get this far, you just have to play ball. There are no cupcakes," Sortino said.

Minutewomen notes: Sophomore leftfielder Chris Martens was named to the GTE/CoSIDA District I Academic All-America team on May 16. Martens was also selected to the Atlantic 10 Conference All-Academic Team.

• The best matchup in the pivot in college basketball will happen in the William D. Mullins Center next year.

With Marcus Camby and Tim Duncan both staying in school and UMass and Wake Forest scheduled to square off next year in Amherst, the University could see the best game ever on campus.

• It's really a sad thing that the final Bruins game in the Boston Garden had to come with such abysmal officiating. The "let everything go no matter how blatant it is " theory that is prevalent in the playoffs is an absolute aberration.

• While the Garden will be missed, one Stadium that won't be is Princeton's Palmer Stadium, the building, which hosted the NCAA first round matchup between UMass and Princeton.

Come on Princeton, you're in the Ivy League. You guys don't even know the meaning of the words financial hardship. Take some of the obscene amounts of money you have and renovate. You're only the defending National Champions!

• It's time to fire Brian Sutter. The man is a useless playoff coach. There are two good solutions. 1. Bring back Mike Milbury. The Bruins established a standard of excellence under Milbury and would benefit from his return. 2. Promote Steve Kasper. The Baby B's coach has been solid in Providence and is considered a solid candidate.

• Finally, If you happen to be in Finland this summer, there may be a pair of faces, you'll recognize. UMass women's soccer players Heidi Kocher and Melissa Mitchell are taking their considerable talents across the Atlantic to the "Land of Jorma" to play soccer professionally.

It's always nice to see woman athletes get a chance to further their careers professionally, because it doesn't happen enough, and as anyone that has been around Jim Rudy's squad, it couldn't happen to two nicer people.

To them and the many other athletes who excelled without egos, I tip my hat to you. You made this a great job.

Matt Vautour was the Collegian co-sports editor.

there are many schools that still fail to comply with the law.

On March 29, a US district judge in Providence passed the biggest and most costly decision in Title IX's 23-year history when it was decided that Brown was guilty in discriminating against their female athletes.

UMass sports management professor, Carol Barr was not surprised about Brown's loss in court.

"I've heard about 30 court cases involving Title IX, all have been successful for the women, and not one has favored a university."

In 1991, UMass settled out of court for a similar occurrence when it cut women's lacrosse, tennis, and volleyball.

According to Barr, there are other local New England schools that are experiencing compliance problems that are being investigated.

When Brown was found guilty of Title IX compliance, the college had 61 percent male athletes to 39 percent for the females. Among the schools that still have evident compliance problems with Title IX in the New England area are Boston College, Boston University, Connecticut, Fairfield, Northeastern, and Rhode Island. Athletic participation at all six schools is at least 61 percent male. All are also over the 3 percent allowance between enrollment percentage and athletic participation percentage.

"Many schools are starting to do what they should," Sortino said, "but I wouldn't be surprised if another law suit happened elsewhere."

Many schools like Boston University claim that there is lack of interest in a particular sport when it comes to cutting a program for Title IX compliance. BU cut it's men's baseball program claiming "there was little interest in the program."

Many other schools claim that there is no interest in some female sports "forcing" them not to add particular programs to their varsity lists.

However, according to a poll conducted by a sports marketing group in Dallas, popularity in women's sports is on the rise. Women's figure skating, and gymnastics ranked two and three respectfully on the list ranking ahead of Major League Baseball, and NBA basketball.

"We're gaining equity, but it's not reflective in the media coverage, many people think of men when they think of college athletics," said Sparks, who is the former President of the Student Athletic Advisory Committee at UMass. "Where are the women? If we have so many opportunities then where are we?"

Sports notice

There will be an important Collegian sports meeting this afternoon at 4 p.m. involving beats for next semester. All returning staff members are expected to attend, and anyone interested in writing is welcome to come down.

The meeting is in the Collegian offices, 113 Campus Center. If you have any question please contact sports editor Candice Flemming 545-1851.

with the suspension from the team. It also may have hindered his basketball future in the pros, as teams may shy away from a player like Williams and his troubled past. He's been labeled brash, cocky and arrogant, and he had been said to have ruined team chemistry while on the Minutemen.

That is the Mike Williams we see. The same Williams who is said by many to be too confident is the same Williams who calmly buried the three-pointers at the buzzer on six separate occasions. The same edge Williams had off the court that people disliked was the same one had on the court that people adored. Williams, was the guy that people ranked on when the Minutemen loss, and praised him when they won.

Mike Williams' go through the system all the time. Let's hope, for his sake, that the sea is calmer is his future.

For his sake, let's hope it's in the NBA.

• Utah lost in the first round? Seattle, too?

Whoa. What a surprise.

Look, Utah, I ain't the NBA guru of the bunch, but you have to do something. It may not be the coach, yet Jerry Sloan will probably be fired. What it may have to do with — and may someone shield me from the rocks being thrown at me from Salt Lake City — is the Karl Malone-John Stockton combination.

Arguably one of the best duos the league has seen, and the numbers prove it. But they do not win in the playoffs. They do not win the big game.

Do something. Break them up. Lessen their roles. Force one to retire. Get a franchise player. Try anything. All the points, rebounds and assists piled up by the two don't mean jack if they fail to get a ring.

As for Seattle? Don't even get me started.

• As heralded as the incoming NBA class is, it will not compare to last year's crop.

• How 'bout those Celtic fans talking upset after the one win in the opening round of the playoffs against Orlando? I've said it before, and I'll say it again — it's scary when Dee Brown is considered a go-to guy.

Andrew Bryce was a Collegian co-sports editor.

Softball and baseball hope for postseason success

■ Sortino confident for NCAA victory

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino is confident in her team's chances this weekend in the first round of the NCAA Regional Tournament.

"I feel we are the best team [in the field]," Sortino said. "We have the best pitching, the best hitting and we are defensively sound. There are no Achilles heels."

The No. 3 seeded Minutewomen (40–20) will play Northeast Region rival and No. 2 seed Connecticut (35–18) Friday at 1 p.m. in Princeton, NJ. The other regional first round game will have No. 4 seed Hofstra (40–19) meeting the host and No. 1 seed, Princeton (46–11) at 3:30 p.m.

Second round action takes place on Saturday at 12 p.m., 2:30 p.m. and 5 p.m. The Championship game is scheduled to be played on Sunday at 1 p.m. If a second championship game is necessary, it will be played at 3:30 p.m.

The winner of the double-elimination regional tournament advances to the Women's College World Series in Oklahoma City, Okla. with the seven other regional winners. An eight-team double elimination tournament will be held May 25 through 29 at the Amateur Softball Association's Hall of Fame Stadium in Oklahoma City to decide the National Champion.

"I wouldn't ask for a better draw, we're thrilled," Sortino said.

This is the first year ever that four teams from the Northeast Region have been placed in the same NCAA regional bracket, assuring the region of representation in the World Series.

It will be the third time in the last four years that a team from the Northeast Region will be in the World Series. UMass went in 1992 and UConn went in 1993.

The Huskies hold the season edge over the Minutewomen 3–2. The two teams split doubleheaders on April 11 and 20 and UConn defeated UMass in the Princeton tourney. UMass is 3–1 against Hofstra and 0–1 against Princeton this year.

But Sortino isn't concerned with the season records of the four teams against each other. She knows that when it comes to tournament time, records don't matter.

"The history's of the teams doesn't matter," she said. "The team that plays with concentration, intensity and emotion, will win."

Connecticut will be led by senior Ericka Nole on the offensive end. The outfielder leads the team in batting average (.381), triples (six), slugging percentage (.594) and runs batted in (32). On the mound, either Bridgett McCaffery (18–5, 1.03 earned run average) or Kara Chanasyk (10–8, 1.45 ERA) could see time.

■ Siena only thing in way of tourney

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

This season has already been a tremendously successful one for the University of Massachusetts baseball team. However, coach Mike Stone's squad is not yet ready to pack up and head home for the summer.

Their latest accomplishment was winning the Atlantic 10 Tournament last weekend in Boyertown, PA. That feat earned UMass the right to host an NCAA play–in series at Earl Lorden Field against Siena. The two teams will play a double header Thursday, then play game three Friday if necessary.

The Minutemen entered the conference's post season tourney as the No. 1 seed. They were able to sandwich a 13– 5 win over St. Bonaventure between two victories against Rutgers, 10–9 and 10–3, to sweep through the double elimination tournament and bring home the title.

"We have been there before as a team," said Stone. "We have been in the position to win it before and not been able to, so it is nice to finally win it. I would say I am more relieved than anything."

The Minutemen had the tournament's No. 1 seed last year, but won only one game before being eliminated.

UMass, who ran their record to 36–12 overall, finished 19– 5 in the regular season Atlantic 10, tying their own mark for most conference wins. The tournament championship is the Minutemen's first since 1980.

Junior designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo led the way for the Minutemen, setting an A–10 record by going 9–13 (.692 batting average) while smacking two homers and driving in nine in the tourney. For his efforts, Ubaldo took home the A–10 Tournament's Most Outstanding Player award.

"It was good to see Nelson win the award. He saw the ball real well this weekend," said Stone. "He has so much bat speed that when he makes contact, good things are going to happen."

The Minutemen's top three pitchers, righthanders Jay Murphy (the league's Pitcher of the Year) and Chad Paronto, and lefty Jeff Michaels, all picked up wins on the weekend.

COLLEGIAN FILE
UMass baseball will face Siena for a chance to go to the NCAA tournament tomorrow afternoon.

"Hopefully, we are not satisfied yet," said Stone.

Siena earned the right to face UMass by winning the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference crown. The Saints will travel to Amherst with a record of 31–15 overall, 14–4 in the MAAC North.

"Siena had a great year," Stone said. "I expect a good series."

The Minutemen and the Saints have faced each other once already this season, with UMass winning 12–2 in a rout at Lorden Field. Freshman righthander Jeff Puleri was on the hill for the Minutemen and picked up his first win of the year.

Hall of Fame to honor past greats

For years, the only acknowledgement that a UMass former athlete received was a picture and a line or two in the back of a media guide, with the exception of Julius Erving, George Burke, and Lou Roe who's numbers are retired. That is about to change. For the abundance of UMass athletes that have graduated without that honor, their place in UMass history will finally be noticed.

Around the Horn with Matt Vautour

Plans are in the works to create a UMass Hall of Fame, to honor great athletes from all UMass athletics. Players like Mark Million, April Kater and others would likely be included. The William D. Mullins Center will likely be the home of this project.

• The SAT may be an unfair and biased test, and should not be used to judge the intelligence of a high school senior. But regardless of whether or not Kevin Garnett passes his SAT requirements, he is a moron.

In case you missed it, the senior, regarded by many as the best high school player in the country, has declared himself eligible for the NBA draft.

Garnett is talented, there is no question about it, and some NBA team will take a chance on that talent. But physically he is far too skinny, and the defence form guarding (and being guarded by) a high school student is a far cry from Karl Malone and Larry Johnson.

You're a fool, Garnett.

Stifle your ego and spend a year or two in college, it'll help you down the road.

• Why is the NBA being anal about the whole Michael Jordan number situation?

Who cares what number he wears? The NBA promotes the flare and the flash, and heck, if the NBA can change the way it officiates to make sure Jordan stays in the playoffs, surely this number foolishness can be overlooked with the gambling allegations.

There are going to be a lot of angry fans that ran out and bought the No. 45 jerseys.

• Speaking of No. 45s, if Brendan Glass continues to improve at the rate he has over his first two years, he will be a legend.

The athletic marketing department would serve itself well by doing promotions for games other than Syracuse. There is a goort product to be watched.

• This space has frequently praised the "fan of the week." Well now it's time to crown the Fans of the Year.

Robert and Cynthia Lord are retired former employees of the University. The couple spends many an afternoon on campus cheering any one of the several different fans that they come out to support. They have been the biggest fans of the University's less publicized sports.

Honorable Mentions: Judy Deedle, lacrosse. Alice Bishco, ice hockey.

UM sports shine in Spring '95

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

A successful spring it will be for the University of Massachusetts sports teams who as a whole, will have a compiled winning percentage of well over .500.

To go with great team performances, individual firsts, school highs, and school records were also established.

Starting at the diamond, the baseball team is enjoying a successful season as they clinched the Atlantic–10 regular season title.

The team started slow, dropping three games to Old Dominion to start the season. The Minutemen then played a better than average week in Fort Myers, Florida, winning four out of six match–ups before returning north to rip up the Atlantic–10.

The Minutemen tied their own Atlantic 10 record for the most wins in a season and entered the tournament as the No. 1 seed. The team won the A–10 tournament defeating Rutgers University, earning them the right to play the Metro–Atlantic

Another year will benefit Camby

• I looked for Marcus, I called Marcus, I even dreamt about Marcus. Unfortunately, the dream I had of Marcus Camby revealing to me what his plans for next year were before telling anybody else was shattered, as he spoke to a Hartford Courant writer last Friday.

Regardless, it was a smart move by Camby. For himself, he will have time to refine his game. He will have time to build more strength, though people are crazy to believe that a Camby frame can "bulk up."

Around the Horn with Andrew Bryce

And he will have time to become one of, if not the best, center in college basketball, which makes a hell of a lot more sense than leaving after this season. As for next year, the pick number will be higher, the check will be fatter and Camby will be more than ready to showcase his skills in the professional ranks.

For Massachusetts, Camby's decision was huge. A Camby– less Minutemen team already bruised by the exits of Lou Roe, Derek Kellogg and Mike Williams would have involved much rebuilding than planned. That is not to say that Donta Bright, Dana Dingle and Co. would fail to get the job done.

But Camby's impact is immeasurable. For all the stars that have played here at UMass in the past few years, none are as talented as Camby. Harper Williams was a workhorse, and his reward was the 1992 Atlantic 10 Player of the Year and a contract with a professional team overseas. Roe busted his butt to chalk up his awards, and his immediate future plans involve the NBA.

Camby is not even at the top of his game, and he has been amazing at times. The fluid big man who runs the court with ease and has developed a solid baseline offensive game to match his dominating defense has another season to improve his game.

No. 21 will be on Camby's back next year, and will probably be in the Mullins Center rafters the next.

• Can I be a Knicks fan and a Reggie Miller fan at the same time?

No. But I respect that annoying sonavabitch.

• Has it sunk in for anybody else that Lou Roe is not a member of the Massachusetts men's basketball team? I'll wait 'till after the start of next season to think about it myself.

• The softball team Is the only sport here in the New England area that can play 60 games, and the season yet to be over.

• OK, Lou is going to the NBA, Marcus is coming back for his junior year, and Derek is testing the waters in the USBL. What about Mike Williams? You remember, the same Mike Williams who told this Collegian writer in the basketball preview on Nov. 18, "I will be in the NBA next year."

UMass a national leader in Title IX

By Jamie Bearse
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the third in a three part series of articles on Title IX and gender equity in athletics.

Melanie Gore ran up and down Garber Field last year as a red shirt for the UMass field hockey team while coach Pam Hixon screamed commands to the team. Because of her commitment to the game and Hixon, Gore was a starter this year.

Gore came to UMass instead of Maryland, Colgate, or Boston University because of Hixon and her dedication to coaching field hockey.

What didn't coax Gore into attending UMass was the training facilities.

Gore had never had a weight training schedule to keep up until she came to UMass, but when she went to train she was intimidated and many times had to wait a longer period of time to use the weights than it actually took to use them.

Gore is not alone, many of the woman athletes have never had regimented workouts before coming to UMass and have felt "intimidated."

According to Kyri Sparks, a teammate to Gore's on the field hockey team, the women athletes "don't have the best access to workout facilities and physicians."

"It's intimidating to go into the weight room, often times being the only woman in there," Sparks said. "Some women don't even go because they feel intimidated."

According to Sparks, many women athletes would be more encouraged to go to weight training if there were more women on the staff.

Sparks said, currently, there is one general female trainer and three general male trainers and there are only male physicians available for treatments and physicals.

Nikki Ahrenholz, of the UMass women's soccer team shares Sparks' feelings on the weight training facilities.

"A lot of times I'm the only one in there," Ahrenholz said. "The male trainers are not orientated to train the soccer players. They're used to training for football."

According to Ahrenholz, the training facilities are a problem, but the only problem at UMass but it could be corrected under Title IX.

"It would be really helpful if we were separated from the men for weight training, or at least from the football players," Ahrenholz said. "Other than that there isn't a big problem with Title IX at UMass."

According to UMass Athletic Director Bob Marcum, the athletic committee had discussed the weight room problem but has "no plans" to add on to the existing room or add a new one.

"I think regardless of Title IX, It's hard to accommodate 800 athletes," Marcum said.

According Elaine Sortino, UMass women's softball coach, gender is not an issue with the weight rooms, "the facilities are mediocre to poor across the board."

Gore, Sparks, and Ahrenholz concede that despite the weight room problem UMass is a "great example for the rest of the country" in relation to Title IX compliance.

Despite UMass taking a leadership role in the region,

Advising center makes changes to assist UMass students better

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center (CASIAC) is gearing up for another summer orientation.

CASIAC's main goal is to assist students with their academic questions and needs. CASIAC, which has been at the University of Massachusetts for about 25 years, advises approximately 5,000 undeclared and pre–major students each semester according to Linda Roney, coordinator of advising for CASIAC.

"We talk about selecting classes and majors," she said. "We focus heavily on freshman and transfer students."

Advising takes place all over campus — in the residence halls, over orientation and especially at the CASIAC office located in Machmer E–20.

"The most important thing we tell students at orientation is don't just take general education courses," Roney said. "Take a course that seems fun even if it doesn't meet any requirements."

Students who have problems with teachers, with unbalanced schedules, are having academic problems or simply have problems adjusting to University life can also receive help at CASIAC.

"One of the most important parts I see in my role is as a referral service," said advisor Elaine Parmett. "It's trying to help students not feel overwhelmed here at UMass."

In order to better serve the students they advise, CASIAC have some advisors focused on undecided and pre–major students. CASIAC has also purchased new computer equipment and have improved their processing of the 3,800 student petitions their office receives each semester, said David Tukey, director of CASIAC.

Last summer saw major changes in how CASIAC conducted advising during orientation, Tukey said. Instead of always advising students one on one, CASIAC now aims to create a community environment through group counseling.

"We group all pre–major students together and they all get the same information," Tukey said. "That was the biggest change. We're going to do it again."

Future changes also lie in store for CASIAC.

According to Tukey, plans drafted by both the Provost's and the Chancellor's office may place CASIAC, the Learning Resource Center and the Center for Counseling and Academic Development under one administrative umbrella.

"I think it's a good idea," Tukey said. "The intention is to improve advising."

Interim UM president named

Search committee formed to find replacement for Hooker

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

After more than a week of speculation and rumors, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill made the official announcement on May 19 that Michael Hooker will be their new chancellor.

Hooker will replace current UNC Chancellor, Paul Hardin. Hardin has been chancellor of UNC–Chapel Hill for seven years.

A 23 member committee worked for 13 months to find Hardin's replacement and had promised a decision by June 1.

The University of Massachusetts' Board of Trustees wasted no time in filling the vacancy left by Hooker. Board Chairman Dan Taylor announced the selection of Sherry H. Penney, the chancellor of UMass–Boston to act as Interim President of the UMass system, also on May 19.

In a statement released by Hooker's office, Taylor said that he felt that Penney is "exceptionally well qualified to assume this post."

"I believe that the Board of Trustees could not have made a better selection for Interim President of the University of Massachusetts than Sherry Penney," he said.

Penney served as UMass–Boston's chancellor since 1988 after holding administrative positions at Yale and the State University of New York (SUNY).

In 1982 Penney became the first female Vice Chancellor of SUNY after leaving Yale, where she had served as one of that university's Associate Provosts since 1976.

According to William Wright, Director of Public Information, a search committee is being formed to find a permanent replacement for Hooker. The head of the committee will be UMass trustee, Peter Lewenberg.

At this time, Penney is not being considered for the permanent position of UMass president, but that may change, Wright said.

Penney stressed her intention to work with all members of faculty, staff, and the Chancellors of the various campuses in particular.

"I am looking forward especially to continue strong, working relationships with the Chancellors of the University's campuses. Your support is very important to UMass, and to me, in the days ahead," she said.

One of those Chancellors will be John Feudo, who was recently promoted from Alumni Relations Director to an associate vice chancellor's post in University Advancement.

Feudo will be replacing outgoing Associate Vice Chancellor, Keith Williams, who will be accepting a position at Michigan State University.

A search is also on for someone to permanently fill the position of vice chancellor for University Advancement, which will become open when the interim vice chancellor, Ron Story steps down. Chancellor Scott said that he hopes to have the post filled by July 1.

Penney spoke of her determination to keep the UMass system moving on the path that Hooker had started it on.

"We have charted a course together for UMass and we will stay the course," Penney said. "During this period I am committed to maintaining the progress and momentum we have made to date, and will do everything I can to insure that this course is pursued."

Hooker accepted the position of UMass president in 1992 after a committee unanimously selected him after a six–month search.

Hooker had originally said in the fall of 1992 that he intended to hold the presidency for ten years.

Improvements in program help minorities

By Chris Conner

At the University of Massachusetts, where black students comprise only seven percent of the school's total population, a longstanding support service has sought to ease the burden many students endure.

Located in New Africa House, the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS) has been the primary source of advocacy for students of color at UMass for the last three decades, according to current CCEBMS director Floyd Martin.

"Without the CCEBMS program, I think the opportunity for students of color, especially black students, to come to the University would be greatly diminished," he said.

Membership within the program is predominantly black (80 percent), with Latinos, Asians, Native Americans, and a small number of whites included as well. Approximately 97 percent of the blacks on campus are counseled by CCEBMS.

Academic advisor Sidonio Ferreira, one of six advisors on staff, noted that there is even diversity amongst the blacks in the organization.

"The majority of the people are of African descent," he said. "We have African–Americans, African–Caribbeans, Cape Verdeans mainland Africans. We are truly a multicultural program."

For 26 years on campus, CCEBMS has maintained its role as a vital support service through its interaction both with its 700 students and the various University offices through which those students operate.

These duties include dealing with the bursar, financial aid, and housing, as well as searching for employment opportunities both during the school year and the summer.

Many of the jobs are made available through the Mather Career Center, the importance of which Ferreira said was almost invaluable.

"We work closely with the center to make sure you're a marketable person in the university and outside," he said.

According to Martin, partnerships with the UMass academic departments are also formed in order to keep students

Unique opportunities exist for GLBT students

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Unlike most high schools and many towns and cities, the University of Massachusetts offers gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender (GLBT) students numerous opportunities to find community and support around their sexual orientation.

These opportunities range from membership in GLBT political organizations to trips to Pride and Joy, a store in Northampton specializing in GLBT books, videos, T–shirts, and other merchandise. The Pioneer Valley is considered by many to be the best place in the country for GLBT people to live, work, and go to school.

At UMass, there are three major resources and support centers serving the GLBT community: The Stonewall Center, the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, and the 2 in 20 Floor for GLBT Students and Their Heterosexual Allies.

The Stonewall Center

Located in Crampton Residential Hall in the Southwest Residential Area, the Stonewall Center was created ten years ago to serve GLBT students, faculty, and community members as well as heterosexuals allies.

The Stonewall Center offers many in–house resources, including:

• Free GLBT lending library of books, videos, and magazines.

• Free pamphlets, posters, and hand–outs on GLBT issues and resources, including information on safer sex.

• The largest computer database on GLBT resources in the Pioneer Valley.

• Full staff waiting and ready to answer questions, provide referrals, and address immediate needs.

The center also operates several other services on campus, including a GLB Speaker's Bureau; a monthly GLBT newsletter called Blatant; LAMDA, a 24–hour automated GLBT telephone information line; and a GLBT information service available on the Internet through the UMass gopher.

The Stonewall Center sponsors the GLB Studies Brown Bag Lecture Series, which brings in speakers from all over the country to lecture on GLBT issues. In the past, speakers have addressed a wide range of topics, from censorship to transsexuality to AIDS to racism. The lectures are held in the Campus Center and are free and open to the public.

Plays, poetry readings, comedians, concerts, and the LGB Cafe Series also come to UMass via the Stonewall Center. Kate Bornstein, the Flirtations, and several other prominent GLBT performers have visited the University in the past few years.

The Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance

Formed as a registered student organization in the early 1970s under another name, the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance (LBGA) continues to serve UMass GLBT students through meetings, dances, and other support services.

The LBGA office, located on the top floor of the Student Union, is a comfortable room filled with couches, books, newspapers, magazines and a large bulletin board listing GLBT resources and events. During the school year, the office is staffed by student volunteers who offer their time to visitors in need of assistance.

Every Tuesday night, the LBGA sponsors "Info–Socials" in the Campus Center that allow GLBT students the opportunity to socialize and exchange information with each

Local banks offer student packages

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

Entering college brings students new responsibilities such as managing their own expenses. Many students get their first checking account when they enter college.

There are two statewide banks which are popular amongst the students at the University of Massachusetts — Shawmut and BayBank.

Both Shawmut and BayBank offer students Automated Teller Machines on campus in the Campus Center, as well as branches in downtown Amherst and throughout the state. Both banks also offer 24 hour 800 assistance phone numbers.

Both banks will be on the Campus Center Concourse during orientation providing students with information on their services.

When choosing a bank, students should ask questions about the various accounts offered, said Sandra Sacco, vice president of Shawmut's Triangle Street branch in Amherst.

"When opening a bank account or checking account, students should try to determine what their needs will be," Bruce Spitzer, BayBank spokesman.

Both Spitzer and Sacco said students should compare annual and ATM fees which the bank may charge customers.

Basic Accounts

Shawmut and BayBank offer similar basic accounts. Both banks offer students basic checking and basic savings.

Shawmut's basic checking costs $2.50 per month unless a student is under 19 then the fee is waived. Basic checking provides customers with unlimited Shawmut ATM use, but limits customers to 10 checks per month.

Shawmut waives the monthly fee if a student chooses direct deposit which some area employers such as the University offer students, according to Sacco.

BayBank offers a basic checking account as well. The fees on the BayBank basic checking are the same as on Shawmut's basic checking, but the restrictions are different.

BayBank's basic checking limits customers to only eight checks per month, and four BayBank ATM transactions per month. Each additional BayBank ATM transaction will cost $.75.

Both banks offer students ATM debit cards with their checking accounts. Both Shawmut's and BayBank's debit cards are acceptable at any location where Mastercard is accepted.

Sacco said a debit card is like a paperless checking account which allows a student to limit the number of checks written within a month.

Packages

For students who have more money to invest, both banks offer account packages.

Spitzer said BayBank's Student Value Package is a very popular program among most college students.

The Student Value Package offers students a checking account, a companion savings account, an ATM or debit Mastercard card, and the option of adding a BayBank credit card from Visa or Mastercard.

The BayBank credit card provides a student with a $500 credit limit, and incurs an annual fee of $21.

The value package costs $6 per month which is waived if a student is under 19. The value package also provides students who are over 18 with $250 overdraft protection, so if a student bounces a check BayBank will cover it.

BayBank allows out of state students to waive fees during the summer months by freezing the accounts, a feature which Shawmut lacks.

Shawmut does not exclusively offer students a value package because "we do not discriminate," said Sacco.

Shawmut offers the public at large the Partnership Program.

Advising center makes changes to assist UMass students better

The College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center (CASIAC) is gearing up for another summer orientation.

CASIAC's main goal is to assist students with their academic questions and needs. CASIAC, which has been at the University of Massachusetts for about 25 years, advises approximately 5,000 undeclared and pre-major students each semester according to Linda Roney, coordinator of advising for CASIAC.

"We talk about selecting classes and majors," she said. "We focus heavily on freshman and transfer students."

Advising takes place all over campus — in the residence halls, over orientation and especially at the CASIAC office located In Machmer E-20.

"The most important thing we tell students at orientation is don't just take general education courses," Roney said. "Take a course that seems fun even if it doesn't meet any requirements."

Students who have problems with teachers, with unbalanced schedules, are having academic problems or simply have problems adjusting to University life can also receive help at CASIAC.

"One of the most important parts I see in my role is as a referral service," said advisor Elaine Parmett. "It's trying to help students not feel overwhelmed here at UMass."

In order to better serve the students they advise, CASIAC have some advisors focused on undecided and pre-major students. CASIAC has also purchased new computer equipment and have improved their processing of the 3,800 student petitions their office receives each semester, said David Tukey, director of CASIAC.

Last summer saw major changes in how CASIAC conducted advising during orientation, Tukey said. Instead of always advising students one on one, CASIAC now aims to create a community environment through group counseling.

"We group all pre-major students together and they all get the same information," Tukey said. "That was the biggest change. We're going to do it again."

Future changes also lie in store for CASIAC.

According to Tukey, plans drafted by both the Provost's and the Chancellor's office may place CASIAC, the Learning Resource Center and the Center for Counseling and Academic Development under one administrative umbrella.

"I think it's a good idea," Tukey said. "The intention is to improve advising."

Interim UM president named

Search committee formed to find replacement for Hooker

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

After more than a week of speculation and rumors, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill made the official announcement on May 19 that Michael Hooker will be their new chancellor.

Hooker will replace current UNC Chancellor, Paul Hardin. Hardin has been chancellor of UNC-Chapel Hill for seven years.

A 23 member committee worked for 13 months to find Hardin's replacement and had promised a decision by June 1.

The University of Massachusetts' Board of Trustees wasted no time in filling the vacancy left by Hooker. Board Chairman Dan Taylor announced the selection of Sherry H. Penney, the chancellor of UMass-Boston to act as Interim President of the UMass system, also on May 19.

In a statement released by Hooker's office, Taylor said that he felt that Penney is "exceptionally well qualified to assume this post."

"I believe that the Board of Trustees could not have made a better selection for Interim President of the University of Massachusetts than Sherry Penney," he said.

Penney served as UMass-Boston's chancellor since 1988 after holding administrative positions at Yale and the State University of New York (SUNY).

In 1982 Penney became the first female Vice Chancellor of SUNY after leaving Yale, where she had served as one of that university's Associate Provosts since 1976.

According to William Wright, Director of Public Information, a search committee is being formed to find a permanent replacement for Hooker. The head of the committee will be UMass trustee, Peter Lewenberg.

At this time, Penney is not being considered for the permanent position of UMass president, but that may change, Wright said.

Penney stressed her intention to work with all members of faculty, staff, and the Chancellors of the various campuses in particular.

"I am looking forward especially to continue strong, working relationships with the Chancellors of the University's campuses. Your support is very important to UMass, and to me, in the days ahead," she said.

One of those Chancellors will be John Feudo, who was recently promoted from Alumni Relations Director to an associate vice chancellor's post in University Advancement.

Feudo will be replacing outgoing Associate Vice Chancellor, Keith Williams, who will be accepting a position at Michigan State University.

A search is also on for someone to permanently fill the position of vice chancellor for University Advancement, which will become open when the interim vice chancellor, Ron Story steps down. Chancellor Scott said that he hopes to have the post filled by July 1.

Penney spoke of her determination to keep the UMass system moving on the path that Hooker had started it on.

"We have charted a course together for UMass and we will stay the course," Penney said. "During this period I am committed to maintaining the progress and momentum we have made to date, and will do everything I can to insure that this course is pursued."

Hooker accepted the position of UMass president in 1992 after a committee unanimously selected him after a six- month search.

Hooker had originally said in the fall of 1992 that he intended to hold the presidency for ten years.

SGA offers many opportunities

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts offers its students the opportunity to alter and change school policy, raise money for UMass, and get their complaints and concerns across to the administration for consideration.

The Student Government Association (SGA) is a student run organization which tries to serve as the voice of the student body, said newly elected SGA President Christina Lopes.

"The SGA is there to serve students, there are a lot of resources students aren't aware of," added Speaker of the Senate Dan Castellano.

If an issue is of concern to students, students can propose a policy to change it. If it is approved by the Chancellor's Office, it becomes policy.

In this way the SGA acts as a resource to improve conditions of the University for students, said Associate Speaker of the Senate Brian Tirrell.

Difficulties in the SGA

According to Tirrell, lack of student interest in SGA was a problem last year, as only half of the Senate seats were filled. Last year's Speaker Tom Darby estimated that only 65 of the Senate's 105 seats were filled at its peak.

One reason for this lack of involvement was the SGA's constitution, which intimidated many students, said Tirrell. Many senators cited the constitution as being too large and hard to deal with.

There was also a lack of communication between the senate, the executive and the judiciary branches of the student government, said Castellano. Some senators didn't understand their role in the entire process and ended up quitting.

According to Director of Public Policy and Relations Derrick Cheeseborough-Weaver, those who stay can really benefit.

"You get to see what's done and how it's done," said Cheeseborough-Weaver.

The senate is also having trouble with the electoral districts now in use. One problem is the overrepresentation of the Greek Area, which has one senator for approximately every house, said Castellano.

Castellano said that on campus the numbers jump to one senator for every two to three hundred students. He cites redistricting of the campus for equal representation as one of his major goals.

Under the current system, if an individual represents a dormitory, others wanting to get involved in the senate from that building cannot also be senators. At the same time, other buildings are left unrepresented, said Castellano.

SGA participation

Even if this problem remains, there are still alternative ways to get involved in the student government.

Each dorm area has an area government, in addition to groups such as the Asian, Latin American, Native American organization (ALANA) having a set amount of positions on the senate for people of color.

"You can get involved in student government just by joining house council," said Darby. House councils are the bodies which work to represent the separate dorms.

Getting started in student government early is also advised by many senators.

"It's best to start as a freshman, that way you can work your way up," said Cheeseborough-Weaver. "you get experience and knowledge for later."

However, there are no guidelines saying that students cannot get involved at any time during their enrollment at the University of Massachusetts.

A word of advice to those entering student government for the first time, especially first-year students, is not to be overwhelmed, said Lopes.

The SGA offers different opportunities to its various diverse members.

"I got a chance to represent my [ALANA] community to a larger forum," said newly elected Student Trustee Dan Rivera, "I insured the needs of the community got heard."

"It helped me deal with people with conflicting views," said Darby, "And learn how to compromise."

maintain that balance of $3000 are eligible for the program.

The Partnership Program provides customers the option of tailoring the program to their needs. Customers can link savings, checking, certificates of deposit, and even retirement accounts in the program.

The program provides customers with unlimited free checking, free check reorders, and unlimited Shawmut ATM use.

Shawmut provides Partnership Customers with a separate 800 number rather than the standard customers.

Sacco said the Shawmut and Fleet merger will not be complete until later this year, but she does not expect the merger to effect accounts until early next year.

She also said the accounts will probably not change dramatically after the merger is complete.

other. Discussion topics range from coming out to parents to how to deal with homophobic teachers and roommates. Meetings sometimes include videos, guest speakers, and food.

During the school year, the LBGA is responsible for three main activities. National Coming Out Day on October 11 usually involves a rally on the steps of the Student Union. Last semester Queer Fest was an all-day outdoor festival that took place on the lawn next to the Campus Pond.

The LBGA also holds monthly dances.

The 2 in 20 Floor

The 2 in 20 Floor for GLBT Students and Their Heterosexual Allies is a special interest residential program that offers GLBT students the safety and community that might not be available in other on-campus housing arrangements.

UMass is one of the only universities in the country that has a program like the 2 in 20 Floor and since its inception three years ago, the floor has had a lot of success. Located in Mary Lyon Residence Hall in the Northeast Residential Area, GLBT students live in a co-ed environment complete with special workshops and a bi-annual open house.

Students at UMass have access to many more GLBT resources and services, including the following:

- Classes at UMass and local colleges that explore and/or focus on GLBT issues.
- Counseling through UMass Mental Health Services by counselors and psychologists trained to be sensitive to GLBT issues.
- Protection from discrimination and mediation provided through several UMass agencies, including the Ombuds Office, and the Dean of Students Office.
- GLBT events listings and complete coverage in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.
- Local GLBT businesses, political organizations, and social groups that are open to students.

Everywoman's Center offers resources

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center, located in Wilder Hall, is a place where women can go to receive counseling, information, support, and training.

"We put a lot of emphasis on the Everywoman's Center as a training site where students can gain skills and receive quality supervision in a supportive environment. We are a multicultural organization. The women who work here are a diverse group of women who are committed to providing services to all women," said Carol Wallace, director of the Everywoman's Center.

The Everywoman's Center has five specific programs set up to help students and community women. In addition to these, "There's a lending library and a resource room where women can relax and have coffee or tea," said Wallace.

The counseling program provides a variety of free services to women attending the university and women in the community. The staff, including a master's level clinician and a licensed social worker, conducts intake and assessment interviews, offers short term counseling, gives referrals to community agencies and psychotherapists in private practice and provides support groups and workshops, according to the Everywoman's Center's annual report.

The Counselor/Advocate Program "provides 24 hour comprehensive services to victim/survivors of rape, battering, sexual assault, and sexual harassment and their significant others," according to the report.

The Educator/Advocate Program works toward creating a non-violent community for all women by providing

Large variety of RSOs appeal to many interests

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts offers students activities and experiences beyond dormitory life and classwork through it's registered student organizations (RSOs).

The types of RSOs available on campus run the gamut from political organizations such as the Republican Club and the University Democrats, to organizations specializing in the arts such as the Theatre Guild and the Spectrum Literary Magazine.

A number of RSOs have been created to bring together members of similar ethnic backgrounds such as Hillel, the Black Student Union, the Native American Student Association, and the Asian American Student Association, among others.

Student activists can also find ways to get involved with any number of different causes through groups such as MASSPIRG, the Animal Rights Coalition, or the Rainforest Action Group.

There are also organizations that provide UMass students with organized games, sports, and social activities. Some of these RSOs include the Sport Parachute Club, the Outing Club, and the Ski Club.

There are approximately 175 RSOs on campus, out of which 35 or 40 are currently inactive, according to Pheer Paradise, the customer service manager at the Campus Activities Office.

Of those RSOs, ten are new ones that will become active this fall after having received RSO status at the end of the Spring semester.

In order to become an RSO, an organization must:

- Contact the secretary of the registry at the office of the Student Government Association.
- Fill out a registration packet that includes a charter or constitution along with the names and signatures of at least ten students who are interested in participating.
- Have their paperwork reviewed by the SGA secretary of the registry, and upon approval, sent to the Campus Activities Office.

Once all of the above is completed, the organization will be assigned an account number and a mailbox and have RSO status.

Becoming registered provides benefits and privileges that an unregistered organization wouldn't have, according to Chris Amshey, president of Science Fiction Conventioneers, a RSO.

Campus Perspectives

Why did you want to come to UMass?

Compiled by Christopher Hassett • Photos by Elizabeth Morrison

"I wanted to get out of Florida. They have a good political science program, which is my major. I liked the school and some friends of mine came here. That's basically why I came here."

KIM DETTMANN
senior, political science
Tampa, Fla.

"I liked the diversity. It really interested me that people here spoke different languages. I thought it was cool that people were speaking German and Spanish everywhere. I got to learn different cultures by meeting these people."

DIANA MASLANKA
junior, BDIC
Sharo

"I got accepted to schools that had better programs that I was interested in but UMass had a good enough academic reputation at the right cost. So I came here."

HOLLIS CROWLEY
senior, English and history
Brookline

"I came here because of the New England Regional Student Program. They didn't offer my major at the University of New Hampshire. I also liked the size of the school. I come from a small high school. Good location too. It's far away from home but not to far. I guess I didn't want to leave New England to go to college."

BETH SCHULZ
freshman, food science
Nashua, N.H.

"UMass was a large, urban-like school with a feeling of a quaint New England town like my hometown in Maine. UMass also offered a good international study abroad program which is something I was interested in."

ELIA PEREZ-FEBLES
sophomore, communications and Spanish
Cape Elizabeth, Maine

"I live in the area. I think it's a really nice school. Scholarshipwise they gave me the best offer. It's close to home, too. It's also more prestigious than some of the other schools I was looking at."

MIKE BUTLER
freshman, exercise science
Springfield

"I wanted to study in the New England area. I just moved here from New York. My sister goes to Boston University and I wanted to go to a school with a campus. My sister's boyfriend told me about the computer science program and about the school in general. I came out to visit and decided I wanted to come here."

on track in their majors.

In addition to the advisors on staff, CCEBMS also offers tutors and peer counselors.

"We encourage students to use the tutors even if they're straight 'A' students" Ferreira said. "So that they can keep up that 'A.'"

To be a peer counselor, whose task is to keep in contact with first-year CCEBMS counselees, a student must be above the first-year level, and have a minimum 2.5 GPA.

Martin explained why the peer counselors and other CCEBMS offerings can be such an important asset to new students.

"If I grow up in the inner city, I might not get the same support and preparation as kids in the suburbs," he said.

The University also offers other minority support programs such as the Bi-Lingual Collegiate Program and the United Asian Resource Center, whose staffs regularly interact with their CCEBMS counterparts, according to Martin.

In recent years, an indication of the degree of success of the CCEBMS program has been the increasing retention rate of first-year students, which Martin said he has seen rise.

For the first semester of the 1994-1995 school year, 95 percent of new students stayed at the University, a decidedly different figure from last year's total retention of 70 percent.

Martin said that he attributes the growing rate to the quality of the current program, in which over 10 percent have a 3.0 GPA or higher, nearly 10 percent make the Dean's List consistently, and many are members of the ALANA Honor Society.

"Those students who came [to UMass] have to believe in themselves," he said. "And we will then help them to achieve."

UMass police work to protect campus from crime

By Amy Paradysz
Collegian Staff

First year students need to be aware that it is necessary to take the same precautions against theft and other crimes at the University of Massachusetts as they would in their home town or city, said campus police.

Most safety and security problems on campus can be "attributed to alcohol," according to Philip Cavanaugh, Associate Director of the Campus Police Department.

However, theft is one of the most frequent problems on campus.

Most campus thefts occur when students fail to lock their door, for example, when they go down the hall to take a shower or visit with friends, according to Cavanaugh.

"The sheer size of the campus is equivalent to that of a city," Cavanaugh said. He pointed out that a lot of campus theft occurs because UMass is open to the public.

"People become semi-naive when they enter our environment and let their guard down," said Deputy Chief Lawrence Holmes. "You really can't do that."

On the weekend of May 13-15, the UMass police had three reports of intruders allegedly entering a room while the occupant was sleeping. One victim claimed to have woken up to find a male touching her.

Cavanaugh said he gets about two calls a week from students concerned about someone wandering their residence halls.

"What we're seeing [in terms of crime] in large cities and even towns has escalated onto college campuses," said Cavanaugh.

For example, two non-students were shot outside Washington Residence Hall in Southwest on April 31.

In December, two brothers living in Butterfield Residence Hall were arrested by Amherst police for allegedly selling heroin to a Amherst High School student who died of an overdose.

"There is evidence of drugs at UMass just as there is in any community," Cavanaugh said.

Safety precautions

In case of emergency, 70 help phones are located around campus and are in direct communication with the campus police dispatch desk. The phones may be used to make on-campus personal calls for up to three minutes.

A campus escort service provides walking or mobile escorts throughout campus upon request from 5 p.m. until 3 a.m. every night of the week.

Student residence hall security officers are in the dorm lobbies every night from 7 p.m. until midnight or later. Campus police officers occasionally assist student security attendants in some of the towers in Southwest.

At bicycle registrations, held several times of year, campus police engrave serial numbers so that stolen bikes can be more easily recovered. Also, students may borrow the equipment to engrave property in their room, according to Cavanaugh.

Freshmen should realize that UMass police have all the authority as regular police, Holmes said.

"We have been very successful over the last year in getting restitution for damages caused by students and non- students," said Cavanaugh. An individual who purposely broke a window was charged with $763 in replacement costs.

The UMass police receive about 35,000 calls per year, according to Cavanaugh. However, that figure includes calls for the escort service and a "money run" used by campus operations. UMass police have walking, vehicle, mounted and bicycle patrols.

A welcome of new freedoms

Not everyone at orientation has the same orientation as you do — sexual orientation, that is. While most first year students are heterosexual, there are many others who aren't.

UMass offers something that many gay, lesbian and bisexual students have never been able to have before, and that something is freedom.

What kind of freedom, you ask? For starters, the freedom to do things away from the watchful eye of their parents who might be less than supportive when they find out their sons and daughters are not the straight boys and girls they thought they were. Back in high school, most GLBs had to hide their orientation from their parents because it was to risky. Not so now. Their parents are gone.

> No more pretending to be straight by going out with opposite sex "friends." No more going along with homophobic jokes in the locker room. ... No more.
> Wendy Darling

Their brothers and sisters are gone, too, and so are most of their friends from high school — and most of their enemies. GLB students at UMass have the chance to start over and make new lives for themselves. Lives based on trust and honesty instead of fear and lies.

No more pretending to be straight by going out with opposite sex "friends." No more going along with homophobic jokes in the locker room. No more studying ten hours a night to make their academic life the grand success that their personal life was not. No more.

At UMass, they can start over with new friends, ones who will accept them for who they are. They don't get this freedom from all sides — the supply of homophobes is endless — but they do get a lot more people to choose from: understanding straight teachers, sympathetic straight friends, and best of all, plenty of other gays, lesbians and bisexuals who are eager to meet them and help them out.

New students will get the freedom to be around other GLBs in ways they have never been granted before. From dances and meetings sponsored by the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance to programs sponsored by the Stonewall Center to the LGBT Pride Parade in Northampton. GLBs have their pick of activities that celebrate and understand their lives.

UMass even grants these students places to live and hang out with each other. The 2 in 20 Floor for Gays, Lesbians, Bisexuals, Transgender Students and Their Heterosexual Allies lets them live together in a safe community. There are no worries about homophobic roommates or getting disconnected, and nothing to be afraid of, because gay, lesbian and bisexual students fill an entire floor.

The same goes for hanging out in the office of the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance or at the Stonewall Center — students are allowed to be free, often for the first time in their lives.

Freedom does not come easily to all students, however. For some, it takes months or even years to realize that they are no longer living in the prison that trapped them in high school. They don't realize that attending a meeting of the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance won't mark them apart from the rest of the school. They don't realize that reading a magazine or going to a dance isn't going to be the end of them. But after a few weeks, or sometimes a few semesters, even these students can learn to take advantage of their newfound freedom.

Straight students get to experience a new kind of freedom as well. Even though most of them have never had to give sexual orientation a second thought, many of them will find that college allows them the freedom to consider it. With so many GLBs around, they can't help but start exploring their own sexuality. They can't help but learn new things and open up to a broader world. And even though most of these people decide they're still straight in the end, they have broken out of the mind-set that says what they have to be. That is what freedom does to them.

So as your orientation gets underway, and as September rolls around, look for your freedom: it's all around you.

What they won't tell you

Your upperclassmen mentors and academic advisors will doubtless give you some good advice on how to make your four to six years at UMass as productive and enriching as possible. However, there are many things they aren't allowed to tell you about.

Andrew Davidson

So listen up, because this will be one of the few insider's guides to life at UMass.

• The Dining Commons. Since you're obliged to eat here for your first four semesters, it's good to know a few ins and outs about the D.C.

If you're a vegetarian or not, basics is one of the few quaint places to eat in an otherwise stark white eating environment. Located just next to Northeast, basics offers vegetarian and red-meat-free fare, which is often cooked in smaller batches and is a bit healthier (there is also a basics in Southwest).

It usually draws a more eclectic crowd, which can be desirable if you're trying to get away from the ocean of baseball caps in the bigger dining halls.

If you're on the 14 meal plan, Saturday and Sunday brunch is always a sure thing. French toast, pancakes and bacon are dishes Food Services generally has a hard time screwing up. The bigger D.C.s will always have a trip, and do it around dinner time — you won't have to elbow your way to the front of the line.

Oh yeah — chicken pucks good, oatburgers bad.

• The textbook annex. If you aren't lucky enough to have a prof who buys from the ever-more congenial Jeffery Amherst Bookstore, you'll find the annex a zoo at the beginning of each semester. Try to make one

• Political correctness. Get used to the New World Order of Amherst. Don't be surprised to see two men kiss, or two women walk down the street holding hands. Expect to hear the word diversity at least 400 times a week, especially from the RAs.

While tales of referring to short people as "vertically challenged" are overblown, there is a strong trend toward finding more sensitive ways of classifying people.

If you're an arch-conservative or you're just into making waves, wait a little to see people's reaction before you open your mouth. You might save yourself a tongue-lashing by thinking first before calling someone a "femininazi".

What else? Make sure you go to Whitmore in the early morning or late afternoon — it's a zoo around lunchtime. Same goes with the library.

Hatch fries are overpriced and undercooked. You'll save yourself both grief and money if you boycott them.

Don't waste your money on a coed naked buffalo humping t-shirt store door-to-door bozo will try to sell you the first week — basketball shirts are always a better bet.

And if they ask, lie and say you're a sophomore.

Andrew Davidson is the editor-in-chief of the Collegian.

Letters to the Editor and Columns

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes and encourages letters to the editor. When writing, please TYPE your letter and keep it to a maximum of 400 words. We would much rather print several concise letters in the limited space available on the page.

The Editorial/Opinion page will occasionally print guest columns, but arrangements must be made in advance. If you feel you have a unique perspective on an issue of general interest, contact the Ed/Op staff before you submit anything longer than a standard letter.

All letters should include a name, address and phone number (for verification purposes only). Students should also include their year and major. The Collegian reserves the right to edit submissions for grammar, clarity and length.

Send all letters to the Ed/Op page c/o the Collegian, 113 Campus Center, UMass.

The Ed/Op page is also always looking for columnists. If you are interested in writing columns for the Collegian, come down to the office, or call at 545-1491, and ask to speak to Geri Sahn.

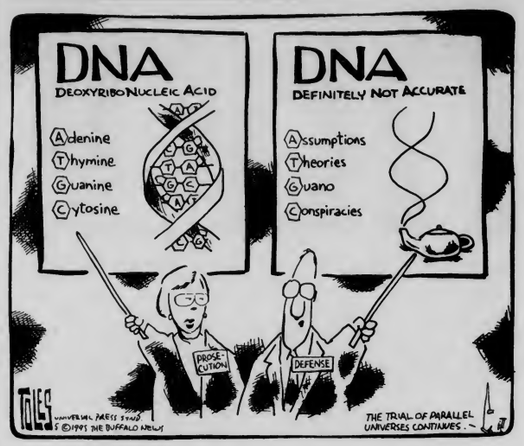
Opinion/Editorial



The best four years

UMass will be the worst four years of your life.

You can spend every weekend stuck in your room studying. You can have a major that everybody else told you to have and you hate. You can trudge through four years of classes and never learn a thing. You can take gut courses and never be challenged. You can never meet anyone besides your roommate, and leave college without a single friend. You can learn to drink all by yourself and leave with an alcohol problem. You can never get up at 3 a.m. to get tickets for a basketball game. You can leave with a worthless degree because you never had an internship or co- op and never had an on-campus job related to your field. You can have all these things and more.

Or you can take advantage of the best four years of your life.

UMass is one of the best things that will ever happen to you — but only if you make it happen. Every great thing that happens to you happens because of what you do.

Marni E. Helfner

There are many things to take part in at beautiful UMass, and here is but a small list:

• Learning to love UMass athletics has become a new general education requirement. You have your choice of basketball, lacrosse, ice hockey and women's soccer. If you came to UMass because of the basketball team, there will be plenty of opportunities to enjoy watching the Minutemen and Minutewomen play. For some students, becoming a Minutemaniac will be the highlight of their semester or even academic career.

• Expand your horizons by taking courses outside your college and major. Some of the best courses on this campus are in majors you wouldn't even think of taking a course in. Classes like "Living in the nuclear age," offered by political science and physics, or "Autobiography and Fiction of Arab and Muslim Women," from the women's studies department, or "Biology of Cancer & AIDS" from the microbiology department. This is the real reason why we have gen ed classes — to expand our minds into different worlds and to see what interests us before we jump into one major for the rest of our lives.

• Learn to lead. Becoming part of the various student-run governments can be an asset to your resume as well as a learning experience. It doesn't matter if you never become president of the Student Government Association or the student trustee, you can be part of your floor council, house council, or area government and still make a difference in the lives of your peers.

• You can hang with people who are just like you. Take part in all sorts of activities and clubs; except at UMass they're called RSOs which means Recognized Student Organizations. We've got everything from the Ultimate Frisbee Team to the Cannabis Reform Coalition to the Young Republicans to the Bike Co-op to Boricuas Unidos to the Undergraduate Business club. This is where you can do all the cool things you wanted to. If there isn't a RSO to your liking, you can form your own; in fact, UMass used to have a Dr. Suess Fan Club until all its members graduated.

• Get yourself a job while you're still in college. There are a world of job opportunities right on campus. You can work as a lab assistant because everybody is doing some sort of research project. You can work for an academic department doing a little bit of everything. You can work for Food Services dishing out the hash to all the hungry first-years and sophomores. If you want to find a job within your field, simply look and ye shall find. Your other option is to hit Mather Career Center where internships, co-ops and post-grad opportunities abound. They have a ton of paperwork, but the resources for finding a job are incredible. However, if you want to find where they're located, you'll need to get on a bus (God forbid anybody should make anything easy around here.).

• Have an opinion. If there's one thing UMass is famous for, it's politics. If you've got an opinion on something, there's somebody here at UMass who's willing to listen. When the warm weather comes, there's at least one rally a week. From radicals to Republicans, everyone's got an opinion.

• Be merry and social. One of the best things about college is the opportunity to meet people. Who knows? some of them may turn out to be your best friends for the rest of your life or your true love. Whether you go greek or just hang with your friends, as a first-year or anyone under the age of 21, house parties will become your alcohol havens. Names like Brandywine, Puffton, Townhouse, the Boulders and Hobart will become very familiar. If you're looking to alter your mind with other illegal substances, there's plenty of that here too. But be careful, last year an Amherst local overdosed on heroin. Whether it's alcohol, pot, nicotine, or caffeine you're putting something in your body that may not necessarily belong there.

UMass can be the worst or the best four years of your life and it's up to you to make the choices. As I look back to my past two years here at UMass, I realize that college has been something more than a $40,000 education. It has been what has helped define who I am as a person, and it can help to define you as well.

Marni E. Helfner is a Collegian columnist who will be a senior (finally!) in the Fall 1995 semester.

Livin' large in the dorms

I have been at this school for almost three full years. And in those three full years, I have resided on campus. Those three full years have been spent in the same residence area, and the last two have been in the same dormitory in the same room.

Andrew Bryce

I've had it.

Living in the dorms is the easiest way, since I have to be on campus so much. I have a cool roommate, still enjoy utilizing the groovy phone system (though haven't mastered it just yet, despite being the ultimate dorm-liver), and rarely spend my time hanging out in the dorms.

However, after racking up an embarrassing number of those damn seniority points, I am ready to move on. I'm ready to jet out of the dorm life, and suck up the off-campus life in full throttle. Yet, since I'm trapped for now, I have to do something drastic. I can't move off yet, I can't move out of the dorm yet.

That's why I have decided to sublet one of the towers. So, for the sake of my sanity, I will create my own dorm. Instead of John Adams Tower, it's Andrew Bryce Tower.

The first four floors would be used to bring all of my friends back on to campus that left my sorry-ass. Even the ones from Pittsburgh ... oops. I mean Sunderland. Now you guys can get to campus each day without paying tolls.

The fifth floor? Why, the bathroom, of course. Don't want to wreck tradition, since there's one on the fifth in good ol' John Adams. I'd just make it a hell of a lot bigger, with the added facilities. A hot tub, classy soap-on-a-rope with effervescence, soft paper with the creme stuff, a bidet — I'd load this place up with goodies.

Oh yeah, almost forgot. I'd have magazine racks of every major publication located inches behind the golden toilet, with a featured band playing behind a curtain for the toilet or shower-user's enjoyment.

The sixth floor would be a fragrance area — just in case the result of the fifth filters up. The seventh floor would be a movie screen. I'd still charge $7 to completely rip off men, women and small children. But that includes a cup for the keg for the men and women, and bottomless supply of Milk Duds for the kids.

The eighth floor would have a pool table, where I can get beat each time and a jukebox with all songs by 1980s Glamour Rock bands like Poison, Warrant, Winger and Europe to take my opponent out of his game.

(Please note how truly pathetic I am to be writing about each and every floor and what I'd do with them. Because I'm running out of ideas for the remaining floors ...)

The ninth floor would be ... ah, forget this. Who am I teasing, trying to dream up some scheme where I'd create my own dorm. One, I am not creative enough to design a 22-story tower, so I can understand why the towers ain't the prettiest things. Two, I'm forced to live in the dorms for the rest of the semester, despite being a dormitory vet.

And three — I don't want to put my seniority points in jeopardy. Just in case.

Arts & Living

Area boasts options for book, CD lovers

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

The Five College area can seem like a vast wasteland upon first glance by newcomers, but usually through word of mouth and trial and error most new students soon discover just how rich in culture the area is. Students can get a book on just about any topic and find music from as far away as Asia to as close as the band living in the dorm room below them.

Beginning with record stores, For The Record on North Pleasant Street in downtown Amherst features a wide variety of CDs and tapes in everything from rock to jazz as well as a local music and used CD selections. Across the street from For The Record is Al Bums (get it?), a slightly smaller record store specializing in rock/alternative, but also with a local music section as well as a small selection of vinyl and T-shirts. Of course, if you are in the mood for the more mainstream selection, Strawberries on Route 9 is always an option.

Record stores in Northampton are a bit more diverse. On Main Street is the aptly named Main St. Records and Son of Main St. Records (downstairs). While upstairs features CDs and tapes in the alternative/rock vain, downstairs virtually screams "underground," and has undoubtedly the largest selection of local and independent vinyl (from 7" singles to full size records) that you will find anywhere in the area, including a selection of fanzines, underground comics, T-shirts, books and videos. Main St. also features a used CD selection.

Located on the bottom floor of Thornes Marketplace in Northampton is Dynamite Records, which has just about everything. Dynamite features new and used CDs, tapes and records and also carries a small selection of local music.

Being college towns, Amherst and Northampton have a virtual plethora of book stores catering to all needs. So many in fact that to name them all would take up too much space. But a few are necessary.

The Jeffery Amherst Bookshop, located on South Pleasant Street specializes in Emily Dickinson and children's books on top of having something for just about everyone. Located behind Jeffery Amherst is the Jeffery Amherst College Store, where just about every student has been required to purchase a book at sometime in their college career. Another popular store that often carries books for University of Massachusetts' classes on top of its regular selection is the Atticus/Albion Bookshop, located next to Subway on Main Street in Amherst. Located next to For The Record in Amherst is Food For Thought Books, which features a more alternative selection of reading ranging in topics from multi-cultural politics to gay and lesbian studies.

Batman, Hanks return for summertime movies

By Jon Lupo
and Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

COURTESY UNIVERSAL PICTURES

Chris O'Donnell (seen here in Scent of A Woman) will play the Boy Wonder, Robin in Batman Forever.

The coming of summer usually heralds a return to TV reruns, eager swimsuit shopping and increased sightings of those Co-Ed Naked T-shirts on people whose I.Q. is smaller than the size of their thongs. But most importantly, the onset of summer means a return to the local, air-conditioned multiplex with some of Hollywood's biggest stars going all out to win your $7.50 and your heart (as well as a percentage of the opening weekend gross). Here's an inside look at five of the most eagerly awaited flicks as well as a truckload of seasonal releases.

BATMAN FOREVER

The director and star of the first two Batmans are out, and a whole new cast of characters (and a new Gotham City) are Technicoloring the dark knight, eschewing Burton's quirky landscape for a day-Glo cartoon feel. Joel Schumacher (The Client) helms this caper, and Val Kilmer (Tombstone) is the caped crusader.

In addition to a new look, a new star and a new director, Batman Forever features as many subplots as stunts. Jim Carrey is the Riddler, Tommy Lee Jones is Mr. Overexposed, er, Two Face, Nicole Kidman is the love interest and Chris O'Donnell (Circle of Friend.) is Batman's boy wonder, Robin.

Wait a minute — this movie is called Batman, right? Oh well. Don't expect much of a plot or a part for Batman; as it stands the movie looks to spend more time setting things up than paying them off.

Final word: The bad news: no Michelle Pfeiffer as Catwoman. The good news: no Danny DeVito as the Penguin. (J.L.)

POCAHONTAS

Disney movies draw gigantic crowds no matter what literary legend or historical tale the corporation warps with its notorious cinematic license. Pocahontas has another potential crowd-drawing characteristic going for it — a sure- to-be hotly debated controversy over the authenticity of the history of Pocahontas and John Smith.

The problem historians have with the movie is that the fabrication of a love story between Pocahontas and Smith never actually existed. Pocahontas was 11 years old and Smith was in his 30s when she saved him from the hands of her tribe members, who wanted his death. In Disney's version, both Pocahontas and Smith will be 20 years old.

Wooing young Pocahontas will be the voice of Mel Gibson. Let's just hope he can sing. The true test of the screen adaptation of the tale of Pocahontas will be whether or not Disney will stick true to her dying of smallpox at age 21. Somehow, I doubt it.

Final Word: Even if the plot is a mangled historical fairy tale, at least we'll love the music. (L.S.)

WATERWORLD

Though more people want this — the most expensive movie ever made (again) — to sink than to sail, this would- be action epic is sure to be one of the most talked about flicks of the year. Plagued by enormous (and well-publicized) production and personnel problems, Waterworld tells the story of a future engulfed by water and a group of colonists (led by Kevin Costner and The Firm's Jeanne Tripplehorn) who battle it out for local rights with an eye- patch wearin' Dennis Hopper, playing yet another psychotic villain for the nth time.

It's directed by Kevin Reynolds (last year's expensive dud Rapa Nui), who is used to working with troubled productions, and who nevertheless managed to pull a $100 million-plus hit out of Robin Hood. Costner, though, is in more danger. His last three movies (A Perfect World, Wyatt Earp, The War) were bombs and people are starting to forget this is the guy Hollywood was swooning over five years ago, throwing multiple Oscars at him and his silly hippie western, Dances With Wolves.

Final word: It would be too easy to evoke titles like Last Action Hero or Hudson Hawk. But hey, if it looks like a Howard the Duck and walks like a Howard the Duck ... (J.L.)

DIE HARD WITH A VENGEANCE

The first Die Hard is top notch suspenseful classic and Die Harder is an adequate enough actioner. So things are looking pretty good for the third installment, right? But remember Alien 3?

Wide range of movie theaters provide endless fun

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

We here in the Happy Valley are fortunate enough to have several movie theaters conveniently located for students without cars or huge amounts of spending money.

You'll find the most mainstream movies at the two AMC- owned theaters on Route 9 in Hadley. The Hampshire Six Theater is located in the Hampshire Mall, and the neighboring Mountain Farms Mall houses the Mountain Farms Four Theater. The PVTA bus stops at the Hampshire Mall, and Mountain Farms is walking distance from there.

Between the two theaters, the 10 screens offer a variety of popular movies. With a student I.D., ticket prices are $3.50 for evening and matinee shows. They also offer a special "twilight" showing for only $2.50. It is the cheapest show around and also the least crowded.

The Amherst Cinema, on 30 Amity St. in Amherst, is also along the bus route, but not too long of a walk from campus. It is a self-proclaimed "vintage 600 seat, single screen theater" with very cheap popcorn prices. The Amherst Cinema shows a mix of popular movies, cult classics, and the occasional foreign film. The exterior of the theater is not too aesthetically pleasing, but it is a fun place to watch a movie for only $4.

The Main St. of Northampton has The Academy of Music, next to Smith College, where you will find some lesser-known independent films as well as numerous foreign flicks. It is also a vintage theater, complete with a stage and red curtains. The Academy has two screens, and ticket prices for students are around $5.

Also located in Northampton is the Pleasant St. Theater, at 26 Pleasant St. off of Main St. There are two small screened theaters at Pleasant St., but it has the easy atmosphere of watching a movie in your living-groom. Films here range from the quirky to the controversial, and long lines always stretch out to the sidewalk. Admission is $5.75, and, sadly, Pleasant St. only offers a student discount Monday through Thursday for $4.75.

For those of you into the independent scene or documentaries, check out the F.Y.I. section of The Collegian for notices about movie screenings in the five-college area. Most of these films are free to the public.

Slick shades and floaty flirty dresses combine to create a sexy summer look that's both provocative and classy.

Reds and pastels color season's clothes

Flirty dresses, strappy sandals highlight classical look, style

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Designers primarily show off their summer lines in early January and February. This year's summer line really heated up the frosty airs of late winter with a myriad of styles.

Key colors this season? Red, beige and pink. You would think that designers would have gotten off the whole au natural thing, but every year it's reintroduced to critics' jaded eyes and they love it. Donna Karan is queen of making old trends new again. An especially hot item in her show was the nude calf length wrap dress.

Giorgio Armani has a slip dress that looks like something you'd wear to bed, but at $455, it's one hell of a night gown. Descriptive adjectives to paint a picture of what these little numbers do: conceal and reveal. Sounds like an oxymoron, but it works.

Even if you hate the color pink, you have to admire designers' integrity and crusade to make it a cool color again. Plus it's everywhere — sweaters, skirts, bathing suits, sneakers and dresses. Guess they figure if you don't want to buy it that sooner or later it will appear as something you like and you'll be forced to wear it.

On to fabrics, and satin seems to be one of the hottest selling one around. Jackets, skirts and crop-topped tees shimmer and shine, but beware, not everyone can carry off the fabric. It clings and causes a lot of attention, so if your body is less than perfect be mindful of what you want to highlight.

Vinyl is another fabric that has come out of record sleeves and onto racks everywhere. Helmust Lang featured an interesting tank dress on model Linda Evangelista that made her look ... well uncomfortable. Vinyl makes you sweat — it's a nice fad and not very practical in 80 degree heat, but if you must, try a bikini or short skirt.

And speaking of skirt lengths, most of the dresses and skirts on the runway hit the knee or lower. The emphasis of the styles was on the line of the body and the drape of the fabric. The hint of a figure was what caused the allure and not the amount of flesh it exposed. Richard Tyler, Nicole Miller and Karan all sported dresses of this length and style with variation on the creations' necklines. All were bias cut to skim to the body and many were sleeveless.

The slip continued to stay out of the boudoir. Ghost, Chanel and Ralph Lauren all used the basic of basics to create flowing floaty garments that screamed tropical weather and sunblock. And with the slip came the slit. You know, that little break in material that allows the wearer to take bold and brisk steps. But skip the slip under the slit because some go as high as the thigh and others are barely noticeable. Luckily, most of these styles come lined so don't worry about revealing more than you originally intended.

Sabrina is coming out on film again and so is the cool classical style that Grace Kelly, Audrey Hepburn and Jackie O. sported. Already, wrap around sunglasses have become the rage and scarves can been seen over many a coiffeur. Looking for class? Then try a short-sleeved cotton sweater over capri pants accented with a thin leather belt, all by Calvin Klein. Or

FAC shows a cheap alternative

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Alright, you're coming to the University of Massachusetts and you want to know to what exactly there is to do around here. Here's a hint: check out the Fine Arts Center's Center Series. The upcoming season will mark the 20th anniversary of the FAC and promises to be exciting and best of all — inexpensive. All series performances will be $5 and will be applicable for any seat in the FAC concert hall and in Bowker Auditorium for UMass and Five College students.

Highlights for the season include the Tony Award–winning show Crazy For You (Sept. 22). The musical includes classic Gershwin songs. "Embraceable You," "I Got Rhythm" and many more. You can also catch the Will Rogers Follies on Dec. 2 and the play She Loves Me (April 21, 1996).

If musicals and plays aren't quite what you're looking for, try out The Guitar Summit on Oct. 17. The Summit will feature contemporary guitarists Jorma Kaukonen from Jefferson Airplane and Steve Morse (Dixi Dregs, the Steve Morse Band and Kansas).

If you like vocal jazz, Cassandra Wilson, touted as the rightful heir to legendary vocalists Betty Carter and Carmen McRae will come to Bowker Auditorium on Nov. 2.

Crazy about dance? Ballet National de Caracas will perform Don Quixote on Oct. 22. If that's not enough, check out the dance performance that will be given by Saeko Ichinohe and Company on Nov. 9 or begin the spring semester with Paul Taylor Dance Company on Feb. 22, 1996.

Crave cultural stimulation? Experience the National Cuban Folkloric Dance Ensemble on Feb. 9, 1996 or Maija of Chaggaland (Sept. 22, 1996), a New WORLD Theater production.

Food for the eyes is provided by the Visual Arts division of the Fine Arts Center. The season will include new exhibitions in all four of the campus galleries as well a celebration for the 25th Anniversary of the Annual Black Musicians Conference with a performance titled "The Revolution Returns: The Next Generation in Jazz (April 1- 5, 1996).

You get all of this for less than the price of a movie and popcorn. So if you are looking for a new or familiar experience and don't want to sit home on a Friday or Saturday evening, try the Fine Arts Center. There's always something to see and it's only a short walk away from your dorm room.

COURTESY FINE ARTS CENTER

Students can enjoy a many shows in next semester's Fine Art Center Concert series. All for the low, low price of $5.

■ movies

Anyway, this second sequel is trying — very hard — to revisit the original, with numerous ties to the popular 1988 thriller. First, it's got the first's director, John McTiernan, who's suffering through a string of bombs (Medicine Man, Last Action Hero) and it's borrowing an important plot point. Jeremy Irons has been pegged to play the brother of the Alan Rickman villain, out to bomb most of New York City to get to one pesky cop, the indestructible John McClaine (Bruce Willis).

Fellow Pulp Fiction–alumni Samuel L. Jackson is also on board as Willis' partner, and the trailer is wowing with a string of truly impressive stunts — that is, until Willis cracks one of his infamously dopey jokes.

Final word: If Willis keeps his mouth shut for most of the movie ("How could the same thing happen to the same guy for the third time!") and it doesn't turn into Blown Away, Die Hard with a Vengeance looks to be the summer's hot ticket for action fans. (J.L.)

APOLLO 13

The actual Apollo 13 tragedy of 1970 had pulses racing and Americans on the edge of their seats, glued to the television, waiting to see what would happen to our valiant astronauts trapped in space. We can only hope the cast and crew of Apollo 13 can recreate the suspense and give us a gripping, heart-pounding, historical thriller.

The three unlucky astronauts are played by Tom Hanks, Bill Paxton and Kevin Bacon. Hanks, who is still riding high on Forrest Gump fame, teams up with Gump co-star Gary Sinise. Sinise plays one of the stressed-out NASA ground crew members along with Ed Harris (The Right Stuff).

Director Ron Howard (Backdraft, The Paper) has an affinity for blending action and drama to produce emotion- filled suspense films. Hopefully, this film will have a little more of each quality. If Apollo 13 delivers the suspense it promises, it should thrill (or at least remotely excite) audiences as did last summer's The Fugitive. Considering Hanks' current popularity, he should easily slide right into Harrison Ford's old spot.

Final Word: Gump in space? So that's what went wrong ... (L.S.)

Also coming soon ... James Bond returns with "Remington Steele" star Pierce Brosnan in 007's latest adventure, Goldeneye. Denzel Washington and Gene Hackman are hunting for Red October with the sub thriller Crimson Tide. Sean Connery, Richard Gere and Jodie Ormond team up to retell the King Arthur legend in First Knight. Mel Gibson does his best Rob Roy impression as a kilt-wearing warrior in Braveheart. Billy Crystal and Debra Winger try to Forget Paris in this romantic comedy.

Meryl Streep and Clint Eastwood fall in love in the Eastwood-directed version of the bestseller The Bridges of Madison County. Geena Davis is a female pirate in Cutthroat Island, co-starring Matthew Modine. Harrison Ford, Grey Kinnear (!) and Julia Ormond (again) remake the 1954 hit Sabrina, with Sydney Pollack (The Firm) directing. Ben Kingsley battles a new breed of alien in the sci-fi thriller Species.

Sylvester Stallone is Judge Dredd in this futuristic sci-fi action pick about the popular British comic book antihero. Cher and Ryan O'Neal try to revive their careers with Faithful, written and co-starring Oscar nominated Chazz Palminteri (Bullets Over Broadway). And Hugh Grant plays the harried father–to–be to a pregnant Julianne Moore in Nine Months, directed by Home Alone's Chris Columbus and co-starring as Grant's best buddy ... Tom Arnold! (J.L.)

New books cover many topics for avid readers

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Summertime is a great way to catch up on all those books you could have and should have read but just didn't have the time or inclination to after 300 pages of bio–chemistry. Here is a soupçon of three very different books you can while away the summer days with.

MEMNOCH THE DEVIL: THE VAMPIRE CHRONICLES
Anne Rice
Alfred A. Knopf/Fiction
(July)

The Vampire Lestat was made immortal by a vampire's kiss and Anne Rice's pen. Later he became flesh and blood in Interview With A Vampire with a blonde–locked Tom Cruise and a luscious looking Brad Pitt.

The fifth installment of the Vampire Chronicles will keep fans' insatiable hunger at bay with Memnoch the Devil. In it, Lestat is invited to be a witness to Creation and brought to the land of the dead to confront both God and the Devil; There Lestat is asked to accept one of them as his master, each offering imaginable power — damnation and redemption.

Sounds weird but it's Rice and you know she'll deliver the goods.

REASONABLE CREATURES
Katha Pollitt
Vintage/Non–fiction
(August)

Some people prefer a little more bite to their book than the flash in the pan summer thriller. For those who want to divulge into the more learned side of reading try this collection of essays.

Pollitt, who writes with wit and talent, takes on the people who have dismissed feminism as just another catch phrase of the '90s. Heralding the works and words of Hillary Rodham Clinton and even Lorena Bobbitt, the writer is not afraid to set the records straight. Mild, yet meaningful, her writing is clear, simple and very much to the heart of the matter.

BOB DOLE
Kenneth Ben Cramer
Vintage/Non–fiction
(August)

Take a look at the man who would be president, 1996 promises to be political fiasco and it doesn't hurt to find out the players in the game. Cramer takes an indepth and behind the scenes look at the Senate majority leader for the Republican party.

Through his writing we see the man behind the issues, beliefs and power. It is a unique look at the man we could all be pledging allegiance to.

From his 35 years in the House and Senate to his support of past Republican presidents, the book promises to be enlightening.

Pioneer Valley is a showcase of diverse musical talent

Michael Burke
Collegian Staff

Once you find your way around your own dorm and campus it's time to check out the local music scene. No matter what type of music you enjoy or how much money you have, there are shows for you to attend.

When it is not the home for Coach Calipari's Minutemen, the Mullins Center hosts platinum selling bands such as Green Day or Phish. With a capacity of over 10,000 it is the largest venue in Western Massachusetts so expect to see some of the biggest names around here in upcoming semester.

Don't despair if you are not in touch with the million selling superstars that appear at the Mullins Center because there are lots of more venues to hear live music.

University Productions and Concerts sponsors several shows a semester in the Student Union Ballroom and at the Bluewall, both of which are located in the Campus Center. If you are looking to see the superstars of tomorrow on a small stage look no further. Over the past year notable acts included Helium, Shudder to Think and the Roots.

On a much smaller budget, you can always check out student run shows put on in the basements of dorms. Ticket prices are usually just $3 and often go to local charities. Many of the best shows in the area come here including underground acts such as Weston and Doc Hopper who shared the stage this past May in an unforgettable punk rock show in Butterfield.

Off campus there are even more options for your listening pleasure. From the cozy confines of Fire and Water Cafe to the plush setting of the Iron Horse there are many live music venues in Northampton featuring all kinds of music.

Pearl Street is probably the most recognized club in the Valley probably because it hosts the infamous 16+ dance parties as well as bringing some of the most talented musicians to the area. Recent acts have included Digable Planets, 10,000 Maniacs and Bob Mould.

The Iron Horse is known for bringing a diverse mixture of folk, jazz, blues and more to the Valley. Every show is all ages and they serve great food. Unfortunately for rock fans, the shows are few but usually they bring top notched artists such as J. Mascis and Jonathan Richmond.

The Bay State is the place to see local bands perform as well as up and coming national bands. Local stars such as the Scud Mountain Boys and Tizzy often hold the limelight while national bands such as Versus and Built to Spill have played here in the past year. Unfortunately there is an age requirement of 21 so many of you first–years will have to wait a couple years to share in the fun.

If you are on a low budget but still want to see live shows in a nice intimate setting look no further than the Fire & Water Cafe a cozy little hole in the wall located in Northampton. The admission is always free and there is live music six nights a week. Everything from folk to bluegrass to modern rock can be heard here, plus the food is excellent. Recent acts have included UMass favorites The Mitchells and Stringbean.

Even if nothing at the nightclubs interests you there are still four more colleges that often bring talented live music to their campuses.

Our neighbors at Amherst College probably have the most vibrant music scene of any of the local colleges. Recently Sonic Youth and Dinosaur Jr co–headlined a sold out show at the Lefrak Gymnasium that was filled with feedback and mosh pits. On a smaller scale there is the Campus Center Frontroom which may be the best place in the Valley to see live music. With a stunning sound system and a small stage, there is probably no better place to see a live band in the Valley. Past performers over this year included Pavement and Small Factory.

For punk rock fans Hampshire College has been the sight of many classic shows. This past year alone has seen the likes of Team Dresch, Huggy Bear and Tuscadero all pass through. This coming year should be no different.

As you can see, there are enough musical distractions here in the Valley that will keep you from ever opening that calculus book you dread. Every night of the week there is something worth seeing so don't forget to budget your time and your money.

■ fashion

maybe you want to look a little more professional with wide leg cotton trousers in summer white and a navy blue blazer with a simple stripped tee: nautical and All–American.

Bathing suits are also following this conservative line of design. Tank suits with modesty cut backs and thighs have become the rage. Navy and black seem to be the colors of the moment although it didn't stop Chanel from showing off their favorite string bikini number on Naomi Campbell. Or it could have been an excuse to show off her navel ring.

Suits are also looking remarkably similar to one another. Slim pants and fitted jackets are the recipe for success. Richard Tyler (king of celebrity suits), Emmanuel Ungaro and Norma Kamali all have two pieced numbers with nipped–in waists and notched collars. Not a single bellbottom or piece of polyester to be found!

Trench coats are also a hot item this summer. Mainly due to movies like The Specialist that had Sharon Stone (clothes horse extrodinaire) sporting a nifty purple one by Karan. How do you wear them? Knee length, tied, looped or bowed, but never buckled, unless of course you're going for the à la Bogie look, in which case you'd belt it tight, button it up, cuff the sleeves, slouch and pray no one mistakes you for Inspector Gadget.

Polo shirts have hit it big and continue to crop up on every catalogue from J. Crew to Speigal. But don't think designers have decided to make one polo shirt? Oh no! You have long sleeved, short sleeved, capped sleeved, cropped sleeve, no sleeved and that's just for the shirt. You can also have polo dresses, lounge ware, evening wear and of course, sports wear. You can have it cropped, tight, poor boy or multi colored, tight weaved, loose weaved, or fine gauge. The possibilities are endless though you can always steer clear of the hype and buy the one with the green alligator.

Marie Claire was nice enough to try to help out their readers by devoting two pages to the hot new hairstyles. Basically, there are five: clean, wet, curly, side–part and evening. The writer will kindly show you the looks of Nadja, Helena, Kate and Shalom in five different styles that you know you will never be able to duplicate in a million years. But it's nice to get people hopes up and boost sales in Kheil's hair products — one ounce of glossy stuff for $36!

And finally, the footwear of the moment is the sandal. Strappy, sexy and versatile it can be matched with anything and everything in a plethora of styles that can make your head spin. Unfortunately, rumors have been confirmed and the jelly show is also a hot item. But it isn't your old jellies. No, these are designer jellies going for $45 in all their glittery tackiness. Maybe they will one again catch on with mass producers and you can pick up an equally tacky pair for $2 at K–Mart.

So grab your sunscreen, slather on the self–tanner, strap on your sandals, sweat in your vinyl dress and try to be cool behind your wrap arounds and don't forget your trench jacket. With chic like this summer you can't possibly go wrong.

mination to become the coach of the Runnin' Rebels won him the job over six other finalists. UNLV had previously shown interest in University of Oregon head coach Jerry Green, but he chose to remain with the Ducks.

Bayno will try to turn around a program that went from a national championship in 1990 to the school's worst record in 35 years, 12-16, this past season. The Rebels have since been through four coaches, including Rollie Massimino, who had his contract bought out for $1.8 million last year amid controversy.

When officials learned former UNLV president Robert Maxson had given Massimino a secret contract in addition to his public one, public sentiment pushed the University into buying out the remainder of Massimino's contract. He was then replaced by Grgurich. Bayno said that he didn't want to dwell on the bad times at UNLV, but rather, he wanted to get the program back to its winning ways.

"All I looked at was the positives that occurred in the past, the great teams, the great coaches," Bayno said. "I grew up watching UNLV basketball. Every time I watched them play, their hearts and souls were left on the courts. They were the hardest playing team in the country."

Bayno was the first assistant hired by Calipari when he took over the Massachusetts program in 1988. A native of Goshen, N.Y., he graduated from Sacred Heart in Fairfield, Conn., in 1985. After working with P.J. Carlesimo as a graduate assistant coach at Seton Hall, Bayno joined Larry Brown's staff at Kansas in 1987 before serving as an assistant at Baptist College in Charlestown, S.C.

Assistant coach James "Bruiser" Flint will fill Bayno's position while fellow assistant John Robic moves into Flint's post. Ed Schilling has been hired to fill Robic's restricted earnings position.

legiate soccer player can receive.

Kater expressed sadness about leaving UMass.

"I love UMass. I like the area and I like the people. I'm definitely not going to forget UMass," she said. "I think the hardest thing will be leaving the players."

UMass head coach Jim Rudy expressed both happiness and sadness about his former player and assistant's departure.

"It's a great loss for us and a great victory for us, as well. It means we've taken one of our great graduates of soccer to the next level," he said. "I can't think of anyone better prepared to go out there.

"She's learned a lot here. It's a bittersweet reaction for all of us. I hope to find someone as qualified to take her place."

Some of the UMass players expressed the same feeling.

"I think it's great for her but it's a loss for us definitely," sophomore defender Erin Lynch said. "She definitely deserves it. It's a great opportunity for her. She was a great assistant and she'll be an even better head coach. The [Syracuse] players will be lucky. She knows so much about the game. She taught us a lot.

"She'll do great things up there. I'll definitely miss her coaching. Off the field, she was more than just a coach. She helped us out with personal problems, too. She's a great motivator."

"She's a great coach," sophomore midfielder Rebecca Myers said. "I respected her and everyone else on the team respected her too. She'll be hard to replace no matter how you look at it."

Graduating seniors expressed pleasure upon hearing about Kater's hiring.

"I think it's fantastic. It couldn't of happened to a better person," senior forward Melissa Mitchell said. "She's an outstanding coach. She has a great coach-player relationship. She has a good knowledge of the game.

"Practices weren't boring with her. She makes it exciting. She makes you want to come practice. I idolize her."

"I knew it was coming," senior defender Heidi Kocher said. "I think she deserves to be a head coach."

Hartford, CT was far from jinxed during his sophomore campaign, as his game improved a considerable amount from his award- winning freshman season. Camby averaged 13.9 ppg and 6.2 rpg, while swatting 103 shots on the defensive end.

When Roe arrived in Amherst back in the fall of 1991, so did Derek Kellogg (8.2 ppg, 128 assists, team-high .825 FT). As Roe went from the A-10 All-Rookie team to All- America in four years, Kellogg went from playing sparingly in his freshmen year, to being the floor general for the latter of his collegiate career. The Springfield native enjoyed his best season as a Minuteman and was named to the Third Team All Atlantic 10 and the A-10 All-Academic Team.

Donta Bright (9.2 ppg) had a solid junior season, and was named to the Third Team All A-10. Dana Dingle was the consummate role player for the Minutemen all season long (7.0 ppg, 5.5 rpg). Edgar Padilla (7.1 ppg), Carmelo Travieso (5.3 ppg) and Tyrone Weeks (4.9 rpg, 4.3 ppg) stepped up their play in the absence of Mike Williams (12.2 ppg, 66 assists), who was suspended prior to the Feb. 16 game against Duquesne for violating team rules.

RSOs

"It gives us the ability to have a budget, get meeting rooms, and office space. It also gives us more potential to use University resources," said Amshey.

One of those resources is meeting rooms, which the group makes regular use of.

The Science Fiction Conventioneers was created when the organizers of the Science Fiction Center realized that one organization couldn't run the center's library and a convention efficiently, Amshey said.

New students will have an opportunity to review the current listing of all of the RSOs on campus and to ask questions about them at the new students session.

"It's an optional meeting, so, the turnout is usually pretty small," Paradise said.

large contributors to that record as they combined for 48 of those 100+ wins. The women finished with a school record 19 wins while finishing in second place in the A-10. The Minutewomen also received a bid to the NWIT and received its first-ever votes in the national poll. Juniors Melissa Gurlie and Octavia Thomas both scored the 1,000 points of their careers.

• The men's hockey team, although accounting for 28 of the university's 69 losses, came up with two of the more memorable wins of the season. First they knocked off No. 1 ranked Maine, the Black Bears first Hockey East loss of the year, then won their first ever Hockey East playoff game over a tradition rich Boston College hockey program.

• The up and coming women's gymnastics squad (14–12) burst upon the national scene by shocking Top 20 ranked West Virginia in Morgantown, W. Va. The Minutewomen recorded their season–best point total in upsetting the Lady Mountaineers, 190.925–190.725. The team placed fourth at the NCAA Regionals and three of the team members competed for individual titles at the event. Junior J.J. Tolhurst won the women's all-around at Regionals and received an automatic bid to the NCAA Championships.

• The men's gymnastics team enjoyed similar success rolling to a 9–2 record. The highlight of the season came as the Orangemen invaded Boyden gym and left with a loss as they were disposed of, 225 05–224.60. The momentum they took from that meet carried over to the New England Championships, where they captured their seventh straight title. The following week, UMass hosted the ECAC Championships and won the event over defending champion William & Mary. Individuals who excelled for the Minutemen were freshman Kevin Schwartz and sophomore Ruslan Shupak, who both qualified for NCAA Regionals.

• The women's indoor track team was also a success, running their record to 7–1 and finishing in second place at the A–10's. Stellar performances were turned in by senior Kelly Liljeblad, who qualified for the NCAA's Championships by setting a school record in the 3,000 meters with a time of 9:36.67, and freshman Rosie Bryan, who qualified for the ECAC Championships in two events, the long jump and the 55–meter hurdles.

• The men's indoor track team kept pace with the women indoor tracksters compiling a record of 6–2–1. The team finished second at the New England Challenge Cup and fourth at the A–10's. Junior middle distance runner Ethan Nedeau, along with long and triple jumper Tom Galligani, were named to the All Academic A–10 indoor track team.

• Women's swimming was making waves this year as well, with their record of 7–4–1. The swimmin' Minutewomen took first place at the Rhode Island Invitational and placed fifth at the A–10's. At the A–10's, junior Sarah Baker was the first–ever Minutewomen to win an individual title as she took the 800–meter freestyle. Freshman Karen Sonnwald splashed onto the scene setting three separate school records in the 500, 1,000 and 1,650. Baker and Toni Youndahl were Academic A–10 selections.

• Men's swimming's (9–4) streak of eight straight New England Championships ended, but the Minutemen did win the URI Invitational. Junior Keith McLardy set the school record in the 200 backstroke and the 400 individual medley while senior Tim Milbert set the record in the 100 breaststroke. Jeff Shearstone and John Luviano both were named to the All Academic A–10 team.

Spring recap

• The baseball team enjoyed a successful season as they won the A–10 regular season and tournament title. The Minutemen tied their own A–10 record for the most wins in a season and beat MAAC champion Siena for an NCAA appearance (results were not available at press time).

Major contributions to the success in baseball go to senior Bill Knight who broke three Minutemen records and is currently attempting to add to the all–time home-run and runs batted in records, as well as the single season homerun record. Knight blew away his competition in capturing the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year award.

Junior Ryan Jette has batted lead–off all season. With his lightning speed and base swiping ability, to complement his batting and on–base percentage, run production has amassed. Keeping opponents off the scoreboard has been the ace and backbone of the pitching staff, senior Jay Murphy, who has not lost an A–10 game this season and earned A–10 Pitcher of the Year honors.

• The softball team (40–12) also had success. This year's crown makes it five consecutive for the Minutewomen. Senior captain Kelly Daut went 28–12 this season and is one of only two people ever to win an A–10 weekly award five straight weeks. She accomplished that feat by winning the Pitcher of the Week award five straight times.

At the plate, freshman Kim Gutridge and sophomore Sam Cardenas both had hot streaks. Gutridge sported a 25–game hitting streak, second in school history, while Cardenas posted a 22–game hit streak. Gutridge, along with sophomore Chris Martens, had batting averages lingering around .400. The Minutewomen advanced to the NCAAs before bowing out in the Regionals.

• Men's lacrosse finished off their season as the No. 14 ranked team in the nation, and were able to pull off an NCAA berth, but the big story this spring came from the front office. Greg Canella was at the helm in his first season as the UMass coach and it is the first time in many years that a guy named Garber has not been the boss. UMass faced Princeton in the NCAA tournament, and put a scare into the defending National Champion, trailing by only a goal after three quarters, before succumbing. Sophomore Brendan Glass lead the team in scoring and is on pace to become one of UMass' top 15 scorers of all–time. Senior Mike Valente is sixth on the UMass career assist list with over 80. Junior Dennis Kelly played stellar defense and led the team with over 50 ground balls.

• Women's lacrosse had a nail–biting season with six of the 10 losses coming by three goals or less. Coach Francesca McClellan had a very young team with 10 of the 18 players being freshman. The team did post three wins with the help of freshman Joanna Bignazio, who scored 33 goals, and a solid save percentage from freshman goaltender Kate Brew.

• The men's tennis team finished their season at an even 6–6. They finished seventh in the A–10 Tournament and fourth at the New England Championships. Freshman Alex Aller had the best personal performance posting an 8–1 record at No. 6 singles. Senior Tim Lipsky had a solid season at the top spot, but all lights shined on the performance of junior Justin Lewis, who won the No. 4 singles flight at the New England Championship.

• Coach Judy Dixon's other team, like the women's lacrosse team, was mostly freshman. The women's tennis team had a season with a steady incline ending with a fourth place finish at the A–10s. The Minutewomen started off slow but finished up strong thanks to Sitton and exchange student Catalina Mejia. Sitton won the A–10 No. 1 singles Championship in convincing form and Mejia won all but one of her matches at the sixth spot.

• The men's outdoor track team did not lose all season, posting an 8–0–1 record this spring with the tie coming against Maine. Team leaders included senior Tom Galligani (triple jump), junior John Johnson (long jump and 4 X 100 relay), and senior Ron Tauro (high hurdles and high jump).

• Women's outdoor track proved that track at UMass is a force to be reckoned with. The Minutewomen also enjoyed an undefeated season, posting a unprecedented 12–0 record.

Junior Roberts headed the pack, winning an overwhelming majority of her 200 and 400–meter races. Roberts, also a soccer All–American, set school records at the 100 and 200– meters. Also contributing were NCAA qualifiers senior Liljebald and Heather Brown. Liljebald, who ran well in long distances, set the school record at the 10,000 meters in her qualification for the NCAA berth. Brown, who joined Liljebald at the NCAA's, also set the school record In her event, the javelin throw.

• This year marked the first season as a varsity sport for the women's water polo team at UMass. Like an expansion club, the team started off slow, dropping tough matches to powerful west coast style squads in California. After taking its licks, the team returned home where they played well throughout the season eventually climbing to a national ranking of No. 20. Leading the way for the Minutewomen were sophomore Vicky Baymond, who led the team in scoring, and junior Jessica Griffith, who was solid minding the net all season.

• Another first year varsity sport at the university was women's crew, as they were queens of the Connecticut river, and every other body of water they encountered. The Minutewomen rowed themselves to an undefeated season finishing off the year as the Division II National champions. They won the crown at the New England Rowing Championships in Worcester, Mass., where they entered as the No. 1 seed. Other accomplishments for the boat squad include winning the California Cup in San Diego, California. That victory qualified the Minutewomen to row for the prestigious Whittier Cup held next April.

The Resource and Referral Program provides women with information at their request. "Women can call [or come into Resource/Referral] with a question about anything. If we can't answer the question, we can direct them to somebody who can," said Wallace.

The Women of Color Program is an advocacy and support program for women of color, said the report. Some of its services include: film series, workshops, social and cultural events, guest speakers and resource materials, said the program's pamphlet.

An intensive 60 hour training program is offered twice a year for volunteers. "We employ about 150 students and volunteers a year. We have all kinds of positions [including] volunteer, internship and work study," said Wallace. Many students who volunteer when they come to UMass continue throughout their years here, she said.

"It's been a very rewarding experience. The whole center has been a great support system for me. When I [returned] to school I began as a volunteer and became [a staff member]," said Nancy Patteson, the inter–room assistant coordinator of the Resource/Referral Program who is a graduate student in the School of Education.

UMass sports teams have successful '94–95 year

The University of Massachusetts athletic program completed another year of excellence.

The 1994–95 athletic year ended with UMass capturing the Hanes Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup, awarded for overall athletic excellence in the 18 championships sponsored by the Conference. UMass had six championship teams during the 1994–95 campaign: women's soccer, men's soccer, field hockey, men's basketball, softball and baseball, as well as a second place finish in men's cross country.

Fall recap

• Football ended their season 5–6 overall and 4–4 in the Yankee Conference. Junior running back Rene Ingoglia finished fifth in the 1994 Walter Payton Award contest, given annually to the top player in NCAA Division I–AA. Ingoglia and senior defensive end Brian Corcoran, named the 1994 Yankee Conference Defensive Player of the Year, were named to the Sports Network All–America second team and the Associated Press All–America third team. Junior cornerback Breon Parker was selected to the American Football Coaches Association All–America first team and also received an All–America honorable mention.

• Field Hockey (12–3–3) ended with an A–10 record of 3–0–1 and were the A–10 Regular Season Champions for the third straight year. Seniors Natalie Hart and Danielle Borges were All–American selections while sophomore Hilary Rose was named the A–10 Player of the Year. The Minutewomen's biggest accomplishment was the defeat of the No. 1 North Carolina Tarheels, 2–1, in overtime.

• Women's soccer (16–6) had a successful season, ending with an Atlantic 10 Conference record of 5–0 and advancing to the Regional Final Four of the NCAA Tournament by winning their first round game against Harvard (4–1), but then losing in the Regional semi–finals to Hartford 2–0.

Senior Heidi Kocher was a Division I first team All– American and an Atlantic 10 All–Conference first team selection. Junior Nicole Roberts was also an A–10 All–Conference selection as well as a Northeast Regional All– American. Sophomore Erin Lynch was named the A–10 Conference Player of the Year for her outstanding season.

• Men's soccer (13–6–1) ended it's year with an A–10 record of 6–1, and advanced to the A–10 Conference Championship Final where the Minutemen were defeated by Rutgers, 4–3. Freshman Karstin Bremke was named the A– 10 Conference Rookie of the Year. He was joined by senior Mike Doyle and sophomore Dave Siljanovski as All A–10 first team selections. Junior Colin Johnson and senior Mark Wolf received honorable mentions. Sam Koch was named the A–10 Conference Coach of the Year.

• Volleyball (27–8) had an impressive A–10 record of 10– 4, advancing to the A–10 Championship semi–finals but losing to Rhode Island. Sophomores Dionne Nash and Giza Rivera were named to the All A–10 team. The Minutewomen were invited to the NIT Volleyball Tournament where they had one win.

• Men's Water Polo (30–9) had a tremendous season, with a No. 11 ranking in the nation. The team captured the EWPA Championship for the second year in a row by defeating Navy in the finals. Senior Javier Gonzalez was a NCAA Championship Tournament All–America honorable mention and an EWPA selection. Juniors Luis Limardo, John Luviano, Alex Mujica and sophomore Greg Menton were also EWPA selections.

• Men's Cross Country finished with an overall record of 8–2 and finished in second place at the A–10 Championships. The team finished in eighth place at the New England Championships. Sophomores Matt Behl and Michael Maceiko were named to the A–10 All–Conference Team.

• Women's cross country (3–2) finished in third place at the A–10 Championships and in second place at the New England Championships. Sophomore Melissa Langevin was named the A–10 Runner of the Year and was also the winner of the Individual A–10 Championship. Langevin and sophomore Rebecca Donaghue were named to the All A–10 Conference team.

Memorable season for men's hoop team

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

The season was completed over three months ago, and the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is still the topic of many a conversation.

The head coach it has is highly sought after by other college basketball and NBA teams alike, regarded as one of the top young coaches in the collegiate game. An assistant coach is named coach at the University of Nevada Las Vegas, despite not having any head coaching experience thus far. A player is expected to be putting an NBA cap on come draft day, and the UMass campus is excited that his sophomore teammate decided to stay another year in school.

With a team like the University of Massachusetts men's basketball squad, it does not have to be in season for the interest to be there. As for John Calipari, Bill Bayno, Lou Roe, Marcus Camby and the boys, they impressed many during the 1994–95 season.

And as all the attention is given to Massachusetts and its onguings in the off–season, the success that the program achieved over the course of last season is realized. When Calipari is mentioned in conversation, when Bayno was at the press conference to announce his position, when Lou shakes hands with NBA commissioner David Stern in June. The achievement of the Minutemen was obvious after the 1994–95 season. A season that will forever be remembered.

And it won't be too hard to recall since the Minutemen etched their name into the record book in more than one instance over the five–month period. Massachusetts, who finished with a 29–5 overall record (13–3 in A–10), became the first New England team to ever be ranked No. 1 after spending a week in the position (from Nov. 28 to Dec. 4) following its 104–80 victory over defending champion Arkansas in the Tip–Off Classic. In addition, the No. 1 ranking marked the first time any Massachusetts team had been ranked first nationally in any sport.

Later on in the season, the Minutemen spent four straight weeks at the top spot in the Associated Press and USA Today/CNN polls from Jan. 9 to Jan. 30. They remained as one of the top eight teams in the country throughout the entire season, and headed into postseason at No. 7.

The Minutemen advanced to the Elite Eight, something no other team in Massachusetts basketball history has done.

That came after the Minutemen wrapped up their fourth consecutive A–10 Tournament title, which was after their fourth consecutive regular season A–10 championship. In doing so, Massachusetts became only the second team in NCAA history to accomplish both conference feats for four straight years.

As the team was collecting championship rings and embarking on NCAA Tournament trips, Lou Roe was piling up individual accomplishments. The 1994–95 season was the collegiate finale for Roe, and he responded with 16.5 ppg 8.1 rpg. The 6–foot 7–inch Atlantic City native was named to the second team All–America team by the Associated Press, the first Massachusetts player ever to be so honored. Roe was also a John Wooden Award finalist, given annually to the nation's best player. As for conference honors, he grabbed all of them — First Team All–Atlantic 10, A–10 Player of the Year and the A–10 Tournament Most Valuable Player. Roe became the first player in conference history to be named to four straight all–tournament teams.

In addition to multiple honors, Roe became Massachusetts' all–time leading rebounder, passing the previous mark held by Julius Erving. All of his accomplishments were acknowledged at the Minutemen's postseason banquet, as John Calipari tearfully announced Roe's No. 15 jersey will be put up high into the William D. Mullins Center.

Another jersey that could very well be retired in the near future may be No. 21, as in sophomore center Marcus Camby. The 6–foot 10–inch, 215–pounder from

UM assistants hired as head coaches

• Bill Bayno named at UNLV

Seven years ago, University of Massachusetts men's basketball head coach John Calipari was hired to rebuild one of the worst programs in America. Seven years later, one of his assistants will now be asked to do the same.

Massachusetts assistant coach Bill Bayno was hired as coach of the University of Nevada–Las Vegas men's basketball team on March 30, replacing former coach Tim Grgurich, who resigned on March 3 for health reasons.

At a news conference announcing his hiring, Bayno promised he would work to return the UNLV program to the prominence it once held under former coach Jerry Tarkanian, who was forced to leave his position with the Runnin' Rebels in 1992.

"The enormous opportunity that presents itself here, to run this program and be the head coach of what was once obviously the greatest basketball program in the country, is a dream," Bayno said.

It is the first head coaching job for the 32–year–old Bayno, who flew to Las Vegas from New Jersey after the Minutemen lost to Oklahoma State in the NCAA Tournament. He interviewed with UNLV athletic director Jim Weaver and interim university president Kenny Guinn and accepted the job offer. He was introduced to the media at a press conference by Guinn, who said Bayno was the best choice for the financial package of $300,000 a year, which was the most UNLV could offer.

"This is the culmination of a 25–day search. It was a fast process and we had a number of candidates, anyone of which we would have been pleased to have," Guinn said. "We just felt that this young man was the person to head up the program and promote both good basketball and good academics."

According to reports, Bayno's persistence and his deter-

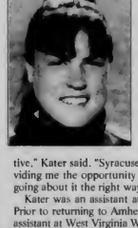
The University of Massachusetts athletic program lost its second top assistant in a month when April Kater, assistant women's soccer coach and UMass graduate, was named head coach at Syracuse University on April 25.

"I'm excited. It's a great opportunity," Kater said. "It's good for me, and just for women's soccer and female athletics. Syracuse is sound both academically and athletically."

Kater was also interviewed by Boston University, Old Dominion, Fresno State, the University of South Carolina and Memphis State, along with several other Division I schools.



Kater started on June 1. The Syracuse program is brand new and will begin play in 1996, giving Kater a full year to recruit. A new soccer stadium is currently being built.

"All of the support system is there. Across the board, Syracuse is top of the line. It's big time. It's very attractive," Kater said. "Syracuse really has it together. It is providing me the opportunity to be successful. They're really going about it the right way."

Kater was an assistant at UMass for the past two years. Prior to returning to Amherst two years ago, Kater was an assistant at West Virginia Wesleyan College, a NAIA/NCAA Division II women's soccer program, for a year.

"I think working at a school like UMass has taught me a lot about the way to run a program," she said.

During her playing days at UMass, Kater played on three NCAA Tournament teams and was a three–time NSCAA first–team All–America selection, a two–time Adidas Academic All–America selection and a three–time Olympic Sports Festival participant.

In 1990, Kater became the only UMass soccer player, man or woman, to receive the Hermann Award, given to the nation's top collegiate man and woman soccer player. The Hermann Award is the most prestigious award a col-

Marcus Camby to stay for junior year

By Andrew Bryce

As the midnight deadline for the early entries to the 1995 NBA draft came and went, no public word was given on the status of Marcus Camby. Therefore, it is official — the sophomore center will stay for his junior season at the University of Massachusetts.

If Camby chose to declare himself eligible for the NBA draft, he would have had to do so by midnight on May 14.

Since his decision was to stay put, Camby did not need to call a press conference. Massachusetts coach John Calipari said Camby "doesn't owe anybody an announcement. He may just let it pass, and act like he was thinking about it."

Camby did talk to the Hartford Courant (May 13), and expressed his desire to stay for the 1995–96 school year. "The fact that so many underclassmen came out pretty much helped me make up my mind," Camby said.

During the week leading up to the deadline, North Carolina's Jerry Stackhouse, Wisconsin's Rashard Griffith and Virginia's Cory Alexander joined others who already declared, such as Maryland's Joe Smith, Ohio University's Gary Trent, and Stackhouse's sophomore teammate, Rasheed Wallace.

With the plethora of talent coming out of the collegiate ranks this year, Camby had the chance of being one of the top players picked if he were to declare. Yet with Stackhouse, Wallace and Smith being the frontrunners for the top three positions, Camby should be in a better place after a season of improvement.

"I'm happy with my decision. And next year, I could be the No. 1 or No. 2 pick if I work hard," Camby said.

His performance in the Minutemen's final game against Oklahoma State in the Elite Eight of the NCAA Tournament was the last game scouts had a chance to see Camby in action.

In the 68–54 loss to 7–foot, 292–pound Bryant Reeves and the Cowboys, Camby, who averaged 13.9 ppg and 6.2 rpg to go along with 103 blocks through 30 games, scored just six points on 2–of–10 shooting.

One of the few questions of Camby's game is his size. Some say Camby needs to add more muscle to his thin 6–foot, 10–inch, 215–pound frame to excel in the NBA.
